

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

SIXTH VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, July 11, 1854.

Chapels.*

Reported—Ecclesiastical Courts; Public Revenue and Consolidated Fund Charges.

3^d and passed—Indemnity; Insurance on Lives (Abatement of Income Tax) Continuance; Poor Law Board Continuance; Turnpike Acts Continuance (Ireland); Union Charges Continuance; Holyhead Harbours; Dublin Carriage; Linen, &c. Manufactures (Ireland).

LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) BILLS.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he had a question to put to the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) of which he had not given him notice, as the circumstance to which it related had only come to his knowledge within the last hour; but as the matter was of very considerable importance, he trusted the noble Duke would excuse his alluding to it. It might be in the recollection of their Lordships, that various Bills had been introduced in that and the other House of Parliament by the Government and by private individuals, with a view of settling the much-vexed question of the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland. Those Bills were referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships for consideration. In that Committee, after much time and labour had been expended on the work, two measures were elaborated, which were for the most part identical with the measure introduced by the noble Duke. The third reading of these Bills was moved by the noble Duke the Lord Privy Seal (the Duke of Argyll); they were passed and sent down to the other House of Parliament. He had been informed, however, that notwithstanding that circumstance, Her Majesty's Government in the other House had distinctly denied that they were responsible for these measures, and that they had accordingly thrown the onus of carrying them through upon private Members; but he was still more surprised to hear it announced that there was no intention of proceeding with them at all during the present Session. Now, he did hope that when so large a number of their Lordships' House had been put to the trouble and inconvenience of attending the most laborious Committee which had elaborated the two Bills, Government would have kept faith with their Lordships; and at the same time he did hope that the Government would have assumed the full responsibility of carrying them through. He therefore wished to know from the noble Duke, whether it was a fact that the Bills were not to be proceeded with this Session.

VOL. CXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he had only just heard of the withdrawal of the Bills alluded to by the noble Earl, from the noble Marquess sitting opposite to him (the Marquess of Bath), and he consequently had had no opportunity of conferring with any of the Members of the Government in the other House of Parliament as to the circumstances connected with it. He supposed, however, it had taken place at the morning sitting of that day. However, he would of course make himself fully acquainted with all the causes which had led to the adoption of that course, and he should take care to inform the noble Earl what had induced the Government to act as it had done. All he knew of the matter was, that it had always been intended, if the circumstances of the Session allowed, to carry the Bills through this year. The noble Earl must be aware, however, from the experience of their Lordships' House—and the rule would apply with much greater force in the case of the lower House—how easy it was to delay the passing of a measure if only a few persons were bent on opposing it; and as it would appear that the two Bills in question were threatened with such an opposition in the other House, it might have been found impossible to get them through during what remained of the present Session. As to the Government being responsible for the conduct of the Bills, all he could say was, that the Government were not parties to framing the Bills in any way. The Bills were not party Bills, and had not been looked upon as such; but though, technically speaking, they might not be Government Bills, there was no doubt that Government had adopted them in their essence. They were introduced by the law officers of the late Government, were then taken up by the Members of the present Government, and in an altered shape came before their Lordships' House, when they were referred to a Select Committee, of which the noble Duke the Lord Privy Seal was Chairman. He was quite sure that there was no unfair repudiation of the Bills intended by the Government; and though he could not as yet say under what circumstances the Bills had been withdrawn, he was quite satisfied that that course had not been adopted from any dislike entertained by the Government to the character of the measures.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, as a Member of the Select Committee which had elaborated the two measures referred to by the noble Earl, and as one who had taken a prominent part in the discussions of last Session, when the subject was brought before their Lordships, he could not help expressing his sincere surprise and deep regret at the course which Her Majesty's Government intended to take; at the same time he readily acknowledged the noble Duke was justified in deprecating any further discussion at the present moment in reference to this topic, as he certainly appeared not to have had an opportunity of possessing himself of the necessary details. But at the same time he could not help saying how strange it was that a Member of the Cabinet, and he too a Secretary of State, should not have known what were the intentions of the Government upon so important a matter until the last five minutes. He would ask their Lordships, was it not a subject for most legitimate and natural surprise that the abandonment of a number of most material Bills should have been decided on, and yet that the noble Duke, whose peculiar measures they might be considered to be, was obliged to tell them that he was able to give no information as to the causes of such a proceeding? However, he judged the matter of so much importance—important, not merely in its relation to the loss of the measures in question, but as involving the conduct, not merely of the present Administration, but of all Governments, towards their Lordships House—that it was his intention to bring the subject formally before them on Thursday next. He certainly understood that the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll), who had acted as Chairman of the Select Committee, had spoken in the name of the Government, and under authority, when he told the Committee that the Government would interest itself in the passing of the measures through the House of Commons. He was, therefore, much surprised at hearing the Bills were about to be withdrawn without any apparent reason, and he could not help contrasting the conduct evinced by the noble Duke last year—when, within seven or eight days of the termination of the Session, he peremptorily charged their Lordships with the duty of passing the Bills—nay, even insisting with impetuosity upon the necessity of their doing so—with the fact of his Colleagues, with a month or six weeks of this Session still before them, suddenly throwing up these Bills. Although, therefore, he could not expect the noble Duke to give any further reply upon the present occasion, he found it necessary to give notice, that on Thursday next he should again invite their Lordships' attention to the subject, when he hoped he might count on the presence of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), who acted as Chairman of the Select Committee.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY BILL.

Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Amendments read.

VISCOUNT CANNING moved, That the said Report be now received.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that he wished to address a few words to their Lordships upon this stage of the Oxford University Bill. Their Lordships were aware that it was not the practice in their Lordships' House to place upon record any Amendments that might be moved upon Bills in the stage of this present measure unless they were agreed to. As, however, he was extremely anxious, not only on his own part, but also on the part of his noble Friend the Chancellor of the University of Oxford, who was not now present, that those Amendments which he had proposed should stand upon the records of their Lordships' House, he was induced to take the present course with the view of obtaining that object. He felt he would be consulting their Lordships' convenience by at once stating that he merely wished to be printed, and laid before their Lordships, those Amendments which had been moved by his noble Friend the Chancellor of the University of Oxford, in order that they might be duly placed upon the records of their proceedings. He, however, felt that he could not part with this Bill without expressing his regret that their Lordships should have adopted it without any of the Amendments that had been submitted to them by his noble Friend. He trusted that, in another place, where much attention and a great deal of time had been given to the consideration of the question, the Bill would be so amended as to meet at least some of the views which their Lordships on his side of the House entertained in respect to its provisions. He would occupy the time of the House but for a few moments, while he referred to the most important of those Amendments upon which their Lordships divided last Friday. In respect to the first of those Amendments, upon the question of the oaths taken by persons connected with the University, he must express his regret that some of the right rev. Prelates had not deemed it of sufficient importance to favour the House with their opinions upon the subject, involving as it did matter of conscience—he was certainly anxious to hear from them whether they thought that an Act of Parliament could relieve a man from the obligation of an oath he had once taken. He would not trespass upon the attention of the House by dwelling any further upon that point. Another Amendment moved by his noble Friend was to omit the sixth clause for the purpose of inserting another in its place, to the effect that the election of the legislative body of the University should take place by the votes of Convocation instead of Congregation. Although their Lordships were pleased to reject that Amendment, he hoped that in another place the subject would be reconsidered, because he conceived that no accident could happen to the scheme of liberalising, as it was called, the University, so fatal to that object, as the course which the majority of that House had taken in respect to this Amendment. The noble Viscount who introduced the Bill (Viscount Canning) had argued that the University was not doing its duties efficiently; that it was behind the age, and had not kept pace with the general advance of enlightenment and improvement which characterised other similar institutions. Now, what was the course usually adopted when it was deemed desirable to liberalise constituencies? Why, they naturally sought to extend those constituencies. Their Lordships had, however, in the present instance deliberately preferred to leave the election of the legislative body of the University in the hands of some 250 or 300 members, instead of extending the constituency to some 2,000 to 3,000 persons. He confessed he was at a loss to see the value or consistency of this proceeding; for it seemed to him to be a contradiction, considering the preamble of the Bill, and the constant complaints they heard of the bigotry and darkness of Oxford, to confine the constituency to this small number when they might extend it to as many thousands. Now, in respect to the question of private halls for the students—the more he considered the subject—the more he reflected upon the character and constitution of the University and the discipline that was required there, the more he was convinced that the provision for the establishment of those private halls would be attended with the most mischievous results, both as regarded the morals of the University, and the students within its walls. He knew that a great many of their Lordships were prepared to vote for and to support the Government in regard to the clauses which would admit Dissenters to the University, if the clause in respect to the halls were rejected. He had never concealed his opinion as to those halls. To use the words of the Earl of Carlisle the other evening, he believed they would be “retreats for Dissenters.” He should be sorry if his feelings towards the Dissenters should be misunderstood. In his opinion, there was no arrogance so objectionable as the arrogance of religious orthodoxy. There was nothing which so shocked him in private life as when he saw a man presumptuously stating that he was right, and that all who held different views were wrong; and he was more disgusted when he heard this said on subjects of religious doctrine and conscience than on any others. In respect to Dissenters, and those others who differed from him in religious opinions, he had always held that they were entitled to be treated upon a footing of equality with himself. He flattered himself that in his own humble and private way he had set an example of this principle. He had been frequently remonstrated with by ministers of the Church of England for not being more exclusive in his dealings, in the employment of his labourers, and the selection of his tenantry; he had always positively refused to adopt any such principle, for he thought that no such differences should exist in private life or upon private business. But this was a peculiar case. In his view the establishment of the University of Oxford was originally intended to be wedded, and closely wedded, to our Church and State. And although he was aware that it had received many endowments from Roman Catholics, and that the University had for centuries existed under the will and by the funds of Roman Catholics, he recollected,

too, that during that time the Roman Catholic religion was the State religion, and it ceased only to be the State religion when the Reformation was accomplished. The law then changed the nature of the case, and the Reformed religion became the State religion, and he saw no reason why after eight centuries we should alter the recognised character and constitution of the University in connection with the Church that was established by the State. Now, one or two things he thought must necessarily happen upon the admission of Dissenters to the University. First, it could hardly be expected that the number of Dissenters admitted to the University would remain exactly the same within its walls; they would either convert the members of the Church, or they would be converted by those members. The noble Duke opposite thought it would be more likely that the Dissenters would be converted by the members of the Anglican Church. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) was not prepared to agree with the noble Duke that the Dissenters would necessarily have the worst of the trial, if worst it could be called. They must remember that by the Bill any member of Convocation might establish there a hall, if licensed. [Lord CAMPBELL was understood to intimate that it was at the discretion of the Vice Chancellor.] Now, he was almost disposed to consider his noble and learned Friend, while presiding in his court, as infallible; but he must be excused for saying that he had no such high opinion of his judgment in that House. It appeared by this Bill that the Vice Chancellor had no choice, if the party agree to certain conditions mentioned in the Bill, than to give him a licence for the establishment of a private hall. He did not think he was acting offensively in mentioning the name of Dr. Newman in relation to his argument. During a considerable part of the time Dr. Newman was in Oxford, if this Bill were then in operation, he would have been in a position to claim a right to establish a hall. Their Lordships might easily guess what the consequences would have been. They know that Dr. Newman did not all at once become a convert; he was for some years gradually descending from the position in which he originally stood, and accepting the creeds of another Church. Dr. Newman's great object at that time was to convert to his own religious opinions as many as he could. Well, then, supposing that the Doctor was at the head of one of those halls, he would naturally have the greatest influence over the religious opinions of the students that frequented it. There was another strong argument against the establishment of these halls—he referred to the encouragement that would be given to religious disputes. He could conceive nothing more obnoxious than this in an University. For the last ten or twelve years, up to a very recent period, Oxford had been the scene of religious disputes and theological discussions. Young men of the age usually attending the University were sufficiently presumptuous and argumentative of themselves, and the introduction of religious discussion could not but be attended with prejudicial results. This was no fancy of his. Let their Lordships remember what had taken place at Oxford within no very distant period, when every private room and association was the arena of controversies about doctrines that were bandied from one side to the other with more zeal than discretion and more passion than knowledge. Now, he asked, whether it was not more likely that these angry religious discussions would be greatly increased by the admission into the University of the champions of the Roman Catholic and of the Dissenting Churches who would be admitted into the same room, and the same society, with the members of the Church of England—and would not these private halls afford great facilities for these disputations? He conceived that there was nothing less desirable in the University of Oxford than the adoption of any measure that would give encouragement to such disputes. The life of a student at Oxford tended greatly to encourage the spirit of controversy. The students there had not the same occupation or amusements which young men in other large towns could command; and he could conceive nothing more natural than that young men should rush into those argumentative disputes upon religion which had lately brought so much evil upon the country, and so much scandal upon the Church. His noble Friend opposite said that the admission of Dissenters into the Scotch schools connected with the Church was attended with no such evils as had been referred to. He denied that there was the slightest analogy between the Scotch schools and the University. In the first place the Scotch schools were not bound up as the University of Oxford had been for centuries with the State religion; and, in the second place, the students in the Scotch schools were of a much younger age generally than those that were to be found in the Universities. Most anxious that his feelings with respect to the Dissenters and Roman Catholics should not be misunderstood, he trusted he had explained, clearly and distinctly, on what grounds, and on what grounds alone, he objected to their admission to the University; and he further must express his hope that when the Bill had left their Lordships' House some parts of it to which he entertained objection would be revised in another place.

EARL DELAWARR was anxious to express, in a very few words, his decided opposition to this Bill, as a measure which was based upon injustice, and was likely to introduce discord where peace and harmony had formerly prevailed. He regretted deeply the manner in which the measure had been dealt with. In passing through the other House of Parliament, the Bill had been modified in several material particulars and with respect to some of its most objectionable provisions, and deeply did he regret to find that in passing through their Lordships' House, not only had every attempt at further improvement been successfully resisted, but it had been actually reinvested with much of that mischievous character of which the decisions of the House of Commons had partially deprived it. But if he had before objected to the measure, his objections had been materially strengthened by what he had heard in that House. The private halls which it was proposed to establish had been spoken of by a noble Earl, the other night, as likely to become retreats for Dissenters; and if it had been correctly assumed with respect to the students in those halls that they would not be required to attend the chapel worship, it would follow, as a necessary consequence, that they would not be able to enforce attendance on the divinity lectures of the University; and, in that case, what became of the protestations of noble Lords and right rev. Prelates opposite, that nothing would induce them to introduce anything which would in any way involve a departure upon the part of the University from her standard of teaching and doctrine? With respect to the expenses of education in private halls, much of what had been said was based upon fallacy and delusion. He held in his hand a statement, with which he would not trouble their Lordships, but which showed incontrovertibly that the necessary expenses in these new institutions must be greater than they were in the colleges, and that, taking the very lowest estimate, they could not be less than 21*l.* per term in the former case, as against 15*l.* in the latter. He could not but consider that there lurked in the present measure a desire to impair that close connection between the University and the established religion of the country, by which it had been hitherto so prominently distinguished, and which had caused it to be considered, not only in England, but throughout the civilised world, as the great bulwark of our Constitution in Church and State. Feeling so strongly as he did upon this subject, he deeply regretted that those right rev. Prelates who ought to have thrown their shields around the University had paired with those who had attacked its rights and privileges.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that he totally dissented from those provisions in the abstract which provided for the admission of Dissenters, and had consented to the Amendment, not because it involved his own views, but because it amounted to a mitigation of the evil. He objected to those provisions because they had formed no part of the original measure, and had no original connection with it, and because he considered it at variance with the permissive character of the Bill. But, beyond this, by the early clauses of the Bill, the Government had proceeded to frame a constitution which he admitted to be wise, and sound, and rational—which, upon their own hypothesis, was likely to work well, and had all the elements of reformation—and yet, before that constitution had been set at work, they virtually asserted that they could repose no confidence in the governing body they had created, and acted as though no new constitution were in existence, and as though the old Hebdomadal Board were still in force. But although they had admitted Dissenters to the University, and had relieved them of tests and subscriptions, they had not advanced them one iota nearer to that which they sought, which was, not a separate existence in private halls, but the equality of collegiate life; and this they could not give them, unless they gained the co-operation of the colleges. He looked upon the admission of the Dissenters, as effected by the present measure, as a mitigation of an evil which would have been incomparably worse had they been admitted to the government of the University. He would be the first to object to any penal restrictions, but he maintained that this was a question, not so much of the admission of Dissenters to the University as of the exclusion of the Church of England—a question of disqualifying the University for the education of members of the Church. That which was asked for was more than toleration; and if it were an act of generosity upon the part of Parliament towards one class, it was an act of generosity done at the expense of another. If it were summum jus it was also summa injuria; and if the effort should be crowned with success, he thought that the results were less likely to be peace and harmony than disorder and disunion. He could not forget that the Church of England was bound up with the University in all its associations; that it had followed that Church through evil report and good report, and was its organ and exponent in the great matter of education; and it seemed to him inevitable that if this policy were to be pursued further, its tendency must be to force the members of the Church of England to seek repose in other quarters, and to drive them into other institutions, as free as possible from Government control.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he was anxious to explain the vote he had given on a former occasion. He trusted that no one could imagine that he had voted against the establishment of private halls from apprehending any dangerous influence resulting from the admission of Dissenters; on the contrary, there was no portion of the Bill to which he attached so much importance as that which provided for the admission of Dissenters, because he believed that their admission would conduce to the interests of the University, to the interests of the Church, and to the interests of the great Dissenting bodies themselves. He believed, however, that to admit them at all with any hope of a beneficial result, they must admit them generously, and without any feelings of mistrust, upon the very terms of which his noble Friend was most apprehensive—upon terms of perfect equality. They would neither do justice to their own intentions nor make their legislation operative for good, if they intended to admit Dissenters upon terms which were unbecoming and unjust. He could not think that their unreserved admission would do any mischief to the Church or to the University. He felt that he might speak with authority much higher than his own upon this point, because, as long back as the year 1834, he had presented to the other House of Parliament a petition in favour of the admission of Dissenters to the University, which was signed by four of the most distinguished members of the episcopacy of this country, and by some of the most distinguished members of the University, by the Archbishop of York, Bishop Thirlwall, the late exalted Bishop Bousfield, the Dean of Ely, the Astronomer Royal (Professor Airey), and many others equally known to Europe. Earl Grey had presented at the same time a similar petition to this House. He was entitled, therefore, to say, on the authority of those great men, that the admission of Dissenters would do no mischief whatever to the University. This petition simply entreated Parliament to allow the admission of Dissenters to the University. There was no question at that time of admitting Dissenters into a position which might be considered by themselves—or which might ultimately be understood by others, although not intended by those by whom the present Bill was proposed—to be degrading, unfavourable, or unequal; he thought that, unless they admitted the Dissenters upon terms which, as being just, ought to satisfy them, they had better not admit them at all. But if there were danger to the Church—which he denied if they dealt with this matter rightly—he thought that that danger would be created and carried to its greatest height if the Dissenters in the University were to be admitted on terms of inferiority, formed into small confederacies through the agency of these private halls, and cut off from communion and companionship with the undergraduate members of the Church who might be pursuing their education at the Universities. His noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Carnarvon) seemed to think that the admission of Dissenters was inconsistent with the principle—which he (Lord Monteaigle) advocated as strongly as his noble Friend—of preserving the government of the colleges to the Church of England. But was it impossible to obtain this object without abandoning the other? It was not impossible to obtain it, unless, indeed, we were to assume that the Universities of England and the people of England were much less moderate, much less calm, much more likely to be excited by the violence of religious faction, than the Universities and the people of Ireland. From the year 1793 Roman Catholics and Dissenters had been admitted to the University of Dublin, and what had been the effect? Had it deranged in any degree the government of that University? Had it made the University less attached to the Church, or less effective as a school for the education of its members and ministers, than it would have been if the Roman Catholics and Dissenters had never been admitted? He had heard many charges against the University of Dublin, but he had never yet heard it alleged against her that she was not sufficiently orthodox to satisfy the desires even of the most orthodox among their Lordships. Well, then, if that were so, why could they not boldly effect at Oxford what had been already done at Dublin, and at once admit Dissenters frankly and freely—not into places which had been called “retreats,” in which it is to be presumed they were to lurk and conceal themselves—but admit them in the open day to the full benefit of the education of the place, and allow them to take degrees in common with all other persons who received their education at that University? What was the object of these halls, and to what would their establishment lead? Were there not dangers to be apprehended intra muros et extra? Were there not persons now members of Convocation, who, under the provisions of this Bill, might set up schools or establishments of their own, under the name of private halls, in which something worse might be taught than any Dissenter would be likely to introduce? Might not undergraduates be taught to desert the doctrines, and yet adhere to the ordinances, of our Church under a false allegiance. It was said that there was power to refuse a licence for the establishment of a hall to any member of Convocation who might apply for it. But, as he read the Bill, it was obligatory on the authorities of the University to grant such a licence. He would take one case as an example. Mr. Newman, he believed, was at this moment a member of Convocation, and if he should apply for a licence for the establishment of a hall at Oxford, could he be refused, or had he a right to claim his admission? As he read the clause he must be admitted, because the only qualification prescribed was, that the applicant should be a member of Convocation. His great objection, however, to these private halls did not rest upon the possibility of a case of this kind occurring, but upon the fact that, by establishing these halls contemporaneously with the admission of Dissenters, they were practically proclaiming to Dissenters that they might enter these halls, but that these were the only places of education at Oxford into which they would be allowed to enter. He thought this would be objectionable to Dissenters, and dangerous to the Church and to the University, because it would draw a distinction between two classes, one belonging to the ancient colleges, and the other to these new halls, and with such a distinction, founded, as it would be, on religious grounds, they never could expect to see cordiality and good fellowship established. On the other hand, if they adopted the system of the University of Dublin, frankly admitting all to degrees, without admitting Dissenters to the government of the colleges, or of the University—he did not ask for that—they would be taking a course which, he ventured to say, would be safe to the University, a welcome concession to the Dissenters, and beneficial in every way to all classes in the State.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he could not assent to the parallel which the noble Lord had drawn between the Universities of Oxford and Dublin. Dublin was rather an examining University than a place of education; for, if he remembered rightly, a student might reside anywhere, at the Giant's Causeway if he pleased, and only need come up to Dublin twice a year in order to pass his examination.

VISCOUNT CANNING said, that although he was not prepared for such a discussion as the present—for he thought the objections raised went to the principle of the Bill, and would have been made more properly upon the second reading—he was by no means disposed to complain that the speeches which they had heard had been delayed until that night, because, if his noble Friends opposite had made on Thursday night the observations which they had made to-night, they would scarcely have had any possibility of escape from dividing against the second reading. He would confine himself to making a few observations upon some of the points which had been touched upon by the noble Lords who had spoken. He thought that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury), who had charged against this Bill that it was an illiberal rather than a liberal measure, could scarcely have appreciated all that this Bill would effect for the benefit of the University of Oxford, and all that it would enable the University to effect for itself. That could not certainly be said to be an illiberal measure which took the government of an institution like the University out of the hands of a few men, elected for the government of their own particular societies—elected without any regard to their qualifications in reference to the University at large—holding their offices for life, and being irremovable—whose interests were frequently separate, and in many instances directly at variance from those of the persons whom they were called upon to govern. A government of that kind could not be called liberal, and could hardly be expected to produce good fruits. It was because they were deeply impressed with this consideration, that Her Majesty's Government had determined to lay the axe to the root of the evil, and to establish a principle of government which could not be characterised as illiberal—namely, a government based upon representation. His noble Friend complained that power had been taken out of the hands of the great mass of the University body in Convocation, and placed in the hands of Congregation, which was a smaller body, to the exclusion of the larger. But his noble Friend had fallen into some misapprehension with respect to the precise character of the body which he called a legislative body, created by a constituency of small numbers. He did not admit that the Hebdomadal Council was by any means correctly designated a legislative body. The legislation of the University was by no means concentrated in its hands. It would originate measures no doubt; but those measures would be subject to revision and rejection by Congregation, and Convocation would have the same power as it had had hitherto, of placing a veto upon any measure which it might think would not be advantageous to the University. The most important point on which the noble Earl had touched was that which related to private halls, and he objected to the proposed change as inconsistent with the constitution of the University, which had endured for 800 or 900 years, and had deprecated interfering with institutions so venerable. Now, he (Viscount Canning) could conceive no stronger reason, a priori, for reconsidering those institutions. Could his noble Friend put his finger on any one of our institutions—political, social, or religious—which had existed for anything like that time, and had not undergone great and important changes? The noble Earl had not stated the point with regard to the power of withholding licences with complete accuracy. He had stated that the Vice Chancellor would have no power to refuse a licence, if claimed by a person possessing certain qualifications. He (Viscount Canining) gave no opinion upon that point, but he wished to remind their Lordships that the University was not only authorised, but obliged, to prescribe what qualifications should be required, and what should be the conditions upon which alone the licence should be given. He did not desire to be understood as wishing that the University should act otherwise than liberally in fulfilling this obligation; but she would be perfectly mistress of her own position, and whatever qualifications or conditions she thought proper to lay down could not be barred or checked by any other authority. Dr. Newman had been referred to, and a suggestion had been made as to what might have happened if Dr. Newman had applied for a licence as master of a private hall. He supposed his noble Friend referred to the time when Dr. Newman was still a member of the Church of England, and resident, more or less, at Oxford. But surely his noble Friend would see that if it should be the pleasure of the University to leave any discretion to the Vice Chancellor who was to issue these licences—or if, in anticipation of such dangers as his noble Friend had had in his eye, it should make it necessary that the master should make a declaration of conformity with the Church of England—in any terms which the University might think proper to lay down—such conditions, framed in a cautious spirit, might surely meet the case of Dr. Newman, even at the time to which his noble Friend referred. He really did not see how the clauses relating to private halls, in connection with those relating to Dissenters, could with any justice, be considered as divorcing the University from its connection with the Church, or as likely to import into it polemical disputes. In the first place, the connection between the Church and the University, so far as it existed through the colleges, was altogether untouched by this Bill, and there was no intention on the part of the framers of the Bill to require the governing bodies of colleges to make any departure from the strictest rules of discipline and teaching which they might think best adapted to secure connection between the Church and the University in its full integrity. It was conceded on all sides that the number of Dissenters who would be admitted would, probably, be comparatively small, and he did not think their admission at all likely to increase that warfare of opinion on matters of faith which had existed whilst the University was wholly closed against Dissenters. He doubted very much whether opening the door to a certain number of such members, who would pursue their studies and mix in habits of intimacy and friendship with members of different religious opinions, would have any tendency to increase at all the asperity or animosity with which questions of faith were now discussed; he was, on the contrary, much inclined to think that a larger difference of opinion, differences more openly avowed than those which existed between members of the same Church, would have a tendency to soften those feelings of variance, rather than to exasperate them. He cordially concurred in the wish expressed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) with regard to the manner in which this change should have been effected. It would have given him much more satisfaction if it had been brought about by the free agency of the University itself, rather than by the intervention of an Act of Parliament; but he had explained at some length on a former occasion how it was these clauses now stood in the Bill. He explained how it had been the wish of Her Majesty's Government, to which they had openly and steadfastly adhered, that the proposal should have come from the University, and it was not until the other House had declared the contrary that they could bring themselves to deal with the question of Dissenters in this Bill at all. These clauses were, however, inserted, and he hoped he should not be considered as using any argument unworthy for their Lordships to hear or for himself to express, though he knew it was liable to some misrepresentation, when he said that, as the other House had asserted by a large majority so decided an opinion, he earnestly trusted their Lordships would not endeavour to expunge these clauses, though fully entitled to do so. He did not urge that so much on account of the feeling of the other House of Parliament as for the sake of the University, for he conceived nothing could be more disastrous to the University than to leave it uncertain as to the opinion of Parliament—assured that in one House the opinion in favour of the admission of Dissenters was strong, decided, and unmistakable, and doubtful if in the other that opinion or a contrary one was entertained. To place the University in such a position would be to cramp all exercise of freedom on the subject, and, in fact, to transfer the scene of contention from within the walls of Parliament to the University itself. Feeling as he did, that if the hands of the University had been untied she would have taken this step on her own part, he earnestly deprecated any attempt to go back to the condition in which they were when this Bill was introduced, because he thought that the real intentions of the University could not then be carried out in consequence of the course which had already been taken in Parliament.

LORD WYNFORD said, he would anticipate one great difficulty, which he did not see that the Bill would obviate. One of the most important parts of examination at Oxford was the divinity examination, and whether an undergraduate went in for the highest honours, or only an ordinary degree, the same extent of religious knowledge was exacted. Every person was required to possess, besides a knowledge of the Greek Testament, an accurate knowledge of the Thirty-nine Articles, and to be able to support that knowledge by texts from Scripture, and by his own reasoning. Such an examination, he considered, involved to a certain extent a profession of belief; and he did not see how the difficulty could be reconciled unless they exempted Dissenters from that part of the examination.

On Question, agreed to; Amendments reported accordingly; Amendments made.

On Clause 17 (Regulating the composition of Congregation).

LORD WROTTESELEY rose to propose an Amendment to that part of the clause which enacted that Congregation should consist, in addition to the persons specifically named, of "all such persons as shall be provided to be added by election or otherwise to the said Congregation by any Statute of the University approved by the Commissioners, or, after the expiry of the Commission, passed by licence of the Crown." The Amendment was to insert after the word "Crown" the following words:—"Provided that at least two-thirds of the persons so to be added shall be such as have attained high honours in the said University, or such as are distinguished in literature, science, or art." The principal object which he hoped to accomplish by the adoption of the Amendment was the encouragement of the study of physical science at the University. When he was at Oxford this branch of study was at a low ebb, and he believed it had not made much progress since. Nevertheless, it was a study of the greatest importance at the present day. In proof of this he would quote a passage from the evidence of Mr. Lowe, the Member for Kidderminster:

"I must also," says Mr. Lowe, "as a sincere well-wisher to the University, express my hope that the physical sciences will be brought much more prominently forward in the scheme of University education. I have seen in Australia Oxford men placed in positions in which they had reason bitterly to regret that their costly education, while making them intimately acquainted with remote events and distant nations, had left them in utter ignorance of the laws of nature, and placed them under immense disadvantages in that struggle with her which they had to maintain."

The residents of Oxford lead a life of too much seclusion, and, therefore, he availed himself of the opportunity which this clause afforded of infusing what he might call a metropolitan element into the Congregation. The proposal which the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) made on a former evening to substitute Convocation for Congregation was not, in his opinion, judicious, because the great body of Convocation consisted of country clergymen, who knew much less about these matters than the Oxford residents; but the composition of the Congregation would be much improved by persons of the class pointed to in the Amendment. The phrase "high honours" employed in the Amendment was well understood in the University; but if any doubt prevailed on the subject, different words might be adopted to make the meaning clear. In framing the ruling body of the greatest educational institution in the country, Parliament ought to recognise the claims of education. The names of such men as Mr. Hallam and Sir Charles Lyell would confer honour on the body to which they might be attached. It was not, of course, to be supposed that these eminent men would be able to attend the meetings of the Congregation generally; but it was probable that they would be able to attend meetings for determining questions connected with studies and the appointment of professors; and their presence on such occasions would be of the greatest possible advantage, in consequence of their living in the world and being cognisant of the state of public opinion and of education at the present time. Whatever might be the result of his Motion, he could not regret having had the opportunity of advocating the extension of physical education, and he would at all times gladly lend a helping hand to improve an institution in which he must ever take a lively and enduring interest.

VISCOUNT CANNING said, the tying the hands of the University was entirely contrary to the whole spirit in which the Bill was framed. There was great difficulty also in describing accurately the precise meaning of what they had in their minds. The expression used in the noble Lord's Amendment was, "such as have attained high honours." Now he could easily conceive the case of a double second-class man, who, perhaps, not aiming at honours, had been invited subsequently to continue his examination. He believed they might, with perfect safety, leave the University free and unrestrained, confident that the object of the noble Lord's proposal, in which the Government sympathised, would be attained.

Amendment negatived.

THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER suggested that a preliminary examination for students entering the University would have a good effect on the schools where the youths of the middle and upper classes were educated, and tend to remove the great difficulty at Oxford, the inefficiency of the previous training of the undergraduates.

On Clause 28,

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that before their Lordships passed the 28th clause he wished to make an explanation with regard to an argument which he used upon the clause in Committee. Their Lordships would remember that upon that occasion he argued in favour of giving power to the colleges to convert their class fellowships into exhibitions, and maintained that those fellowships did not give so much encouragement to the schools with which they were connected as the same amount of endowment would give if thrown into the form of exhibitions. In urging that argument upon their Lordships he alluded to the case of the Abingdon School and Pembroke College; but the report of what he then addressed to their Lordships had been much misunderstood by a party greatly interested in that report. The Master of the Abingdon School felt himself aggrieved, because he understood from the report that the present state of the school was spoken of as being depressed and abject. That, however, was not what he said. What he was urging upon their Lordships at the time was, that the Abingdon School was a good example of the little encouragement which close fellowships give to the school itself; but he was not alluding to the present condition of the school, because he knew that the Abingdon School had lately had the advantage of an active master, who had done a great deal to raise its character. He was referring to the state of the school a few years ago, when, with all the advantages of its close fellowships, it was reduced to nine scholars, not having one single boarder among them. Therefore, his argument was conclusive; but he did not mean to say what the reverend gentleman had understood him to say, that the Abingdon School was at the present time in a state which would prevent parents sending their children to it; he knew, indeed, that the present master had made great efforts to improve the condition of the school, and with very considerable expense.

VISCOUNT CANNING said, that he had received a letter from the Bishop of Exeter with reference to the published report of what he had said while discussing the 28th clause upon a former occasion. The Bishop stated that he was reported to have said, with regard to the case of Exeter College, that the bishop of the diocese as visitor had refused his assent to any change in the Statutes of the college. If he did use those words, which he certainly was inclined to think he did not use, it was not right to have done so, because he was fully aware that the Bishop of Exeter had, upon many very important points, assented to suggestions made to him by the authorities of Exeter College. But he was also aware—which, indeed, the Bishop stated in his letter—that upon other points he had either delayed or refused his assent to the suggestions of the college; and accordingly he did cite the case of Exeter College and its visitor, because in replying to Lord Derby, who pressed upon him very strongly the propriety of requiring the consent of the visitor to any step taken towards the improvement of the college, he argued that that would be a very doubtful benefit to the college itself, inasmuch as, if the consent of the visitor was necessary, and if the visitor upon any point should refuse his consent to a proposed change, the consequence would be that the college would by that refusal at once lapse into the hands of the Commissioners, and, instead of being at liberty to deal with its own affairs upon its own rules, would pass over to the judgment of the Commissioners acting upon theirs.

Upon the 43rd clause (providing that no oath should be necessary on taking a degree, save the oath of allegiance),

LORD WROTTESELEY moved the following addition to the clause—

“But such degree shall not as such constitute any qualification for the holding of any office which has been heretofore always held by a member of the Church of England, and for which such degree in the said University has heretofore constituted one of the qualifications, until the person obtaining such degree shall have subscribed a declaration before a magistrate testifying that he is a member of such Church.”

LORD REDESDALE said, that the intention of the proposed addition was very good, and one in which he entirely concurred.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought that the effect of the Amendment would be to make the clause more stringent, which he was sure was not the object their Lordships had in view.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD suggested that the 43rd clause should be omitted altogether, and the following substituted—

“Such a degree shall not constitute any qualification for the holding of any office which has been heretofore always held by a member of the Church of England, unless the person on taking his degree shall have made the declaration now prescribed by law.”

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER thought that the clause suggested by the right rev. Prelate would be more stringent than that in the Bill as it now stood.

LORD WROTTESELEY said, he would not press his Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Further Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

THE CENSUS OF 1851—RELIGIOUS WORSHIP.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD rose to move for the production of the documents of which he had given notice, namely, the details on which the returns of the Religious Census had been founded. At the time of the taking of the last Census in 1851, certain papers were sent round in order to obtain information relating to the religious worship of the population. Objections were taken by him (the Bishop of Oxford) in their Lordships' House to the sending round of those papers, on the ground that it was beyond the power vested in the Secretary of State; and he had subsequently taken occasion to point out the evils which he thought would be likely to arise from papers of that important nature being circulated, without there being any power to compel the information required to be sent in. He had pointed out that those returns must be entirely dependent on the good-will of those who were expected to furnish them, and that there must necessarily be a risk of mistakes, and even deception, occurring in them. The returns, however, were made in the manner originally proposed, and were now published, embodied in a general statement issued from the Registrar General's Office, as part of the results of the Census of 1851. This statement certainly did infinite credit to the gentleman who had drawn it up, and he had evidently applied himself to his very difficult task with a determination to do his best by it. He was very far from undervaluing the result of this gentleman's labours; but he thought it must be allowed that a great public document such as this had become, which professed to fix the relative number of the members of the Established Church and of those dissenting from it throughout England and Wales, in proportion to its importance ought also to be accurate, and that to spread inaccurate statements on such a subject would be a fertile source of many evils. This Census of Religious Worship had been referred to and used in that manner, and that marked the exceeding importance that such documents, if they came at all stamped with the weight of public authority, should be accurate, and not misleading documents. He had no complaint whatever to make of the Office of the Registrar General; the gentlemen employed showed no want of care on their part in making the returns; but the fault was to be traced to the returns which were given to them as the data on which the public returns were to be founded by those who furnished the subject-matter of the reports—namely, the clergy of the Established Church and the ministers of the different Dissenting bodies. With respect to the clergy, many of them refused to send in any returns; and the consequence was, that applications were obliged to be made to the churchwardens, or any other person who could assist in the matter, or take any trouble about it.

Viscount Canning

For this reason the numbers given in the official documents as purporting to belong to the Church of England were oftentimes very loosely put together, and considerably less than such numbers really were. In his own diocese, in which not a very great number of clergymen refused to send the return, he had desired that every clergyman should take the trouble, on several consecutive Sundays, to have the congregations numbered, and to send him the average of the congregations so numbered. The numbers in his diocese were 117,421 according to that enumeration; but in the same year the return of the Registrar General only gave the numbers at 98,410—a considerable difference. But the greatest mis-statements in the reports occurred, not from our own numbers being lessened, but from the numbers of the Dissenters of nearly all denominations being greatly exaggerated and set forth. He hoped that their Lordships would acquit him, in dealing with this subject, of any desire to speak uncharitably or in a spirit of undue disparagement of those connected with the great Dissenting bodies, for nothing could be further from his desire, and he could not feel otherwise than glad at heart at seeing that so many of those who did not worship in the church were engaged in the worship of God elsewhere; but the reason why he brought forward the subject of these returns was, that they were made use of to militate against the interest of the Church, and to give an unfair impression of what the numbers of persons belonging to the Church of England really were as compared to the Dissenting bodies. He had, therefore, taken the trouble to ascertain in detail how far the statement respecting the persons who attended worship in these places was accurate in this Census return, and he hoped their Lordships would not think there was any uncharitable feeling in his mind when he stated that the result showed that a great increase had been made in the returns to the real numbers of the Dissenters. He was by no means surprised that such errors should have been committed. Many of their ministers were not often in the same rank of life as the clergy of the Established Church. There was no doubt that in large Dissenting chapels in large towns the ministers were men of education, and he had no doubt that, if inquiries of this kind were addressed to them, their returns would be honestly made; but those inquiries were extended to very little places —to all the small licensed rooms in remote villages—to men who had not the advantages of education—and who were not the objects of general view and observation; and with regard to these he had no hesitation in saying there was continually a misrepresentation in point of fact as to the relative numbers of the members of the Established Church and of the Dissenters. He should give a few extracts to their Lordships from answers received by him to letters from different parts of the country, and as he had the name and address and character of the persons who had written each one of those letters, he was able, therefore, to give a verification of the statements contained in them. The statements were such as these:—in one parish the Dissenters filled their place of assembly on purpose to swell the numbers in the return; in another many attended in the evening who had been counted previously as belonging to a different Dissenting congregation; another correspondent was informed that the numbers of the Dissenters were much exaggerated; another said that a fair average was not given; in one parish almost all the Dissenters from the next parish attended, and vice versa, the services being held at different hours, and so they were counted twice over in both parishes. Again, special sermons were preached in a neighbourhood in all the meeting-houses, to attract congregations and swell the returns. Again, it was stated that the return respecting the Church was sent in by a Dissenter in a neighbouring town. Again, another writer had reason to believe that the same person attended the services of different denominations on the day of the enumeration. Another writer had reason to think that the Dissenters were particularly active on that day in requesting attendance at their conventicles. Again, it was stated that in some cases the meeting-houses could not hold the numbers that were returned except the congregation was composed of very small children. Again, it was stated that the return from the Wesleyans was greatly exaggerated, and that the Dissenters had filled their chapels by advertising popular preachers and withdrawing many of the children from the national schools on that day. Another writer stated that there were no efforts made as respected the Church, and that the unfavourable state of the weather had kept many persons who lived at a distance from attending at church on the Census Sunday, while the preachers at some of the Dissenting chapels had given notice that it was to be a trial of strength between the Church and the Dissenters, and the congregations were to muster in strength. That statement had particular reference to the Baptist and Independent chapels. Another writer said that some of them returned double the numbers the chapels would contain. Another person wrote to him that he had no doubt he was right about the Census; that the clergy were careless and indifferent about it, having no notice of the use to which the returns would be put, and looking upon many of the questions as impertinent or intrusive, and they either neglected them, or else had no means of giving an accurate statement, whereas the Dissenters were wide awake on the occasion. Another writer stated that the return was made in his locality by parties hostile to the Church. Another writer said that the particular person who made the return was so hostile to the Church that he would never come within it as secretary of a certain charitable body, though all the other members of the society attended. Another writer begged to express his conviction that the Census returns were really worth nothing; that in many instances there was no return of attendants made by the clergy, and that he found that three congregations of Dissenters in separate chapels consisted of the same persons. He (the Bishop of Oxford) had received many other statements of the same kind, and his object was to show their Lordships that returns obtained by this process could not be relied upon as being true statements of the relative numbers of the two bodies. There was an important fact to which he should call their Lordships' attention—namely, that in the Census returns themselves, for the town of Liverpool the number of sittings given for the Roman Catholics amounted to 8,806, while at the same time the number of attendants in one morning was represented to be 27,650. In Manchester there was the same disproportion, and in the parish of St. Giles's a still greater. In St. Giles's the return of sittings was 460, but the attendants were put down at 3,000. It appeared that 286 persons were put down as belonging to the Established Church for a whole union; whereas it was stated by a clergyman that he had returned 550 as attending his own single church in that union. The answer was, to thank him for pointing out the omission, and to state that the numbers attending at his church had been accidentally omitted. So that, in that case, the numbers should be 836 instead of 286—a very material difference, but certainly an accident that might happen in any case; and he did not attach any weight to it, or quote it to prove his case, except in this way, that they must see from it how useful detailed information would be in checking such errors. If they could get from the different parishes the returns sent up, or a considerable number of them, they would be able to apply to the allegations he made a rule or criterion, which was all they required. Whatever the truth was on this subject it ought to be told, and there should not go forth to the public, on mistaken facts, a statement as to the relations of the different religious bodies in this land. It should not go forth, except it was true, that it was an episcopal figure of speech to say what he said—that, thank God, the great majority of the people of this country do still belong to the Established Church.

Moved—

“That there be laid before the House the details of the Returns from which the Tables of Religious Worship, presented to the Houses of Parliament in reference to the Census of 1851, were prepared.”

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVIDS said, he was in a condition to confirm the statement of his right rev. Friend, though it was but very recently that his attention had been specially drawn to the subject. At the time of the last Census he had a conversation with the clergyman of a parish, who mentioned some practices that had come to his knowledge, which drew from him the observation that if such were the case, and if the returns were open to such abuses, he would very much have wished that the clergy of the Church of England should have declined making any return; for by doing so they were not assisting to ascertain truth, but were appearing to lend their countenance and sanction to that which was in the end an imposition on the public. Even supposing the returns had been correct, unless they were so guarded from abuses as to gain the general confidence of the country, they would fail in accomplishing their most important objects. With regard to the light in which the returns were considered by the clergy, a few letters he had lately received were quite sufficient to illustrate that part of the case. He found one of those clergymen stating that he really was not able to give certain information about the last Census, because, having taken no pains to inquire into the matter, from his experience of the manner in which similar returns had been obtained by the Dissenters on previous occasions, he considered the Census, as far as it related to the number present at each place of worship, a mere farce. In one case, where the return from a chapel stated that the numbers attending amounted to 2,000, it was found the largest number it could contain was 1,200. He found another clergyman stating that it was generally believed that the Dissenters had made excessive returns, and the belief was supported by two facts, the first being that the returns of persons attending the different chapels in many parishes exceed their whole population; and the second being that the same individuals were well known to have been counted two or three times over as attending the chapels of different denominations. It was stated also to be a general practice that where there were several chapels of different denominations, each having its Sunday School, they clubbed the Sunday Schools together to attend each of their services at different times of the day. In many places they offered a peculiar attraction to attend, to many Welsh congregations—namely, the public catechising of the children, which not only secured a large attendance of children, but a large addition to the ordinary congregation. There was another kind of malpractice which was a still wider departure from fair dealing, because he understood that the grossest mis-statements had slipped into the calculation of the numbers attending the schools. In his own neighbourhood he found it mentioned as a fact of general notoriety, that the numbers reported from particular Sunday Schools were two or three times as large as it was possible for the buildings to contain. Another instance which came from particularly good authority, also in his own neighbourhood, was an illustration of the same practice. In that case the Dissenting minister seemed, for some reason or other, not to have found himself competent to fill up the return himself, and requested the registrar to do it for him. He stated that his congregation was 400; and then came the question as to the number of sittings, which he very innocently stated to be between 150 and 200. The registrar begged he would explain how 400 persons could meet in a room that would contain but 200, and he confessed that that little circumstance had frequently escaped his attention, and he desired the registrar to put down 200 instead of 400. The practical conclusion, however, did not depend on particular instances of this kind. It was a sufficient objection to the present mode of taking the returns, that the clergy viewed them with distrust, or rather with the fullest conviction that they were, on the whole, gross misrepresentations of the real state of the case. He had not made these statements in an invidious sense, or with the view of disparaging the Dissenters, but they had no right to presume that any body of men were above temptation. They had no right to place the Dissenters in circumstances in which they were exposed to the strongest of all temptations, or to leave matters of this importance to rest on the discretion of persons who were deeply interested in putting forward a certain view of the case. He really would not say whether, under similar circumstances, if the clergy of the Church of England were to be placed in a similar condition, they would be superior to the like temptation. He should hope and wish to believe that they would, but really he could not, under such circumstances, answer for them any more than for any other body of men. It was unfair to the Dissenters themselves, and highly prejudicial to the public interest, to expose them to the temptation of making such misrepresentations. He thought with a view to the future it was perfectly clear those returns could never accomplish the object for which they were designed if they were made in the manner in which the last returns had been made, and he could not himself see how they were ever to guard against such misrepresentations. Any day which might be appointed for the taking of the Census would be sure to be considered by the Dissenting bodies as the occasion for a trial of strength, on which, by canvassing in private and holding out the greatest possible attraction in public, they would endeavour to make a grand demonstration of the growing success of their cause. If the same plan was to be adopted in future, he hoped that some check would be devised which would be an effectual security against the abuses and misrepresentations which had, he was convinced, been but very imperfectly disclosed by the statements which had been made to the House.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the right rev.

Prelate had most legitimately brought this subject under the consideration of their Lordships, and the only regret he had in rising was, that in refusing to accede to the Motion, he should seem to place himself in opposition to the representatives of the Church of England in that House, especially on a matter on which they called for more ample and truthful information to the country at large. But, at the same time, he thought he could give reasons why it was not desirable to accede to the Motion for the returns moved for by the right rev. Prelate. The fact was, that the Census Office was now shut up, and their accounts closed; the returns were also very numerous, amounting to nearly 40,000—or, to be quite accurate, 37,381. But the great reason why he could not well consent, consistently with good faith, to the production of these returns, was, that in the circular printed and circulated by desire of the Secretary of State, it was stated that it was not intended that all the particulars in the returns should be published. Under these circumstances, it would be impossible for the Government to accede to the Motion. He heartily agreed in what the right rev. Prelate who spoke last said, as to the regret which he felt that some other legal arrangements did not exist when the Census was taken. He thought it would be most desirable that information which the public were so anxious to have should have been made compulsory, and an untruthful answer declared to be penal. At the same time he could not help feeling that the discussions in that House upon the conduct of the Secretary of State in somewhat overstepping the bounds of legality by sending these queries with the first form had to some extent caused the evil complained of, because it increased the unwillingness of district clergymen to fill up the returns, and this naturally produced an unfavourable impression as to the numbers belonging to the Established Church. His right rev. Friend did not raise any question against the Census Office, or the manner in which its duties had been performed, but his complaint was, that, on the one hand, the Church of England returns did not give a sufficient statement of the numbers attending places of worship belonging to the Established Church, while, on the other hand, the numbers attending the Dissenting chapels were exaggerated. It was impossible for him to give an official opinion on this subject; but from the facts he had stated, arising out of the debates that took place in that House, he did think it was made out that the returns as to the Church were below the numbers that ought to have been given. As to the Dissenters, he likewise shrank from giving any official opinion. The right rev. Prelates, no doubt, seemed to have made out a strong case, and the Dissenters, he had no doubt, would take some public opportunity of telling their own story, and the public would judge between the two. Some of the facts mentioned by the right rev. Prelate were strong, others were not so. His statement, for example, as to the weather having given an advantage to Dissenters was not a strong fact, for both would be equally affected by this, and the weather no doubt varied in different parts of the country. As to the Roman Catholics, he would only observe, with reference to the number of sittings they possessed, that their services were short and more frequent than ours, and therefore it was obvious that their chapels gave accommodation to more persons than Protestant churches did, where the services were longer and the attendances more rare. He hoped he had said enough to show that it was impossible for the Government to accede to the Motion. At the same time, he was glad the statement had been made, that it might be considered by the public. Such answers as could be given would no doubt be put forward by the Dissenters, and the public would then be able to judge more accurately upon the subject. He wished to say one word as to what had fallen from a noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) the other day on the subject of these returns. The noble Earl had said that the returns were perfectly useless, and that not twenty persons looked at them. Now, this was not borne out by the facts, for he had been informed that of one edition of these returns 21,000 copies were sold almost as soon as published. With respect to the increase of expense attending the Census, the former Census having cost 23,500*l.*, while the latter cost 170,000*l.*, the noble Earl was mistaken. The mistake was a natural one for him to make, for he was probably not aware that the former Census was paid entirely out of the poor rate; and that while it cost 5*l.* 9*s.* per thousand, the last cost 5*l.* 4*s.* per thousand, being a saving of 5*s.* per thousand, while much more information had been obtained. The estimate was 150,000*l.*, but only 127,000*l.* was expended, thus leaving a considerable sum to be returned to the Treasury. It was necessary to state these facts, as it would create an unfounded prejudice against the manner of doing the business if the statements which had been made remained uncontradicted. He might add, in justice to the Registrar General, that he had been informed by the head of his department, that in his conduct of the whole business he showed great powers of administration and great care for the public interest in every possible way.

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S said, that in Wales, owing to one portion of the members of the Church of England being Welsh and the other English, of two services performed on the same day one was performed in Welsh and the other in English, therefore only one-half the congregation of a church attended each service. This did not apply to the Dissenters, whose congregations were generally all of one country, and, therefore, all attended each service.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that after what had fallen from his noble Friend (Earl Granville) he could not of course press for these returns, but he thought that the promise which had been referred to was one which ought not to have been given, as it was a direct temptation to an unscrupulous person to send inaccurate returns. He was convinced that no provision could meet the difficulty arising from taking the returns of the people attending the churches and chapels on a certain known day, as it would by both sides be considered a trial of strength, and would be no proof of the real religious state of the districts. Therefore, if this information was to be obtained again, he most earnestly trusted that the returns would be taken in some other way than from the attendance in places of worship on a notified Sunday.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

AND LEASING POWERS (IRELAND)
BILL.

Order for Committee read.

VOL. CXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

House in Committee.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, his object, in moving that the Chairman should report progress, was to endeavour to induce the Government and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) to defer all legislation upon these important Bills until the next Session, because, at that late period of the Session, it was utterly impossible to do justice to those measures. Ireland was at the present time in a greater state of prosperity than it had enjoyed for a long period; and there was not that immediate urgency for passing a measure of this description this year, which undoubtedly there appeared to have been some years ago. They could, therefore, afford to wait for some time, to have the measures gravely considered and matured; and it was far better to adopt that course than to take up the worse part of the code introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and pass it into a law this Session. To show that it was utterly impossible to pass those Bills at present, he might mention that the hon. and learned Member for the county of Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) had thirty-four Amendments to move to the Landlord and Tenant Bill, and that the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin had given notice of 156 Amendments. And on the Leasing Powers Bill there were forty-five Amendments to be moved by its original proposer. The notices of these Amendments had been only given on the preceding day, and there was not sufficient time to give them the consideration they absolutely required. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin had brought forward those Land Bills, he made a prayer to Almighty God at the end of his speech, as he often did, for the success of the whole; and he (Serjeant Shee) did not see how the right hon. and learned Gentleman could now come forward and ask the House to pass the Landlord and Tenant Bill, and Leasing Powers Bill, without the Tenants' Compensation Bill. A Committee had been appointed on the subject last Session, and though he would not say it was an unfair Committee, he would have preferred a Committee of English and Scotch gentlemen who understood what the just rights of the people were, and, above all, who detested the idea of a potato estate with mud cabins for their tenantry. The Bill

Prelate had most legitimately brought this subject under the consideration of their Lordships, and the only regret he had in rising was, that in refusing to accede to the Motion, he should seem to place himself in opposition to the representatives of the Church of England in that House, especially on a matter on which they called for more ample and truthful information to the country at large. His statement, for example, as to the weather having given an advantage to Dissenters was not a strong fact, for both would be equally affected by this, and the weather no doubt varied in different parts of the country. As to the Roman Catholics, he would only observe, with reference to the number of sittings they possessed, that their services were short and more frequent than ours, and therefore it was obvious that their chapels gave accommodation to more persons than Protestant churches did, where the services were longer and the attendances more rare. He hoped he had said enough to show that it was impossible for the Government to accede to the Motion. At the same time, he was glad the statement had been made, that it might be considered by the public. Such answers as could be given would no doubt be put forward by the Dissenters, and the public would then be able to judge more accurately upon the subject. He wished to say one word as to what had fallen from a noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) the other day on the subject of these returns. The noble Earl had said that the returns were perfectly useless, and that not twenty persons looked at them. Now, this was not borne out by the facts, for he had been informed that of one edition of these returns 21,000 copies were sold almost as soon as published. With respect to the increase of expense attending the Census, the former Census having cost 23,500*l.*, while the latter cost 170,000*l.*, the noble Earl was mistaken. The mistake was a natural one for him to make, for he was probably not aware that the former Census was paid entirely out of the poor rate; and that while it cost 5*l.* 9*s.* per thousand, the last cost 5*l.* 4*s.* per thousand, being a saving of 5*s.* per thousand, while much more information had been obtained. The estimate was 150,000*l.*, but only 127,000*l.* was expended, thus leaving a considerable sum to be returned to the Treasury. It was necessary to state these facts, as it would create an unfounded prejudice against the manner of doing the business if the statements which had been made remained uncontradicted. He might add, in justice to the Registrar General, that he had been informed by the head of his department, that in his conduct of the whole business he showed great powers of administration and great care for the public interest in every possible way.

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S said, that in Wales, owing to one portion of the members of the Church of England being Welsh and the other English, of two services performed on the same day one was performed in Welsh and the other in English, therefore only one-half the congregation of a church attended each service. This did not apply to the Dissenters, whose congregations were generally all of one country, and, therefore, all attended each service.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that after what had fallen from his noble Friend (Earl Granville) he could not of course press for these returns, but he thought that the promise which had been referred to was one which ought not to have been given, as it was a direct temptation to an unscrupulous person to send inaccurate returns. He was convinced that no provision could meet the difficulty arising from taking the returns of the people attending the churches and chapels on a certain known day, as it would by both sides be considered a trial of strength, and would be no proof of the real religious state of the districts. Therefore, if this information was to be obtained again, he most earnestly trusted that the returns would be taken in some other way than from the attendance in places of worship on a notified Sunday.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) BILL, AND LEASING POWERS (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

VOL. CXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, his object, in moving that the Chairman should report progress, was to endeavour to induce the Government and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) to defer all legislation upon these important Bills until the next Session, because, at that late period of the Session, it was utterly impossible to do justice to those measures. Ireland was at the present time in a greater state of prosperity than it had enjoyed for a long period; and there was not that immediate urgency for passing a measure of this description this year, which undoubtedly there appeared to have been some years ago. They could, therefore, afford to wait for some time, to have the measures gravely considered and matured; and it was far better to adopt that course than to take up the worse part of the code introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and pass it into a law this Session. To show that it was utterly impossible to pass those Bills at present, he might mention that the hon. and learned Member for the county of Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) had thirty-four Amendments to move to the Landlord and Tenant Bill, and that the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin had given notice of 156 Amendments. And on the Leasing Powers Bill there were forty-five Amendments to be moved by its original proposer. The notices of these Amendments had been only given on the preceding day, and there was not sufficient time to give them the consideration they absolutely required. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin had brought forward those Land Bills, he made a prayer to Almighty God at the end of his speech, as he often did, for the success of the whole; and he (Serjeant Shee) did not see how the right hon. and learned Gentleman could now come forward and ask the House to pass the Landlord and Tenant Bill, and Leasing Powers Bill, without the Tenants' Compensation Bill. A Committee had been appointed on the subject last Session, and though he would not say it was an unfair Committee, he would have preferred a Committee of English and Scotch gentlemen who understood what the just rights of the people were, and, above all, who detested the idea of a potato estate with mud cabins for their tenantry. The Bill sanctioned by the Government last Session to afford compensation to tenants for improvements contained a sound principle, which would have been capable of future extension; but unfortunately the House of Lords had thrown out the Tenants' Improvements Compensation Bill in a House of only twenty-five Members, eleven or twelve of whom were short-sighted Irish landlords, directly interested in the question. It was not endurable, and was calculated to bring the Constitution of the country into contempt, that a few Irish landlords in another House should thus set aside the deliberate opinion of that House and of the leading statesmen of the country; and now the Committee were asked to pass the stringent clauses of these two Bills now before it without the compensating clauses of the Tenants' Improvements Compensation Bill. He hoped, however, that the Government would not weary in well-doing, and would not be deterred from bringing in or supporting a measure embodying the same principle of justice to tenants by the obstinacy of those who resisted such a fair principle. He believed that if the Government only passed a Leasing Powers Bill and a Landlord and Tenant Bill, without accompanying them by a tenants' compensation measure, they could never satisfactorily settle the vexed question of the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, whilst they would incur public odium and contempt by legislating for the benefit of the landlords, and entirely neglecting the interests and just claims of the tenants of Ireland. He therefore hoped that the whole of the Bills on this subject now before the House would be deferred till next Session, when they would have proper time to consider them, and to deal with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's (Mr. Napier's) numerous Amendments. [The hon. and learned Gentleman then proceeded to examine the various provisions of the two Bills under consideration, contending that they were all liable to fatal objection by their failure to recognise the principle of just compensation and protection to tenants.] The fixture clause of the Leasing Powers Bill was, in his opinion, most inadequate to protect the interest of the occupier. The advocates of these Bills professed to be desirous of encouraging agricultural improvement; but they introduced no provisions really calculated to attain that end. As to the Leasing Powers Bill, though there was much in the Bill that was good, the notion that it would afford a remedy for the improvement of land in Ireland was the most preposterous that ever was entertained. When he first went to Ireland, at about twenty years of age, he was surprised at the difference between the residences of the country gentlemen and the squalor and misery about them. He thought he was not wrong in stating that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in influencing a noble Lord of great ability and promise in the other House (Lord Donoughmore) to introduce the Landlord and Tenant Bill in opposition to the measure introduced by Government last year, had done his best to strangle the Tenants' Improvement Compensation Bill. He would oppose the right hon. and learned Gentleman's proposition to the utmost, and he trusted the Government would not lend its assistance to a project which was inconsistent with the whole tenor of their lives as public men, and inconsistent with the course they thought proper to pursue last year. If the Bills were agreed to, it would be the most absurd piece of legislation which had ever insulted the good sense and liberty of the subject, and he called upon Government and the House to join with him in preventing the passing of such a measure.

Mr. M'MAHON said, he should support the Motion of the hon. and learned Serjeant, for he considered that it was impossible, with the slightest justice to the tenants of Ireland, to legislate at the present moment on this question. He trusted that Government would not go on with these Bills this Session.

Mr. KIRK said, there were fifteen or sixteen pages of Amendments which were proposed to be made in these Bills, and it was impossible for the House fully to consider them this Session. Moreover, the people of Ireland had not had time to consider the Bills. Under these circumstances he thought it would be better to postpone them.

LORD NAAS said, he thought it would be convenient if Government would now state the course they intended to pursue with regard to these Bills.

Mr. J. O'CONNELL said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Serjeant that it would be better that there should be no legislation than to have these two Bills; but he deeply deplored that there was to be no efficient legislation this Session. The good crops which were now on the land would be used by the tenants as the means of my intention this evening to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department upon a very important subject, but that noble Lord being absent, as I see a right hon. Baronet who is also one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State is in his place, I think I am perfectly justified in putting the question to him. If the right hon. Baronet cannot answer it, it is no fault of mine, nor do I wish to impute any blame to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department on account of his not being in his place at present. The question I am about to put is in reference to the arrival in this country, and the presence in London during the past week, of a very eminent Russian gentleman; and, in asking that question, perhaps the House will permit me to preface it with a few explanatory words. The gentleman to whom I allude is a member of a very distinguished Russian family, his name is Count Pahlen; he has been engaged in the Russian diplomatic service, and his brother occupies at this moment a distinguished position in the Council of the Emperor of Russia, and is said to be on the most intimate and friendly terms with him. Count Pahlen has arrived within the last ten days in this city, and since his arrival he has mixed freely in society, and it is stated that he has been introduced into some society under the special patronage and auspices of one of Her Majesty's Cabinet Ministers. I think it is fair to mention the name, in order, if the statement is incorrect, that a proper contradiction may be given to it. It is stated that, under the auspices of Lord Granville, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, this gentleman has been introduced into the society of this city. I must say that the presence of an alien enemy, or his arrival here, is a violation of the law, and the question I wish to put to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, whom I now see on the Ministerial benches, is, whether that gentleman has arrived here with that protection which could alone entitle him to be in this country—the safe conduct of Her Majesty? In the terms of my notice, I wish to know whether the Government are aware of the presence in London of Count Pahlen, a Russian subject, and one who has been actively employed in Russian diplomacy; and, if so, whether his presence here is with the permission and sanction of the Government?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I have myself no information whatever upon the subject, and I must request the hon. Member to repeat his question upon the arrival of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

THE BISHOP OF NEW ZEALAND— QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether any official communication was sent from the Colonial Office in 1853, to either the Governor or the Bishop of New Zealand, on the subject of the removal from the Estimates of that year of the usual Vote for the Bishop's salary? He wished also to ask whether any official communication that the usual allowance had been withdrawn had been sent to the Bishop of New Zealand, and if so, whether there was any objection to lay it upon the table of the House, together with any answer which may have been received from the Bishop?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that in answer to the first question of the right hon. Baronet he had to state that he could not find that any direct communication on this subject was addressed either to the Governor or the Bishop in the early part of 1853, when the 600*l.* a year, up to that time voted for the Bishop's salary, was withdrawn from the Estimates. He understood, indeed, that the attention of the Governor was called to the manner in which the Vote of 5,090*l.* was appropriated, but that the Bishop had at that time left the Colony. He (Sir G. Grey) had, however, directed that an official intimation of the withdrawal of this allowance should be forwarded to the Bishop. He had done so in consequence of having received a letter from the late Governor of New Zealand, which induced him to believe that the Bishop was not aware of the withdrawal having taken place. He could have no objection to produce both the letter which had been written to the Bishop of New Zealand and that Prelate's reply, if the right hon. Baronet would move for them.

THE CANADIAN CLERGY RESERVES— QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that since he put a question to the right hon. Baronet a few evenings ago, as to whether the Government had received any information with respect to recent events which were said to have transpired in Canada, another mail had arrived in this country. He wished to know whether that had brought any despatches from Lord Elgin, and if so, what was the nature of the intelligence which they contained? He wished particularly to know whether it was true that the Canadian Assembly had been dissolved in consequence of a Resolution upon the subject of the clergy reserves having been carried as an Amendment to the Address, and in opposition to the Government?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that when the right hon. Gentleman put this question a few evenings ago, the Government had not received any official intelligence on the subject. They had on Monday last received from Lord Elgin despatches, stating the circumstances under which the Assembly had been dissolved. The Governor opened the Session with a speech on the 13th of June. An Address was proposed in answer to that speech, and upon that Address two successive Amendments were moved. The first expressed regret that the Government had not recommended during the present Session a measure for the secularisation of the clergy reserves, and for the abolition of the seigniorial tenures. That was rejected by 54 to 16. Subsequently, however, another Amendment, speaking of "an immediate settlement of the clergy reserves," was proposed. That proposition, which was supported by several Members who had opposed the former Amendment, was carried by 42 to 29. An Act passed the Canadian Legislature last Session, by which the number of the members of that body was increased from 84 to 105; and the provincial Government of Lord Elgin both concurred in thinking that it was inexpedient to submit a question of such importance to the present Assembly, but that it would be better to postpone its consideration until another Assembly was elected under the new Act. Under these circumstances, Lord Elgin, acting under the advice of the Colonial Government, had prorogued the Assembly with a view to an immediate dissolution.

INDIA—TENURE OF LAND IN MADRAS.

MR. BLACKETT rose to move that an Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying for the appointment of a Commission to proceed to India to inquire into the tenure of land in the Presidency of Madras. The hon. Member said that the subject of the tenure of land was of great importance in British India and its dependencies, and he believed he could show on official authority that the present system adopted with regard to the tenure of land tended to prevent the accumulation of property, to precipitate the decline of the Indian population, and to render it difficult to establish anything like a healthy and stable civilisation in British India. He must, in the first place, refer to a point which had been much discussed in relation to this subject. The House was aware that the land revenue formed the main basis of Indian finance—in fact, that not less than 15,000,000*l.* out of the 26,000,000*l.* of the Indian revenue was derived from the land revenue—and therefore it was not surprising that the tax should have been the subject of much investigation, and that it should have been hotly disputed whether the land-tax in India was a tax in the ordinary sense of the word, or whether it was merely the legitimate rent of the land. Whatever might be their opinion on that question, he thought the House would agree with him that, whatever its origin, the smaller that tax could be made, consistently with the interests of the State, the better it would be for all classes, for the wealth of an empire depended on what was left in the pockets of the people, and not on what was taken out; and be this impost a tax or rent, it ought to be levied in such a manner as would be least onerous to the cultivator, most productive to the revenue, and, above all, most favourable to the operations of private industry. That, however, he believed, had not been attained under our present administration. They were aware that the tenure of land was different in different portions of India. According to the settlement made many years ago in Bengal, zemindars paid a fixed sum into the Treasury; in the North Western Provinces the village system was in operation; in the larger portion of Bombay and Madras the ryotwarry. He believed it was always injudicious in the State to undertake the duties of landlord; but it must be remembered that the founders of our Indian empire were placed in a difficult position with regard to the land revenues, and the policy it was expedient to pursue with respect to the tenure of land—and he admitted that the East India Company, stepping into the shoes of the Native princes, found themselves necessarily burdened with many duties which, under other circumstances, they would never have attempted to discharge. But he thought that the Company ought to have remembered that the discharge of these duties was only a disagreeable necessity, and that, having undertaken them, they were bound to endeavour to discharge them in a manner which would promote the welfare and prosperity of the Natives, and should have looked forward to a period when they might terminate this vicious characteristic of Asiatic society. This, in fact, was the policy of the founders of our Indian empire. He would, however, ask the House whether it was possible to detect any vestige of this sagacious policy in the manner in which the ryotwarry system was now administered? The system was directly opposed to every policy the British Government ought to have pursued; and instead of tending to stimulate private enterprise, it introduced the agency of the State to an extent that had no parallel in the history of the world. The Indian Government, by the ryotwarry system, attempted a task which would be difficult to the most favourably situated Government in the world—namely, that of acting, not nominally, but in deed, as landlords of their whole territory, and of placing a money rent upon every field within their vast dominions. How difficult was the task of the collectors to whom this duty was intrusted might be easily seen when they considered the immense extent of their districts. In the Madras Presidency, districts, extending, on the average, over an area of 7,000 square miles, and in some instances, as at Bellary and Cuddapah, over an area of 13,000 square miles, were placed under the superintendence of one collector, with a few English assistants, who made their tours through the districts, ascertaining, or attempting to ascertain, how much land each individual cultivator intended to bring into cultivation, and watching and checking the produce of the soil under every variety of season and of climate. The effect of this system, undertaken under great disadvantages, and charging the Government with immense responsibilities, was to break down the cultivators of the soil so completely that such a thing as private property in land, in any appreciable sense of the word, was altogether unknown. No doubt the tenant kept his holding so long as he paid the land-tax, but that tax pressed so severely upon his means of subsistence as to leave him at the mercy of the Government. In this case, too, the word "Government" was synonymous with swarms of corrupt Native functionaries, under whose administration it was impossible that the tenant could accumulate capital from the produce of the soil, which was consequently without a marketable value—the sure sign of agricultural depression and distress. He (Mr. Blackett) did not think that Colonel Read or Lord W. Bentinck or Sir T. Munro ever contemplated such consequences as likely to result from the ryotwarry system. Sir T. Munro's idea seemed to have been to give the tenant of the soil permanence and fixity of tenure, to make the land-tax approximate as nearly as possible to a permanent quit-rent, and to provide that the exactions of the State should cease to keep pace with the profits of industry. It was obvious that for a fixed settlement of the tax to be beneficial to the people, it must be at a moderate rate. Now, what was the state of things in this respect in the Presidency of Madras? It had been said by the right hon. Baronet near him (Sir C. Wood) that the question at what were called the annual settlements in that Presidency seemed only to be a settlement of how much of the stipulated rent should be remitted to the ryots each year in consequence of adverse seasons, which rendered them unable to pay their full rent. He (Mr. Blackett) thought, then, that the House ought to consider whether the land-tax in Madras was so moderate in amount that the tenants might have a reasonable prospect of being able to pay it, or whether the tenants were liable to vicissitudes, depending in no degree on their own care and foresight, and leaving them a mere equitable title to the consideration of their landlords. The President of the Board of Control had admitted, on a former occasion, that the amount of rent originally imposed was now too high in consequence of the general fall in the value of produce in Madras. The assessment, which pressed with peculiar severity upon the cultivators of the soil, was originally fixed under a survey made some fifty years ago, confessedly under circumstances of great disadvantage and imperfection, and in some instances without the aid of maps. The principle upon which the rent was then fixed was this—the quality of the ground was estimated, and the probable percentage of profit on the gross produce of the soil was commuted into a money rent, at the market prices of the day, and such rent was then saddled on the land for ever. He thought this was a great misfortune, for at the time to which he referred, many circumstances combined to render the market prices of Indian produce unusually high. Ever since that period prices had been steadily falling, while the ryots were still called upon to pay an assessment calculated upon the high rate of prices which prevailed sixty years ago. In regard to the survey, however, he believed that, notwithstanding its imperfection, it gave a fair average estimate of the value of the land at the time it was made. But what would the House say, when he told them that the assessment was so high upon the best land as actually to drive the landholders to cultivate poor lands at a moderate assessment rather than face the difficulty of extracting from good soil crops sufficient to enable them to bear up against the enormous taxation with which it was burdened? They had the testimony of Mr. Dykes and Mr. Bourdillon that there were many villages in various parts of the country in which large portions of cultivable land were permanently waste, because the assessment was so excessive that the crops would not cover it, and that a large extent of the most productive soil in the country was permanently kept out of cultivation by the excessive demands of the Government. Sir Thomas Munro rightly understood that the State must necessarily be the worst landlord in the world, chiefly because it acted at a distance, and through the instrumentality of innumerable agents; he was determined to prevent the State, as effectually as possible, from all opportunity of interfering between the tenant and his profits, and, therefore, he laid down the rule that no tax should be increased or imposed in consequence of any improvement of the land made by the tenant. Of course, if the State effected any improvements, by irrigation or otherwise, which increased the value of the property, the State would derive the advantage of an additional rent; but it was intended that the tenant should reap the benefit of any improvements effected by himself. He (Mr. Blackett) thought, however, that in this respect the policy of Sir Thomas Munro had been abandoned, for it was stated by Mr. Dykes, the collector at Salem, that when the ryots attempted to improve the cultivation of the soil by planting orchards, by sinking wells, or by other means, in recent days, they had been subjected to an additional assessment. Sir C. Trevelyan, in his evidence, alluded as a notorious fact to the very objectionable principle imported into the ryotwarry system since the time of Sir T. Munro, of imposing a tax upon the improvement of land, and stated that, in the Madras Presidency, that tax operated far more effectually in discouraging the improvement of land, than the old tithe system did in England. Mr. Peacock was called on the part of the East India Company, but he did not contradict the evidence of Sir C. Trevelyan upon any single point of importance. He (Mr. Blackett) considered that the evidence threw a great deal of light upon the necessary opposition which existed between the interests of the responsible Government of India and those of their local agents, whose main anxiety must be to make up a good revenue for the year. He complained, not that the East India Company acted under disadvantages, but that they adopted and perpetuated a system of taxation which greatly aggravated the disadvantages under which the best and wisest Government in the world must labour. The general result was that the native population of India had been reduced almost to a state of beggary under this state of things. He thought another objection to the ryotwarry system was the immense power which it placed in a swarm of Government functionaries, consisting of native agents; no one was more anxious than he was to see the native Indians raised by official employment; but when he contemplated the characteristic defects of the Indian character, and when he thought of the long-continued system of injustice which had stimulated their vices, the last thing in the world he should wish to see was their ingratiating themselves with their English masters at the expense of their poor fellow-countrymen. He had before mentioned the enormous extent of land placed under the control of a single collector; and the House could conceive the pressure which might be exercised by the native assistants of such an individual upon a population of 80,000, 100,000, or even 150,000 persons, a vast proportion of whom were trembling on the verge which separated indigence from absolute starvation. Sir G. Clerk, the late Governor of Bombay, spoke of this as one of the drawbacks of the ryotwarry system. The evidence of Mr. Dyke was to the same purpose, and that of Mr. Bourdillon, whose peculiar authority on the question could not be doubted, graphically described the manner in which the unhappy ryots were ground down beneath the monstrous exactions of the collectors' servants, whose cruelty towards the persons subjected to their power was only equalled by their servility towards their employers. Mr. Bourdillon said—

"The enormous amount of constant and inquisitorial interference was an evil of immense magnitude, but that was greatly aggravated by the power which was lodged in the hands of subordinate and ill-paid revenue officers. The number of convictions for peculation bore no proportion to that of the instances of its commission, and peculation was by no means the only or the chief corruption of that class of the population; and if that was the state of matters with the chief class of subordinates, it was hardly necessary to say that the same vices obtained among the whole race of subordinates down to the very lowest."

He (Mr. Blckett) fully admitted the difficulties with which that system was surrounded; but it was the gravest condemnation of that system that it could not be carried out without the employment of means that converted it into an engine of the most intolerable oppression. The evils of the existing state of things were so great, so antagonistic alike to the prosperity and happiness of the Indian population and to the real interests of the Indian Government and of this country, that, whatever the difficulties might be, it was the duty of the House to take measures for overcoming them, and for placing the tenure of land in India—and especially in Madras—upon a sound and just basis. The returns showed in the most startling light the depressing effect which the system had upon the land revenue of India, and it was, indeed, impossible but that such a system must operate as an insuperable bar to agricultural improvement. The revenue was annually declining, as was shown clearly by the accounts for 1852 and 1853 as compared with those for 1848-49 and 1850-51. With regard to the value of the land, he found in the Appendix to the Report of the Committee of last year a return of the prices produced by land at the last revenue sale; and it appeared that in the eleven years ended 1852 the annual rental of the property put up for sale was 115,486*l.*, and the price it fetched was only 160,000*l.* Again, with regard to the population, the House could hardly conceive the frightful speed with which the multiplication of small holdings had proceeded, creating a larger and larger body of wretched serfs, without capital, without credit, without any means of duly cultivating the soil, and themselves scarcely able to keep soul and body together. In the district of Coimbatore alone, the number of these pauper cultivators, holding from one to thirty-five rupees in land per annum—or from 2*s.* to 70*s.*—had increased from 971 to 3,607, while the number of the comparatively wealthy tenants, holding from fifty to 500 rupees in land, had decreased from seventy-eight to twenty-eight. He knew it was said that the Hindoo law of inheritance was at the bottom of this state of things; but was that any reason for our persisting in a system of taxation which seemed to have been contrived and established to strengthen a Government by the suicidal experiment of weakening society? Never had such a scene been presented by any land that had been held for so many years by a civilised Government. The picture which Mr. Bourdillon—one of the most experienced persons concerned in administering the ryotwarry system—drew of the condition of the population under this system, and not merely that of the very wretchedest, but of what were deemed the favourably situated among them, was perfectly appalling—prostrate physically and mentally, pressed down by debt, by destitution—exhibiting a dead level of squalid pauperism, misery, and starvation. The President of the Board of Control had expressed the opinion that the matter might be safely left in the hands of the Indian Government; but the conduct of the Indian Government on the subject, and especially that of the Madras Government, as particularly illustrated by their unworthy treatment of the Commission appointed to inquire into public works in that Presidency, clearly proved that the matter could not, with any expectation of beneficial results, be intrusted to that Government. It was essential that the Government of India should be brought to recognise the principle of property in behalf of the cultivators of the soil, and should discontinue that barbarous system of serfdom, which, however it might appear to Indian officials a perfectly legitimate situation in which to continue the unhappy ryots, was a principle from which the founders of the Indian Government would have shrunk with horror. The claim of the State to the land in property was the prime vice which it behoved the Imperial Parliament to extirpate—it was no more than the delusion which had induced ignorant and barbarous rulers to grasp at the riches of their subjects, instead of waiting patiently until capital produced its inevitable results; it was exactly analogous with the ignorant blindness of the savage, who, as Montesquieu expressed it, cut down the tree to get at the fruit. To obtain anything like a satisfactory result two or three healthy English minds must be applied to the inquiry, aided, of course, by the best assistance that could be obtained from competent Indian information. All he desired at present was, that a beginning should be made. He was now only asking the House to do what the Government had already done in the cognate case of Ceylon. The Ceylon Commission was expressly authorised to inquire into the state of the tenure of land, and what they recommended was, that the tenant cultivator should be allowed to redeem his land tax, and so get an inalienable possession of the soil. If that principle were recognised in India, they would soon see the immense impulse it would give to the industry of the country and its social progress. It was in no spirit of hostility to the East India Company that he had brought this subject under the consideration of the House; and he would now only express his belief that by adopting the Motion which he had placed on the notice-book, the House of Commons would immensely facilitate the task of developing the resources of British India.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Commission to proceed to India to inquire into the Tenure of Land in the Presidency of Madras."

MR. LOWE said, his hon. and learned Friend seemed to think that he had nothing to do but to state a case against the present way in which the land revenue was collected in Madras in order to entitle him to ask the House to take the strong and unusual course of addressing Her Majesty to send out a Commission composed of Englishmen to India to inquire into the matter. It appeared to him that the hon. and learned Gentleman had by no means made out so strong a case as to justify any such course; indeed it would require a very strong case to induce the House to take such a step as that. The theory of the Indian Government was, that on that side of the ocean there should be despotic rule, checked, on this side only, by the control of the Home Government and of Parliament, so as to secure at the same time, the power, the influence, the terror which arose from a despotic Government, silently modified by the responsibility which here awaited those who exercised that away. Such being the essential theory of our Indian rule, nothing but the strongest and clearest necessity should induce the House to sanction any course by which the authority of the Indian Government should appear, in the eyes of its subjects, to be superseded by an authority checking and controlling it from without; by which an authority delegated from the English Parliament should be paraded in the eyes of the natives, as checking and controlling the local Government. He did not say that a case of necessity might not present itself so strong, so overwhelming, as to counter-vail such considerations; but no such necessity had been made out by his hon. and learned Friend, and he, therefore, trusted that the House would permit no step to be taken of this nature, calculated, as it was, to bring the Indian Government, and especially the Madras Government, into contempt in the eyes of the Native population. Asiatics could not understand the theory of governing powers, limited and controlled by what were well understood here as constitutional checks; and, consequently, to set before them the Government under which they lived as itself a subsidiary Government, subject to be directed and governed by powers elsewhere, would be to expose that Government to the utmost risk. His hon. and learned Friend talked of applying healthy English minds to the inquiry he proposed; but the extreme probabilities were, that the persons whom he might theoretically select for the inquiry might, whatever their other qualities, labour under the fatal defect of ignorance of the practical state and working of Indian affairs. No one attended to Indian matters in this country except persons who had political, commercial, or official reasons for studying them systematically; and the healthy English minds contemplated by his hon. and learned Friend would, therefore, though filled with the best intentions, run the risk of falling uncensciously into the hands of persons who would be anything but sound and sure guides for them. Another objection which he entertained to the Motion arose out of what his hon. and learned Friend said about the Government of Madras. He would remind the House, however, that since last year the Government of Madras had been changed. The new Governor who had gone out (Lord Harris) was a nobleman of great ability and experience in the government of tropical countries, and he anticipated the greatest benefits would arise from his administration. Certainly he (Mr. Lowe) would be sorry to inaugurate the government of this nobleman by what might be regarded as a mark of confidence in his administration. These, then, were reasons which seemed to him to show that his hon. and learned Friend had more to do than to make complaints against the revenue system of Madras in order to make out his case for sending out a Commission of Inquiry. But he would go further. He would say that, in order to make out his case, the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to have been able to show one at least of three things. He ought either to have shown that there were grievances in Madras which were not recognised and admitted by the Home Government, or he ought to have shown that, admitting these grievances, the Government were not preparing, and had no notion of preparing, remedies to meet them; or again, if he could not prove this, the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to have been prepared to show that the Government of India was doggedly set against redressing these grievances, and that nothing except the stimulus of a Commission inquiring upon the spot would induce them to do justice to the population of the Presidency. His hon. and learned Friend however, had shown none of these things; and it was upon this ground, waiving the objections which might be urged to the appointment of a purely English Commission to proceed from this country to India for the purposes of inquiry, that he grounded his opposition to this Motion. The Resolution purported to refer to the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry into the tenure of land in Madras. Although, however, he had listened with great attention to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend, he had heard nothing which he could fix upon with regard to the tenure of land at all. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said a great deal about the collection of revenue; but as to the tenure of land he had said nothing which he (Mr. Lowe) could hear except in almost the last sentence of his speech, in which he spoke of allowing the ryots to redeem their rents and thus become pre-prietors of the land. Now, if this were the object of his hon. and learned Friend, he confessed he did not think it would be worth while to send out a Commission merely to inquire whether or not the ryots ought to be allowed to redeem their rents, because he had only to refer to the speech of the hon. and learned Member himself to ask the House whether to give such a permission would not be (in the situation in which the hon. and learned Gentleman described the Madras ryots to be) merely a cruel mockery? These persons were described by his hon. and learned Friend as being in the lowest state of want and misery, as trembling on the line which separated indigence and starvation, and at the same time, in order to give the Commission a subject on which to report, they were to suppose these miserable creatures to be in a condition to redeem their rents, and to become owners and proprietors of the soil. Now, he thought this was far too visionary an idea upon which to ask this House to send out a Commission to India? But he would go further, and, putting aside that which his hon. and learned Friend admitted was not a very probable or a very near contingency, he would ask the House what result was expected from the Report of such a Commission as was suggested? His hon. and learned Friend had spoken not merely against the abuses of the ryotwarry system, but against the ryotwarry system itself, and was of opinion that that system ought to be put an end to. But what would his hon. and learned Friend substitute for it? If the Commission were to go and inquire on the spot, of course they must inquire about something. It would be of no use denouncing the ryotwarry system if something were not substituted in its place. If all that could be gained from the Report of such a Commission was simply the declaration that the system was a very bad one, but that it was desirable to abide by it in the main, it would scarcely be worth while to issue a Commission for such a result. But probably his hon. and learned Friend might say, "There are other systems—other land systems—in India, as, for example, the village system and the semindarry system; and a Commission might very properly inquire whether one or other of these might not be more suitable to the Presidency of Madras than the ryotwarry system." Now, he (Mr. Lowe) contended that such an inquiry would be utterly nugatory, because we knew beforehand, having ample means of forming an opinion on the subject, that such a change could, only aggravate and increase the very evils of which his hon. and learned Friend complained. If the Government abolished the ryotwarry and substituted the zemindarry system in Madras, they would be only setting up Native instead of Government landlords, and he declared without fear of contradiction, that they would not in any way ameliorate the condition of the ryots by doing so. The experience of Bengal, where the zemindarry system had been introduced and where the ryots had unhappily been abandoned to harsh and cruel Native landlords, was most unfavourable; for here the population were as miserable as any in India. He need go no further for testimony to the truth of what he alleged than the speech of his hon. and learned Friend, who had drawn a most melancholy picture of the Hindoo character, and had described the Natives as characterised alike by servility and cruelty. Now, what greater iniquity could be perpetrated by a Government, which was in itself and in its own tendencies neither servile nor cruel, than by being accessory to any measure which should hand over the cultivators of the soil in India to a set of men who were so described? It could not be right to hand over a race who were notoriously unable to help themselves and to resist oppression to persons who were stigmatised as servile and cruel. This, at any rate, would not be the way to remedy the evil complained of, and he supposed it would be generally acknowledged that it would be better for the native Hindoos to fall into the hands of the Government of India, with all its faults, than to hand them over to a body of men so described, and who were quite unable to discharge their duties as landlords. Then, should they take the village system? Should they say, "We will form these people into communities with reference to each village, and the whole village should be bound to pay to the Government a particular rent?" Should they adopt such a system? He admitted that it had been found to work well in the North West Provinces—but why? Because the villages there formed communities and brotherhoods of their own; because among them there was a community of feeling; because everybody was a clansman and a friend, and they had no separate or divided interest. Was this the state of society in Madras? No. The village system in Madras was broken up, the villages were inhabited by persons of different castes and of very hostile feelings, and there could be no greater cruelty and extortion than that which you would authorise and sanction, if you were to form these Madras villages into communities for the purpose of paying the rent to the Government, and thus place the weak inhabitants of a village in the power of the strong. You would then see cruelty and servility working their natural results, and he could not look without a shudder to the effect of such a system. Yet these were the only alternative land tenures; you must choose between the ryotwarry, the zemindarry, and the village systems. You could not wait until the ryot grew rich and could buy his land; you had no choice between handing him over to another Hindoo far more cruel than the Government of India in its worst times had ever been, or of binding him up with others in a small community where every man would prey upon his neighbour, and where the poor would be trampled down and almost annihilated and destroyed. His hon. and learned Friend had then, he thought, shown no ground for inquiry into the tenures of land, because the evils attending every tenure which could be suggested as a substitute were each of them far more objectionable than that which at present existed. But there were other grounds for opposing this Motion. The grievances connected with the ryotwarry system, as described by his hon. and learned Friend, and as recounted in any works of authority upon India, were thoroughly well known and understood. Further than this, the remedies for these grievances were also perfectly well known and understood, and it was the wish of the Government to put an end to those grievances as soon as possible. Nothing, in his opinion, could be more objectionable than to send persons to India on a crusade against the ryotwarry system, because he was prepared to prove that they must continue this system in Madras, without denying one single objection which had been urged against it by his hon. and learned Friend. The abuses which had been pointed out were no part of the system itself; they were only evils and excrescences which grew out of it. Remedies for those evils could be substituted and might be applied, and when in operation he contended that the ryotwarry was the best system of land tenure which could be applied to Madras in the present condition of the Presidency. He would take the objections urged by the hon. and learned Gentleman to the ryotwarry system, and on the strength of which he wished to destroy it. His hon. and learned Friend declared the assessment to be too high. Well, this was a conclusive objection to any system. The best system in the world must necessarily fail if the assessment were too high. If you asked a man more than he could afford to pay for his land, you must inevitably be working out his ruin and destruction; and this objection would apply to every system of tenure in the world. The next objection entertained by his hon. and learned Friend was to the excessive amount of Native superintendence, and upon this point he (Mr. Lowe) so thoroughly agreed with him that he did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman went even quite far enough. The ryotwarry system presupposed an accurate survey of the land, and such a survey, as far as he could find, in Madras had never been made. As the necessary information was therefore wanting, a large degree of inaccuracy was the result. In like manner, the classification of the land had been attended to by untrustworthy persons, and required much revision and care. Upon this foundation was built a system of great minuteness, and involving much inspection. The ryot must settle with the Government authorities how much land he had to cultivate and pay for in the year, and must receive a ticket or certificate recording these facts, which was given to him by the collector. These things had to be gone through every year, and it would therefore be seen that the system was one involving minute superintendence, in which the Government appeared not so much the landlord as the partner of the cultivator of the soil, and which was most injurious to the welfare of the population. Besides this, he was quite prepared to say that, notwithstanding the subject had been frequently pressed upon the Indian Government, there had been a tendency to tax improvements, which, of course, ought not to be taxed, and which it was quite unnecessary to argue ought not to be taxed. He allowed, too, that persons were now required to retain in cultivation larger portions of land than they required at the mere whim of the tax collector; and that the system, as at present administered, was vexatious, and afforded constant opportunities of bribery and extortion. All this might be admitted, but did it furnish any objection to the ryotwarry system in itself? It was a strong objection to the practice of annual settlements and to the interference of the Government every year, but it was no objection to the system adopted in Bombay, where they gave leases of thirty years, and made settlements once for all during that period, so that for thirty years the ryot was free to do what he pleased, and was free from the superintendence of the Government officer. If such a principle as that were adopted in Madras—and he knew of no reason why it should not be—the objections of his hon. and learned Friend would vanish at once. It did appear to him, therefore, that the objections of his hon. and learned Friend were not objections to the ryotwarry system in itself, but objections to the abuses which had crept into that system. The want of proper assessment, and the high rate of assessment, could be cured by law; the immense quantity of Native interference and the vexations arising out of it could be cured by giving leases; and in like manner a remedy could be afforded to cases where taxes were levied on improvements, and where Natives were compelled to cultivate a larger portion of land than they wanted. The evils complained of were patent and notorious, and when the remedies proposed were applied—when an accurate survey had been made of the land—when the number of settlements was reduced, and the ryots were placed in possession of the securities asked for on their behalf—what possible tenure of land could his hon. and learned Friend imagine which could be more suited to develop the resources of the country, and to advance the civilisation of such a people than the ryotwarry system? These things being perfectly understood, he asked why they should send out a Commission of Inquiry? Here were evils patent, and remedies, which nobody cared to deny, ought to be applied. But the Government, in his view, ought to build upon the base of existing institutions, instead of going on a wild-goose chase after new systems, which might or might not be applicable in the course of some hundred years—though this point he did not mean to argue—but which, at any rate, were inapplicable now. Whatever might be the faults of the Indian Government, the ryot would gain nothing by having any middleman placed between him and the Government. The only other use of the Commission of Inquiry, if it did not lead to the adoption of a new system of land tenure, would be to stimulate the Indian Government in remedying the faults of the system now in operation. His hon. and learned Friend was afraid that without such stimulus nothing would be done by the Government. Now, he entreated him to believe that the Government did feel the grave responsibility which pressed upon them in this matter, and he did trust that the result of a few years would be—if the House would have patience to allow the proposed reforms to be worked out—to show that the Government were able to redress all the practical grievances complained of, without interference with the system which formed the basis upon which the tenure of land rested in Madras, and upon which he believed it must continue to rest; and that they required no Commission to be sent out to India, either to bring to their minds those grievances, and to suggest remedies, or to stimulate their diligence in redressing them.

Mr. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he must remind the House that the evils which attended the tenure of land in the Madras Presidency had been admitted for many years; and so long since as 1840, the answer to a memorial on the subject was, that not a year should elapse before a remedy was applied. Yet, in spite of this promise, not the slightest attempt had been made to meet the complaints of the inhabitants of the Presidency, and the hon. Member for Kidderminster now held out the same delusive hope. He did not believe, with the hon. Member, that the sending of this Commission to India would weaken the authority of the Government there. The people of India were not such fools as they were represented to be, and knew well enough that the real strength of their Government did not lie in India; and therefore the sending this Commission would show the inhabitants of the Presidency that the Government at home had a paternal feeling for the welfare of the people, and were not afraid to acknowledge that those whom they had deputed to take charge of the people had not properly fulfilled their duties, and that as soon as that fact had come to their knowledge they had sent out men to find out what remedy should be applied, and how they could best ameliorate their condition for the future. The condition of the people of India was a perfect disgrace to this country, and to every party who had ever had anything to do with India; and it was the duty of the House of Commons to enforce upon the Government the necessity of applying remedies to the grievances under which any portion of Her Majesty's subjects were suffering. The inquiry into the internal condition of any people would always be productive of good in bringing to light facts which the Government would otherwise never know; and the result of such an inquiry could but tend to strengthen the hands of the Government in carrying out the remedies required;—and for these reasons he considered the appointment of this Commission most desirable. With respect to Southern India, the statistics of the East India Company showed that the land was of no value. Why was it that no Governor General of India, since Lord W. Bentinck, had visited that part of the empire? and why was it that he had never been directed to inquire into the causes which led to this disgraceful state of things? The Governor General could find time to go to the newly-acquired Burmah, or to the pet Punjaub; but why had no visit ever been paid to Madras? He did not think that the Native servants of India deserved all the blame which was always so freely cast upon them, in connection with the existing state of things in India. No doubt they were not all of them of that high character they would desire to see; but there were "black sheep" among the Company's European servants, and their delinquencies were not unfrequently screened by the Government at home. The Native officials were very much underpaid, and it seemed, therefore, to be acknowledged by the Government of India, like that of Russia, that a little peculation was allowable. Another great error in the existing system was, that, in reality, no one knew to whom the land really belonged. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control stated, on a previous occasion, that the land belonged to the Government; but it had been stated on authority as high that the land really belonged to the occupier; so that, in reality, it appeared that no two persons were agreed as to whom the land actually belonged. He himself thought that the right hon. Gentleman was correct, and that the land belonged to the Government. But what was the condition of the holder of that land? If a person held land, he had to pay as much as two-thirds of the gross produce annually to the Government, and, indeed, in some places more than the gross produce; so that it was impossible that land could be of any value to the holder, and the consequence was, that one-third of the best land was lying waste and untilled, and the persons who, under a different system, would be encouraged to cultivate that land emigrated in large numbers to Ceylon, or to the Mauritius, and other places. In Ceylon they found it possible to buy land, and the result was, that the greater portion of the land in that island was cultivated by those Tamuls who had been compelled to emigrate from their own country. The system of forcing the revenue was also kept up to a great extent. Persons might not wish to take land, but the subordinates of the collectors would say, "We must make up the revenue," and they would actually compel them to take land. With regard to the tenure of land in the Madras Presidency, he had been much astonished, upon speaking to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control on the subject of moving for copies of the list of rules regulating the holding of land, to hear that it would be impossible to produce them, and that no copies of them had ever been sent to this country. These were rules which affected the happiness of a large class of British subjects, and they ought, he thought, to be made public, instead of being kept secret, not only from the public generally, but from those persons whose interests were most deeply affected by them. He believed that there was no farmer in England who did not care more for his stock than the East India Company did for those human beings intrusted to their charge, and that these rules were kept secret was an instance of that fact. He had himself tried to obtain a copy of them, and could not, until at last he had succeeded in obtaining a copy—he was not ashamed to say it—surreptitiously. It appeared to him that the great object of the Madras Government was to get 10*s.* a year out of a man who had only 8*s.* This was not always an easy task, and tortures, similar in their character to those which were applied in the beginning of the last century, were resorted to for the purpose of extorting the required amount. In certain districts this torture goes on every year; and although the civil servants may deny the fact, it is proved by the testimony of many English merchants. Every statement he had made could be proved by the evidence of the collectors themselves, if the East India Company would produce their Reports. He had applied for them to the President of the Board of Control; but that right hon. Gentleman, not of his own motion, but prompted by Sir James Melvill, would not produce them; if he had, this would not have taken place. It was impossible to obtain any useful information about India, for the Reports and documents laid on the table were always prepared in a most slovenly manner, and were either so meagre as to be of no use, or so voluminous that no one could wade through them;—it was impossible, too, to gather from them information on any particular point, because indexes were carefully omitted. The condition of the country was now very different from what it was twenty years ago. The Presidency of Madras contained 700,000 inhabitants; yet a man, if worth 10,000*l.*, was considered a rich man; a few years ago it contained many rich Armenians; they had all disappeared, the native merchants were bankrupt, and the whole trade had passed into the hands of a few English houses connected with the civil service. All persons engaged in commerce were entirely dependent on the good offices of the Government; an official had only to show indirectly that he did not like a person, and the Natives would take care not to supply him with anything. Mr. Bowman, the manager of the Porto Nuovo Iron Company, had stated to him that they found it impossible to carry on their business in those districts where the collectors were hostile to them. He had himself visited South Arcot and other districts, and the authorities stated that of these about one-fifth was cultivated; but the Natives assured him that one-fiftieth was nearer the proportion. He had travelled for miles through a desert country; the population was in a most miserable condition, and they formed a striking contrast to the Native officials. If there had been greater communication with India some years ago, the bad management would not have been allowed to go on, and things would never have come to their present state. The district through which the Madras Railway passed was a complete desert; the engineer had stated to him that not one-tenth of the ancient waterworks were kept in repair; the Government would neither mend the tanks themselves nor allow the people to do so. The policy adopted presented a striking contrast to that pursued by Mr. Thomason in the North West Provinces, which had been attended with such good results. The Madras officials admitted the wisdom of that gentleman's proceedings, and only regretted that there was not some person in their district of sufficient authority to introduce the same practices, which would be a blessing to the people and produce an enormous revenue to the Government. It might be said that a step had been taken in the right direction, as an order had been sent out not to tax improvements; but why had the execution of that order been delayed for six months after it reached Madras? The people had actually been taxed, although the order of the Directors had arrived out and was known to every servant of the Company. One of the great evils of India was, that the laws were not attended to. The House might pass good laws, but the officials knew the Treasury must be filled; if they disobeyed orders, their conduct might be overlooked; but if the Treasury were not filled, if they did not get the last rupee, they knew that they would lose their places, and that others would get them, and the unfortunate Natives would not be better off. But what was the result of the order he had referred to? At Coimbatore he found that new wells had been dug alongside the old ones. The Government said, "We will not tax the new wells, but the old ones must still be subject to it." The result was, all the old wells were abandoned, and in that district alone 3,000 new wells had been dug at an enormous waste of human labour, caused by that short-sighted policy—that desire to grasp money which defeated its own ends. When he was at the foot of the Neilgherry Hills, he saw at each side of his route the most magnificent vegetation. On inquiry, he found that the collector had with difficulty obtained permission to let about a hundred yards at each side of the road at a rent of 10s. This strip was highly cultivated, but beyond that, land of the same quality lay waste, because the Government demanded 20s., which nobody could afford to pay. The Natives say they cannot touch the land, because if they did they would bring down a host of officials upon them. The labour is there, and the land is there, and both together ought to make capital, yet the Natives were forced to remain idle at home, or emigrate if they wished to do anything. This neglect of the interests of the country and this utter want of common sense appeared incomprehensible; but they proved how just were

the general complaints contained in the Native petition presented last year. Every day facts were coming to light that condemned the East India Company. 150,000,000 of people ought not to be handed over to a bastard Company, a Company only in name, who could not choose their own Directors. They had no interest in the country; their mortgage on the revenue was a mere nothing—it was only an annual charge of 640,000*l.* on a revenue of 27,000,000*l.* No matter how much the country improved, they could not get more than 10½ per cent on their original stock, and it was impossible ever for them to so mismanage the revenue as that it should not meet this charge. Some great alteration must take place, and the country no longer present a spectacle that was a disgrace to human nature. The country on the opposite side of the Neilgherry Hills was in a very different state. The people of the Malabar Coast were opulent and prosperous, because they were not a race to play tricks with; but the Natives of the Coromandel were broken-hearted and dispirited by centuries of oppression. On the Malabar Coast the Moplas were an enterprising and industrious race; they were called the "Yankees" of India. This was the only spot in India where private property in land was recognised; and it was impossible to find a more happy, active, or opulent race than its inhabitants, every man living on his own plot of ground, like a yeoman in England. Surely it would be worth while to try the experiment in other parts of the Presidency, and, if it succeeded, to extend it throughout. When private property in land existed all over the world, why should it not be tried in India? He was glad to think that the Governor General had something of the kind in contemplation, as he saw that a portion of land near Calcutta was to be sold out and out. Perhaps the noble Lord would next turn his attention to the neglected Presidency of Madras. Mr. Norton some time since built a house near the city, where he (Mr. Seymour) had the pleasure of dining with him, and he was astonished to find that his host had not the slightest idea of the position in which he stood towards the Government. The house was built on their land, and he could not tell but that next year the assessment would be raised to the full value of the building, without regard to the money that had been expended on it. It was impossible to expect that English capital could be embarked in the country under such circumstances. The Rev. Mr. Blenkinsopp, one of the Company's chaplains, was anxious, not long ago, to establish his son as a coffee planter, and applied for a lease of a quantity of land. He was informed that he might have a lease for twenty-one years, subject to any conditions, as to rent or otherwise, that the Government might think fit to impose during the interval. The rev. Gentleman very properly refused to embark his money on such terms. The collector finally offered to let him have the ground for twenty-one years, at 2s. an acre, and an undertaking that at the end of the term the rent would not be raised beyond that of the adjoining land. It could not be expected that money would be invested in land on such terms. The Natives were all emigrating to Ceylon, which was becoming a flourishing colony, but India would remain in the neglected and forlorn condition in which it was at present. This question well deserved serious consideration, such as it could not receive from the servants of the Company. The Directors said their officials in India were already too hard worked. This matter required special officials, and if they were not to be found there, they should be sent from this country. It would be no insult to the Government there, and the House would have the whole thing clearly before it, and India would not much longer be left in its present degradation. It was stated that in the south one-half of the gross produce of the wet land and 35 per cent of the dry land was taken by Government; but in the North Western Provinces only one-tenth. Such a difference ought not to exist. 22,000,000 of people were not to be treated in such a way. It was the duty of Government immediately to take some active steps. It would not be sufficient to transfer a Governor from a West Indian colony to the East. However earnest, however clever he might be, it would take years to become acquainted with the nature and wants of the country, and he must almost of necessity fall into the hands of interested parties. The persons best acquainted with Madras admitted that an instant remedy was required. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman, even if he did not accede to the Motion, would, in concert with the Directors, take into consideration the best mode of redressing these grievances, and would avail himself of the services of the old servants of the Company now in England, who were well acquainted with the Presidency of Madras, and consult with them as to the best means of restoring peace and happiness to the suffering people.

SIR JAMES HOGG said, he must say he had seldom heard in that House a speech wherein any hon. Member had dealt so largely in assertion and so little in proof as that of the hon. Member who had just sat down. ["No, no!"] Although that assertion might not meet with the approbation of some hon. Members, he was compelled to say that the statement of his hon. Friend—who had proceeded to India immediately after the House rose last Session for the purpose of collecting information—and he gave him credit for the sincerity of his intentions and his anxious desire to obtain that information—was unsupported by proof. What was the Motion before the House? He (Sir J. W. Hogg) had listened with great attention to the temperate speech made by the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Motion, and who confined himself to the subject-matter, deprecating a general discussion on Indian Government, which question he observed had been fully discussed last Session, and ought not now to be reopened; but what course had the hon. Member for Poole taken? He opened his carpet-bag, produced his memoranda, and dealt out every possible charge on every possible subject from the statements of every person he met with in the course of his tour. The hon. Member had made his speech in support of a Motion for a Commission to proceed from this country to inquire into the affairs of India; but let him beg the House to bear in mind the observations with which he had concluded his speech—that there was no use in referring complaints to the Governor of Madras, because he had been only recently appointed, and that it would require several years before he could become acquainted with the habits and usages of the inhabitants; and further, that persons who went out from this country were very apt to fall into the hands of interested and designing persons, who, with the very best intentions on their part, might lead them wrong. He apprehended that his hon. Friend was a living illustration of the truth of his own remark, for, acting with the best intentions, he had fallen into the hands of interested and designing persons who were in connection with an association at Madras from which had emanated a petition of a more extravagant and unfounded character than any document ho ever remembered to have seen laid on the table of the House or adduced before a Committee; a document which well merited the observation of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Control, that it was a tissue of the grossest mis-statements, the grossest perversions, and the grossest exaggerations. Moreover, when he proceeded on his tour through the country, his hon. Friend, instead of using his own excellent sense and discretion, allowed himself to be attended by two of the emissaries of that very association. Now, he asked the House what was the description of information that could be expected to be gathered by his hon. Friend in a hurried tour, he never having been before in India, and conveyed to him through the medium of two emissaries from such an association? Would it not be of the most exaggerated character? No doubt, his hon. Friend had stated to the House what had been told him and what he believed to be true; but was it a statement upon which the House would like to legislate? But his hon. Friend was betrayed into errors which he had himself adverted to in order to anticipate any remarks he (Sir J. W. Hogg) might make—errors, he considered, which destroyed the utility of the whole inquiry. He admitted that he called the parties before him and made inquiries of them as to the treatment which they had received from the authorities, as if he were deputed by Government. [Mr. DANBY SEYMOUR: I beg the hon. Baronet's pardon. I never said anything of the kind.] At all events, wherever he went that impression was spread by the two emissaries, and the people everywhere assembled around him in multitudes, and were addressed by the emissaries to that effect. His hon. Friend was as incapable as any man in that House of stating that which was not strictly accurate, and he was quite sure his hon. Friend did all he could to remove the misconception spread by the interested persons to whom he had alluded among the ignorant population of the districts they visited; but there could be no doubt that the impression in their minds was that he was proceeding through the south of India as a Royal Commissioner, to whom the people were to come and make their complaints in order that they might be laid at the foot of the Throne and before Parliament. ["No, no!"] That impression was spread abroad and encouraged, he knew, without his hon.

Sir J. Hogg

Friend's knowledge, and he knew further that his hon. Friend took every means to reprobate it, and to state that such an impression was altogether devoid of truth. But he must add that he had also heard—his hon. Friend would correct him if he were present—that attempts were made to levy contributions from the people on the ground that he was a Royal Commissioner, and in order to meet the necessary expenses. His hon. Friend shook his head in dissent—if the charge were incorrect, he would at once withdraw it; but as the justification for having made such a statement, he would read the published report from the two emissaries, made after his hon. Friend's departure from the country. Speaking of a certain place, they said—

"Here the ill-will of the Government was first made manifest to our design; Mr. Seymour was spoken of as a humbug and an agitator, and the people were told that it was of no use their giving money; but this did not prevent the people from coming to Mr. Seymour, nor did it prevent the subscriptions from proceeding."

So that it appears that the hon. Member's tour was made use of by those interested persons as a means of levying subscriptions for the purposes of that association, and that he had been made a dupe of. But the House could easily understand the sensation which the presence of his hon. Friend would excite in districts where, except the judge and the collector, the face of a European was seldom seen. In such a district the hon. Gentleman, he understood, was in the practice of taking out a sheet of paper covered with pictures of various kinds of torture, and asking the people, as he pointed to one or other of the representations, "is that the kind of torture to which you were subjected?" He must think that was an act of grave indiscretion. His hon. Friend had referred, apparently as the strongest case of abuse which he could produce, to the coffee plantation of Mr. Blenkinsopp. Now, what were the facts of the case, even upon his hon. Friend's own showing? Here was a lease of twenty-one years given for the land, together with an obligation that after that period the land should not be more highly taxed than similar land in the district. That was called an absurd and preposterous and an uncertain tenure. But he must beg to tell the House that the rent of all the land in Madras was fixed, and could not be exceeded. That was to say, the best land; the land that was subject to irrigation was subject to a certain rent, which was the maximum rate through the Presidency; inferior land was let according to its presumed lower value, at a lower rate; but every tenant knew at once by looking at the rent of the best land what was the very highest sum which he could possibly be charged. In place of such an arrangement being unreasonable, he contended that it was fair, right, reasonable, and just. Now, if this was—and by the selection it appeared it was—the very worst case of abuse which his hon. Friend could meet with in the whole of his peregrinations through the south of India, then he (Sir J. W. Hogg) did not think that a handsomer compliment could be paid to the Madras Government. As to the other statement his hon. Friend had made respecting Mr. Norton not knowing what he would have to pay for his house, the statement was altogether incomprehensible. The fact was, there was no tax on houses in India. In the three Presidency towns, indeed, there was a house tax to defray the expenses of the police, but in all the rest of India the tax was laid wholly on the land; and if a tenant paid the assessment on the land, he might build upon it or do whatever he pleased without any additional tax. Another of the objections was, that there some change in the title to the land had been introduced, which was represented as a great hardship, when it turned out that the Governor had given to the people of Calcutta the power of redeeming the land. His hon. Friend had also spoken of the energy and industry of the Moplas on the coast of Malabar. He (Sir J. W. Hogg) was sorry to say that official information of a very sad and melancholy character enabled him to bear full testimony to their energy, but it was not the energy of industrious enterprise. They were, in fact, a parcel of ruffians who infested the country, and murdered men for the sake of religious bigotry. These were the men who had been selected for the eulogy and panegyric of his hon. Friend; for his part, he wondered that his hon. Friend did not shudder at the very mention of the Moplas. Then his hon. Friend had introduced a charge against the Government in the case of the Porto Nuovo iron mines. He (Sir J. W. Hogg) did think that these statements, which of course his hon. Friend had received from the Porto Nuovo Company, betrayed the very extreme of audacity. What were the facts of the case? So anxious were the Indian Government to encourage the iron mines of Porto Nuovo that they advanced one sum of money to the Company after another till they had paid the sum of 100,000*l.*, which they might as well have thrown into the sea. A new Company was started, and this new Company was patronised by his right hon. Friend the President of the India Board and by the majority of the Court of Directors, who gave the new Company an assignment of the 100,000*l.* advanced to the old Company for 10,000*l.* paid down. He was happy and proud to say that, though he was in a minority, he resisted this arrangement, for he did not see why the money of the people of India should be taken to encourage a scheme, which, however beneficial it might ultimately prove, was only a private speculation. Now, was not his hon. Friend astounded at the audacity of the parties who had so misled him? [Mr. SEYMOUR: Not at all.] Then his hon. Friend would make a very bad Commissioner, and if his right hon. Friend should think of sending out a Commissioner to India, he hoped the hon. Member for Poole would not be appointed. Complaints had also been made with respect to the want of encouragement of mercantile firms at Calcutta, but no complaint had been made to the Government of India about it, and it was a little suspicious to find persons coming to the House of Commons for a remedy which they could have obtained from the local Government. Returns, it was said, had been refused, but those returns were private and confidential returns from the revenue officers to the Government, and it would be highly detrimental to produce such returns unless there were circumstances which rendered it absolutely necessary to do so. The complaint, therefore, on that head, he considered not well founded. His hon. Friend had also sneered at the Governor General, and talked of his arrangement of the Punjaub as his “pet Punjaub scheme.” Now, he would ask those hon. Members who had read Lord Dalhousie’s Report upon the affairs of the Punjaub, whether it was a fit subject for sneers? To his mind, it would ever remain the most enduring monument of the energy, the ability, the wisdom, and the administrative skill of the Governor General. The annals of the world could not show another such instance of a country in a state of anarchy and confusion, being, as if by magic, transformed into a land of order, and peace, and industry, yielding a large revenue to the conquerors. His hon. Friend sneered at Lord Dalhousie's frequent absences from Calcutta. It was true that, soon after returning from the Punjab, he again left Calcutta; but he left it to proceed to Pegu, the seat of war, in order that by his presence he might expedite operations, and bring hostilities to a speedy close. He believed they never had a Governor General who at greater personal sacrifice had seen more of the country than Lord Dalhousie; and yet, apparently because the Governor General did not come to meet his hon. Friend in his peregrinations, he thought fit to sneer at him for visiting every part of India except Madras. He (Sir J. W. Hogg) was sorry that his hon. Friend (Mr. Danby Seymour) should have thought it necessary to refer to past times in order to endeavour to throw imputations upon those who had ruled India. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the speculation of the Company's servants; but if solitary instances of the kind had occurred a hundred years ago, he (Sir J. W. Hogg) thought the integrity which had distinguished the civil service of India during the last sixty years might have prevented the hon. Gentleman from raking up such charges from the ashes of the past. The hon. Gentleman, however, went on to say that such cases might occur now, and he had the hardihood to assert that the East India Company screened the defaulters, and gave them pensions derived from the revenues of India. Now, the only case to which the hon. Gentleman could have referred was that of an officer in the civil service. In that case the defaulter was tried and convicted; he was entitled to a pension of 1,000*l.* a year, for which he had paid month by month from his salary, and in that sense had fully earned it: when he came home he found that the Directors had deprived him of the full amount. Was that screening an offender? The defaulter applied to the Court of Queen's Bench, who said the "screening" East India Directors had pressed too heavily upon him, that as he had paid towards his pension he was entitled to it, and they ordered that it should be restored to him. He must apologise to the House for having detained them so long on these questions, and he turned with pleasure to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who made this Motion (Mr. Blackett), in whose statements there was much that met his concurrence. Had the debate been allowed to rest upon that able and pertinent speech, it need not have lasted an hour. That there were evils connected with the land tenure all were ready to admit, and the only question was, how they were to be remedied; he could assure the hon. Gentleman that it was his own wish, and the desire of all who had an interest or a part in the administration of India, to ascertain the best remedy for those evils, but he could also assure the hon. and learned Member that it was no easy matter to discover what the best remedy was. The hon. and learned Mover knew very well, from the researches which it was plain he had made, that this subject had engaged the attention of the greatest, the wisest, and the best informed men that had been connected with India. There were differences of opinion, not only as to principle, but even with regard to facts. With regard, now, to this very ryotwarry system, that was now held to be so execrable, perhaps the House was not aware that its author was no less a person than Sir Thomas Munro, who was at first opposed to it; but after communicating with its first advocate (Colonel Reid) he became a convert to it, and the ryotwarry system, wherever it now prevailed, was introduced by the Court of Directors on the representations and advice of Sir Thomas Munro. Now, Sir T. Munro was not led to that conclusion by any views of political economy, but his main argument in favour of the ryotwarry system was, that it did away with middlemen, and that the same man was landlord, tenant, and labourer, deriving, from the union of the three characters, the benefits accruing from each. Not only so, but Sir Charles Metcalfe, when he introduced the system of what was called the North Western Settlement, said, he gave up the ryotwarry system with reluctance, but he found he could not introduce it without giving up the system of village tenure—that system of little village republics which had preserved the population of India unchangeable amidst the fall of so many dynasties. As between the ryotwarry system and the zemindary system, the preference was not so apparent as his hon. Friend seemed to suppose. The Government must in every case be a better landlord than the zemindar, and if the zemindar were to come in the place of the Government, he would have the same difficulty to deal with. Was the zemindar a more considerate landlord than the Government, where he had the power in his own hands? Was he so in Bengal? The very reverse was the case. And yet the zemindary system was introduced by Lord Cornwallis, another benefactor of India; and that system was then as much lauded as the North Western system was now. The hon. and learned Member had told them that a system was now tried in the neighbourhood of Bombay—which he (Sir J. W. Hogg) hoped would be successful. It was a maintenance of the ryotwarry system thus far—that the land was divided into fields, each of which was held by one individual; the quality of the land was ascertained by an accurate survey, and a particular price was put upon it which was admitted on all hands to be moderate. It was provided that the bargain should be binding upon the Government for thirty years; for that term the ryot might, if he pleased, retain possession, and his rent could not be raised a single farthing. But the tenant had this advantage—that at the end of a year he had the option of giving up the whole of his holding, or as much of it as he thought fit, and at any time during the term of thirty years he might relinquish his tenancy by giving a year's notice. He (Sir J. W. Hogg) must confess that he thought this was going rather too far, and that such a regulation might tend to destroy that feeling of responsibility which would induce a tenant to endeavour to fulfil his contract and to pay the stipulated rent. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Blackett) had truly said, that a great deal of ground in Madras was too highly taxed, because the price of grain had fallen so considerably that rates of assessment which were perfectly fair in Sir T. Munro's days were exorbitant now. This circumstance showed the necessity of improving the means of communication and public works in India, for, if the production of grain was increased beyond the amount required for consumption in a particular district, means ought to be provided for conveying the surplus elsewhere. He (Sir J. W. Hogg) hoped and believed that the system of communication which had been established in the southern districts of Bombay, and which was nearly completed in the northern districts, would be extended to Madras, for the subject was now prominently engaging the attention of the Indian Government. If this system should be found to succeed in Bombay, it might be applied to Madras; he used the word "might," because the more a man read and investigated, the more cautious he would become in deciding summarily upon the affairs of India. The hon. and learned Member had talked of sending Commissioners in India; but if they searched the whole of Her Majesty's dominions, they would not find such a Commissioner as they had now in India in the person of Lord Dalhousie. That noble Lord was the Queen's Commissioner; it was his duty to superintend matters of this kind; and the subject was now engaging his most anxious attention. To show what differences of opinion might occur, even among men of great talent and information, upon questions of this kind, he (Sir J. W. Hogg) might mention that Sir T. Munro had argued that the ryotwarry system was the original system which prevailed throughout India, while Colonel Wilks and others contended that the village system was, if not the universal, at all events the general system of India. In the course of this discussion the characters of the Natives had been stigmatised by some hon. Gentlemen; but he might remind the House of the obloquy which was last year heaped upon the Court of Directors, because they did not employ in offices of importance those very Natives who were now the objects of attack, and who, it was contended, ought to be eligible to become members of the Council. He hoped and believed that the native officers in India would become honest in time, when they were better paid, and he did not think, considering their station in life, and the rule under which their forefathers had lived, that it was fair to stigmatise their conduct so strongly. He had been astonished to hear it said that British rule would deteriorate the Hindoo race. ["Hear, hear!"] That might be a very sentimental and patriotic cheer, but for his own part he believed that the British rule was regenerative, and he knew that under that rule the blessings of education were being diffused throughout India. It must be remembered, however, that the regeneration of a people was not the work of a year, or of twenty years, or of fifty years, or even of a century; but if, at the expiration of a century, a visible and marked progress was apparent among the people of India, the British nation would have reason to be thankful for the good they had effected. He considered that the greatest evils to which India had been subjected had arisen from attempts to force upon the people of that country English notions and habits; and he believed that the wisest course would have been, instead of attempting to apply any particular system of tenure to the whole of India, or to any of the Presidencies, to have studied the feelings and habits peculiar to the different districts, to have adopted and protected the tenure found to be existing, and to have removed as far as possible all possibility of speculation. That had been the plan adopted so successfully in the North West Provinces by Mr. Thomason, who took things as he found them, protected the weak against the strong, and ascertained by careful survey the quality of the soil in every field, however small, and the extent to which various parties were interested in the property. He (Sir J. W. Hogg) admitted that there were evils attaching to the present system of tenure which ought to be remedied; and he had no doubt that Lord Dalhousie, if he found it necessary, would send persons thoroughly acquainted with the subject to institute an inquiry in the Presidency of Madras. He hoped it would not be thought advisable to send out from this country Commissioners whose knowledge of the matters to be investigated must necessarily be limited, and thus to supersede the Governor General in the main points of his government—the care of the people committed to his charge, and the raising of a revenue in the manner most profitable to the State and least oppressive to the people.

MR. BRIGHT said, that he was sorry that the hon. Baronet the Member for Honiton (Sir J. W. Hogg) had left his place, for, had he been there, he (Mr. Bright) intended to remark that he could not help thinking that the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. D. Seymour) would have felt that his speech had not been entirely without effect from the apparent indignation with which the hon. Baronet had risen to answer him, and had, after all, succeeded very poorly in the answer which he had attempted. It had struck him (Mr. Bright), as it must have done every Member, that the speech of the hon. Member for Poole was one of those speeches which it was impossible to answer, unless parties chose to say they did not believe a single word which the hon. Member had stated, he only having told of things which he had seen. The hon. Member for Poole had gone to India on an occasion and for a purpose which did him great credit, and he (Mr. Bright) could not conceive anything which would prove more advantageous than if hon. Members, instead of visiting the Rhine, Switzerland, or the Highlands of Scotland, should, in the ensuing autumn, betake themselves to India for the purpose of investigating the state of the country, and especially of the Presidency of Madras, as was done by the hon. Member for Poole. The hon. Member for Honiton had taken greater latitude on this question than he was willing to allow to any one else. He said that the hon. Member for Poole had come down to the House with his carpet-bag, opened it, and brought forward all that he had gathered during his journey in India, and the hon. Baronet had given them a great many facts—or, rather, what he called facts—but he (Mr. Bright) had heard the speech of to-night made by the hon. Baronet at least four times before, and knew precisely what he was going to say every successive Session when he rose for the purpose of refuting, or of attempting to refute, the views advanced by a certain party in this House who were called Indian reformers. The hon. Baronet had charged the Member for Poole with going to Madras and allying himself with a Native association. He (Mr. Bright) would like to know with what party in Madras it would have been more proper for the hon. Member to have allied himself than with an association formed of intelligent Natives, anxious to communicate to Parliament such information as might advance the interests of their country? The information received by the hon. Member for Poole was nothing more than had been confirmed by every work recently written on the Presidency of Madras, and he (Mr. Bright) knew, from conversations that he had had with his hon. Friend, that he had not made any statements with reference to the Presidency of Madras, or of what he had heard from parties connected with the association, that had not been confirmed by information derived from English military and civil servants of the Indian Government. It could not be attributed as a matter of blame to the hon. Member for Poole that, as he went through the country, crowds of people came round him, and certainly if, as had been said, they never saw an Englishman but a tax collector, it must have been a refreshing sight to have found out an Englishman in India who was not a tax collector. They had the fact of an Englishman and a Member of Parliament travelling through the Presidency of Madras, met by large numbers of Natives, who came to take encouragement from him, to tell him their grievances, and to ask him to be their messenger to this House of Commons. This could not be taken as a condemnation of the hon. Member or the Natives of India; but it was a most conclusive condemnation of that Government which had left the people of India with grievances, not only unredressed, but unheard and uninquired into for upwards of 100 years, during which India had been in the possession of this country. The hon. Baronet had said that somebody had made subscriptions when the hon. Member for Poole had gone through the country, and had insinuated that this was for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the hon. Member's journey, and had let this assertion down by saying that the funds were collected ostensibly for the purposes of the association; and what could be more legitimate than that funds should have been collected for the association? Even if this were true, what could be more natural than that the Natives of India should subscribe for the purpose of sending written or published evidence, or special messengers, if they thought right, in order to lay their grievances before Parliament? They were aware that before the Committee evidence had been taken from the servants of the Company, as many as chose to come, and the more welcome they were if their evidence was found to be favourable to the Company. Surely the hon. Baronet would not assert that the Natives of India under his rule and that of his compeers were not to subscribe for the purpose of laying their grievances before Parliament, and of claiming redress? The hon. Baronet was very much surprised at the story of the clergyman who would not invest his capital under the admirable terms offered by the Government, and said that he was only charged the same as his neighbours, and had no reason to find fault; but the charge was, that the neighbours had been charged too much, plundered, and ruined, and the English clergyman was rather more awake and less dependent than his neighbours, and refused to invest his capital on the terms offered by the hon. Baronet. This was generally the case as regarded the settlement of Englishmen, and Mr. Melville, in his evidence, had stated that there were no more Englishmen engaged in manufactures or the cultivation of the soil in India at the passing of the Act of last Session than there were at the passing of the Act of 1834. This was explained by the jealousy with which anything like independent opinion was regarded in India, and any Englishman who settled there, if he did not make a friend of the collector and the Government, could not hope for considerable or permanent success. He should say that, of all the charges and articles of impeachment and condemnation brought against the Indian Government, this was the most conclusive—that, though it had possessed the country for periods varying from twenty to 100 years, yet there were not at this moment as many Englishmen engaged in the interior of the country in agriculture and manufacturing operations as would make one side of the House in a fair division on an important party question. If India had been in the hands of any other country in the world, or under any other Government than that of which the hon. Baronet had formed a part, he (Mr. Bright) believed that this state of things would not have arisen. Had it been in the possession of a despotic prince, he would certainly have had a direct interest in its success and improvement;—had it been under the rule of a democratic Government, it would have stimulated progress and civilisation by the force of its energy. The present state of things could not have arisen, excepting under a corporation by which it was governed, of which it was said—he quoted the words of a distinguished historian—“It was deaf to mercy, and insensible to shame.” Unless it had been so, the population of Madras would not have been as they are;—and the hon. Baronet had not attempted to prove that the population of Madras were not in the abject and miserable condition described by the hon. and learned Member who had introduced this Motion—he had, on the contrary, attempted to justify the acts of that shameless corporation. The real question before the House was as to whether the Government should appoint a Commission to proceed to the Presidency of Madras to gather evidence on the spot as to the condition of the people, as connected with the tenure of land, and the taxation on that land. He was not going to contend that it was of much importance as to whether this Commission should go out; something might be said in its favour, and something might be urged against it, and, no doubt, they might choose two or three men in India as honest on this question as any who could be chosen in England, and who, doubtless, from their position, would more easy access to information, and who would probably draw up as satisfactory a Report as any other gentlemen. He would not quarrel with the President of the Board of Control if he did not send out this Commission; but he thought the right hon. Gentleman would fail in his duty if he did not, as a result of this discussion, promote the inquiry recommended, with a view of bringing about the improvements which even the hon. Member for Honiton had admitted to be necessary. He (Mr. Bright) had not done that hon. Baronet justice in saying that his speech of to-night was similar to those formerly made, for he had not made precisely the same speech—he had improved a little, as his admissions were more than on former occasions, and his assertions had been a little less courageous. What was in truth the condition of Madras? It was generally admitted that large tracts of land were lying waste, while great numbers of the population were scarcely employed—were almost absolutely naked, and in a state of physical weakness, arising from the want of the common necessities of life. This was proved by books, papers, Parliamentary Reports, and a number of witnesses. All the evidence that had been adduced tended to prove this fact. And what was the conclusion? That the land was not unfertile, but so heavily taxed that there was scarcely any profit from working it; and between the miserable pittance derived from it and the large revenue drawn from it by the State, the whole of the annual produce of the land was absorbed, so that the land had no saleable value. This was a state of things which could not always prove advantageous to the Government, and must always prove pernicious and destructive to the people. In this district, notwithstanding the large resurreptions of land by the Government, many of which were, in his opinion, unjust and disgraceful, the land revenue had not only not increased, but had declined; and this was a state of things in the continuance of which neither the Government nor the people could long be interested. The hon. Baronet the Member for Honiton had charged the hon. Member for Poole with retailing the stories heard in the country about torture, and wished the House to suppose that he referred to the practice of torture in the collection of the revenue; but would the hon. Baronet deny that the practice of torture was not an unfrequent occurrence? Evidence of this the hon. Member for Poole had gathered from the evidence of Englishmen—collectors and officials—and he had also gathered evidence of that which was yet more horrible than anything which he durst state to this House. The evidence of Mr. Fisher, a most highly respectable merchant in India, given in Mr. Norton's book, clearly showed what could be done. He stated that—

“If the ryot cannot pay his rent, little consideration is paid to him. Every species of severity is tried to enforce payment—the thumbcrew, bending his head to his feet and tying him in that position, and making him stand in the sun, sometimes with a large stone on his back—all which failing, his property is sequestered and sold, and he is ruined and let loose on society to live by begging, borrowing, or stealing. Thousands are ruined in this way.”

The fact was quite clear that the taxation was so unjust and onerous that it was impossible to pay it; and then cruelties were resorted to unknown to civilised countries, and scarcely fit for the barbarous Governments which the British Government in India had supplanted. The collector's subordinates had the excuse, so far as they were concerned, that if they did not, somehow or other, extort the rent from the wretched ryot, they were themselves dismissed as negligent in their duty. The hon. Baronet had favoured the House with a dissertation on ryotwarry to very little purpose, for any system, by whatever name known, whether zemindarry or ryotwarry, which tore from the cultivator three-fourths of the produce of the soil, was a system which impoverished the tiller of the soil and crushed improvement. It was perfectly natural that the hon. Baronet should censure the hon. Member for Poole for stating unpalatable truths. It was part of the system of the Government to which the hon. Baronet belonged to suppress all such impertinent exposures by dogmatic assertion and arrogant abuse. The Government of Madras had given a flagrant illustration of this principle of action in the outrageous conduct they had pursued towards their own Commissioners, whom they had pursued with insult and contumely for stating how matters really stood as to the question of public works into which they had been directed to inquire. It was expedient that care should be taken that, if the Commissioners suggested were appointed, they should be protected from insults such as these on the part of any antiquated provincial or presidential Governor, whose narrow prejudices they might happen to wound. It was deeply gratifying to turn from such officials and contemplate officers like Colonel Cotton, whose exertions in the promotion of drainage and irrigation in India had done immortal honour to himself, and had conferred a lasting benefit to the country to which his eminent services were applied. Let not the hon. Member for Honiton suppose that hon. Members were actuated by motives inferior to his own. What was sought in such Motions as that before the House was simply that India should be governed in the manner most consistent with the true dignity of this country and with the true interests of India herself; and having been the means of subjugating 100,000,000 or 150,000,000 of people to the rule of the Sovereign of this country, what was so befitting the consideration of Parliament as the grave question now under consideration? It was perfectly competent in us to do far more for India than had been done for her by her ancient rulers; and he trusted that, so far as these discussions should be permitted to reach the natives of India, they would convince them that it was the desire of that House to apply sound principles to the government of India, and to confer upon that country all the civilisation and all the accompaniments of civilisation which it was possible to confer upon a country so differing in its conditions from our own.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would not, in the brief observations he should make, follow hon. Gentlemen in the discurative discussion they had entered upon, but confine himself altogether to the point which the hon. and learned Gentleman, in his temperate speech, had propounded—namely, the tenure of land in India. To a considerable extent he concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, that it was of little use for Members to come there and detail specific instances of alleged abuses which it was not possible for the House to inquire into or to remedy, while absolute silence as to those alleged abuses was observed towards the authorities on the spot, who could inquire into the truth of the story and apply a remedy. It seemed to him, for example, quite unintelligible how the respectable merchant of Calcutta, who was said to have sustained such injuries near Madras, had not sought redress from the authorities at Madras. [MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, the gentleman had applied for redress, and had got it.] He was very glad to hear that; but then there was no imputation whatever on the Government. As to the existence of many evils in India, no one denied that such evils existed; what he denied now, as on former occasions, was, that the tenure of land had occasioned those evils. The hon. Member for Poole himself admitted that the cause of these evils was to be found in the over-assessment of land, and had given an example where the assessment, having been reduced, land had been brought into a state of the highest and most advantageous cultivation. The Motion of the hon. and learned Member was not for an inquiry into the assessment of land, but into the tenure by which it was held. Now, that tenure could have nothing to do with the condition of the peasantry; for if the assessment were not altered, it would make no difference whether the ryotwarry or the zemindarry tenure prevailed. He was surprised that his hon. Friend had not referred to modern as well as to ancient authorities upon the subject of the tenure of land, as not only Sir T. Munro, but almost all the authorities to which the hon. Member for Manchester had referred as impartial and trustworthy, had given the most decisive testimony in favour of the ryotwarry tenure in India. Throughout the greater part of the Madras Presidency that was the native tenure, and the greatest evil with regard to the tenure of land which had ever been inflicted upon India had been inflicted by the attempts which had been made to introduce English tenures, which were utterly contrary to the habits and customs of the country. No greater example than that of Madras could be adduced to prove the folly of sending out English gentlemen to carry out English notions with respect to the tenure of land in India, and in that Presidency the attempt was a most signal failure. In some cases they found that avillage tenure, and in others that a ryotwarry tenure existed; but they chose to introduce a zemindarry tenure, and sold up the whole district in order to do so. But in the course of twenty years the whole of the zemindars were sold up, and they were forced back to the ryotwarry tenure, finding it impossible, after causing the greatest misery, to carry out the system they had endeavoured to introduce. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's argument about employing Native officers for the purpose of collecting the revenue, he would ask what would be the case if the ryots were handed over to the tender mercies of the zemindars? Were the ryots in Bengal, who were under the zemindars, in better position than the ryots who were under the Government of Madras? He would appeal to the books to which reference had been made, in proof of the lenient treatment of the ryots by the Government of Madras, in comparison with their treatment by the zemindars. It was obvious that this must be the case, for the zemindar was a middleman between the Government and the ryot, and would, therefore, make a profit out of the ryot in addition to the rent he paid. His hon. and learned Friend said, it was absolutely necessary to have certainty of tenure, and that, therefore, they must do away with the ryotwarry system; but that was a system which in India gave the greatest certainty of tenure, because under it the ryot held the land for ever, so long as he paid the rent; while, under the system of the North West Provinces and Bombay, he had only a lease for thirty years, and under the zemindarry system he was always at the mercy of his landlord. Why, then, should they substitute for the indefeasible right to land which existed under the ryotwarry system, the thirty years' lease of it which existed in the North West Provinces, or the tenure, nearly at the will of the zemindars, under the zemindarry tenure? The hon. Member for Newcastle had quoted the evidence of Mr. Bourdillon, a most able and intelligent man, with regard to the Presidency of Madras. Mr. Bourdillon said, that nowhere was land clung to with greater affection than in India; it descended from father to son, and could be claimed notwithstanding its having been allowed to go out of cultivation. Mr. Fisher, another authority which the hon. Member for Manchester had quoted, said, the ryots could not have a more permanent interest in the soil than they at present possessed, for if a ryot had fifty acres, and only cultivated ten, he only paid for those ten, and no one dare interfere with the remainder. This, no doubt, accounted to a considerable degree for the quantity of land that appeared to have gone out of cultivation, for the ryot cultivated no more than suited him, and only paid for what he cultivated. Then, with regard to the point of the greater certainty of the ryotwarry than of any other system, he would quote, not any servant of, or any one who might be supposed to be friendly to the East India Company, but Mr. Mackay, who had been sent out by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce to inquire, among other things, into the tenure of land in India. Mr. Mackay was of opinion that the ryotwarry tenure was the only one upon which the solid foundation of a land tenure could be raised. Mr. Norton, who would not be very favourable to the Company, was also of opinion, after having resided for some time in the country, that the ryotwarry system was the best that could exist. Mr. Fisher also expressed a similar opinion; he said they knew what the ryotwarry system was—as long as a man paid a certain assessment he had his land. He admitted that, generally speaking, the assessment was so high, but that did not alter the tenure of the land, to which, as long as a man paid his assessment, he knew that he had an indefeasible right. Mr. Bourdillon said the defects of the system were not practically felt, as land was bought and sold, and capital invested in it, without the least hesitation, on account of the certainty of the tenure. He thought it would not be necessary to add more upon the subject, although there were several authorities which he might quote to the same effect; and it might be fairly assumed that this ryotwarry system was the most certain tenure we could have in India. He believed that great ruin and misery had been entailed upon India by the attempts of benevolent gentlemen to force English notions of tenure upon an Oriental people, accustomed to widely different notions, to which they were deeply attached. No doubt those who engaged in this attempt had done so with the most benevolent motives, but the effect of these measures had been wide-spread ruin and misery. It was to one of those Anglo-Indians, who had been so slightly referred to in the course of the debate, that we owed the system now in operation in the North West Provinces, which had answered so well, being simply adopting and improving the system already known to the Natives. Where the village system prevailed the inhabitants were dealt with on that footing; if there was a landlord, that agreement was recognised; and in like manner if the ryotwarry system existed that was assumed as the basis of operations. Now, in the greater part of Madras the Natives were accustomed to the ryotwarry system in the times of their Native princes, and that system was, therefore, on the recommendation of Sir Thomas Munro, continued in the districts where it had formerly prevailed. Sir George Clerk, in his evidence before the Committee of last year, distinctly stated that it was impossible to re-establish the village system when once it had broken down; and Mr. Norton's book contained a most forcible argument against this system as not so well calculated as the ryotwarry system to promote the welfare of the people. He believed nothing could be more fatal than any attempt to subvert the present system and to replace it by one founded on European notions, and he therefore believed that nothing could be more useless, or, if it produced any effect at all, more pernicious, than to send out a Commission from this country. But although he thought it would be impolitic and unwise to attempt to interfere with the tenure of land, he was far from thinking that there were not many evils in the present system which it would be advisable to attempt to remedy, and among them, no doubt, was the assessment of the land. He had always felt that the executive Government ought to take such measures as would put that assessment upon a reasonable and proper footing. With a view to attain that object, when a new Governor of the Presidency of Madras was to be appointed, a gentleman had been nominated whose name was never mentioned without honour (Mr. Thomson), because, of all men who had ever lived, he had shown himself possessed of a peculiar faculty of discovering what was suited to the peculiar condition of every part of the country, and of selecting the instruments for carrying out his designs with the greatest possible ability. But this gentleman had been unfortunately cut off in the midst of his most useful and benevolent career, even before the news of his appointment reached him. The Governor General had proposed to him to send out a Commission to inquire, not into the tenure of land, but into the assessment upon the land; but he considered that the Government of Madras, without losing time in inquiries, might in many cases at once apply an adequate remedy, and he had pressed that opinion upon Lord Harris, not only before he went to his Government, but in every letter he had since written to him, as he had no doubt that one of the first steps towards putting the revenue upon a satisfactory footing would be the reduction of the assessment in many cases. He believed that it would be necessary to reduce the assessment, and that, although the first result of such a step might be to decrease the revenue, its ultimate effect would be to increase it, by stimulating cultivation. The hon. Member for Poole had been kind enough to give him some credit for having paid attention to this subject. He could only say that, from the time he had been appointed to fill the situation he had now the honour to hold, he had felt that it was one of awful responsibility, and he had laid these matters to his heart, and had done his best to introduce every possible improvement into the administration of that country. It was, however, impossible, when old habits and feelings had to be rooted out, that improvements could be effected in two or three months. He believed that if there was an improvement in the system of collecting the land revenue, and if, by means of a large expenditure on public works, the people were placed in possession both of greater facilities for internal communication and better means of cultivating the soil by irrigation, Madras would not long continue the benighted land that it was said now to be, but that we should see a great improvement in that Presidency, which he was aware stood more in need of it, and was at the same time more susceptible of it, than any other part of India. He hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend would not think it necessary to take the sense of the House upon his proposition, which, even if it were carried, would lead to no good result.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he thought the President of the Board of Control had put the question upon a totally fallacious foundation. They were not discussing the relative merits of the zemindarry and ryotwarry systems, but simply whether—as administered in the Presidency of Madras—the working of the ryotwarry system was not disgraceful to a Christian Government. The fact was that, under the system of land tenure at present existing in Madras, not one-fifth of the soil was under cultivation; and that, to extort the enormous rents now wrung from the miserable cultivators of the soil, torture was not unfrequently employed. Such a state of things as that he thought certainly demanded inquiry from an English House of Commons. It was stated, too, in a Report emanating from the servants of the East India Company, that farming in India was at present a wild speculation, which no reasonable man would undertake; and that land was quite unsaleable in the market. Was that a state of things which should be permitted to continue? The ryots were not allowed to cultivate as much or as little as they pleased; and the fact was that the country was reduced to the lowest state of degradation, and that the whole state of things was so flagrant and disgraceful that any means by which so foul a blot could be wiped from the British name ought to be adopted.

MR. MANGLES said, the whole question lay in a very small compass. It was, as his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Control had said, not a question of tenure, it was a question of assessment; and the proof that it was not a question of tenure was to be found in the flourishing condition of the Canara district, where the ryotwarry system had been long established.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the hon. Gentleman who had brought forward this Motion must be quite satisfied with what had taken place, and with what had been said by the President of the Board of Control and by the other Gentlemen who had taken part in the discussion, and who, although they did not agree that the question had been properly introduced to the House as a question of tenure, had admitted the misery of the people, had admitted that excessive rents were exacted, and had not denied that those rents were extorted by torture. He confessed that he had been astonished that neither the hon. Baronet the Member for Honiton, nor the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Control, had said a single word in contradiction of the fact, which the hon. Member for Manchester had broadly stated, that torture had been resorted to for the purpose of obtaining payments of rents which were avowedly excessive. He thought that it would strike the British public with surprise, that no Member of the Government had denied what was, at all events, a most appalling statement. People might naturally think that this was a question of tenure when, the excessive amount of the rents being admitted, instead of the rents being reduced, the first step was the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the mode of collecting them. It showed how these questions were dodged about. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had given them a starting point—he said that the people would not cultivate the land because they were required to pay more rent than they could afford to pay; and he said, also, that the time for consideration was past, and that the time had come to act. The latter admission, taken in connection with the first, could only mean that the Government had resolved that the excess of rent should be reduced. Whenever that should take place a larger quantity of land would be brought under cultivation, and the revenue, instead of diminishing, would increase. The Motion had been of service, if only for extracting these declarations from the President of the Board of Control; but it was desirable that before the discussion closed the House should hear something from the Government upon the subject of the alleged application of torture.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that having been pointedly referred to, he could only say that he did not believe the statement; but having heard the allegation for the first time that evening, it was wholly impossible that he could give it an authoritative contradiction without reference to Madras. It was impossible to prove a negative, but the statement having been now made, he would undertake that inquiry should be made.

MR. MANGLES said, it was impossible to prove a negative; but he could solemnly declare that he had never, during the many years he was in India, heard of a single case of torture having been resorted to in Madras for the purpose of collecting the revenue.

MR. V. SCULLY said, instances of it were recorded in the evidence. In one of the works quoted by the President of the Board of Control, it was positively stated that pressure upon the head in the heat of the sun had been inflicted until money was extorted. This was a most terrible state of things, which he could not believe would be allowed to continue. The question, however, had nothing to do with the Motion, which was for an inquiry into the tenure of land in India. This had been met by the right hon. Gentleman with a mere quibble that the question was one of assessment. But this was a mere play on terms—tenure included assessment. India, like Ireland, was rated at rack-rents, and that was its tenure. The tenure of land was at the basis of the prosperity of a country. The case of Ireland was an illustration of the system. By looking at the face of a country you could see what the tenure of its land was. In Belgium, for instance, the tenure was far better than in this country, as the agriculture was superior; while, on the other hand, in Syria it was abominable. This applied remarkably to India, where the ryotwarry system was ruinous. He could not collect from the speech of the right hon. Baronet (Sir C. Wood) why the inquiry should be resisted; but the right hon. Gentleman certainly was very warm against the proposition. He thought a strong case had been made out for inquiry, and he should support the Motion.

MR. OTWAY said, he was astonished to hear from the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles) that he had never heard of the infliction of torture in India, when he must know that a Motion for inquiry into the subject had recently been made at one of the meetings of the Court of Proprietors, but had been stifled in the way in which inconvenient motions generally were at the India House. But he (Mr. Otway) knew that the practice of torture did prevail in India, and to put the matter beyond doubt he would read part of a letter addressed by a gentleman (Mr. Theobald); a member of the Calcutta bar, to the hon. Member for Poole, in which he showed beyond doubt that the practice did prevail. It was as follows—

"We have had news of the course of your inquiries, and of some of their results. Almost every vice and abuse flourishes in India. Your discovery of the practice of torture is no news to me. I believe it is practised in every lock-up house in Calcutta. In the Mofussil I had personal proof of it not long ago. Two ladies, a gentleman and myself, went up to Burrackpore, in a palkeegharre, having a coarse bag containing 400 rupees, which was certainly in the gharry just before our arrival, but was missed on arrival. After fruitless inquiry it was proposed to use the thumbcrew, and we were assured by that means the thief could be discovered; we refused permission, but were assured it was a common practice."

It was high time to depart from a system in which such practices are common. The root of the evil, in my opinion, lies in the civil service; one man is placed officially over a million of people, scattered over some thousands of square miles, and everything depends on his virtue and ability. It is absurd to make such distinctions between him and all the uncovenanted; he is the tyrant over all and is too apt to be hoodwinked by the clever but low class of Natives. Really the civilian governs only in name, the real governors are the knavish Natives. The support, also, which civilians uniformly receive at head quarters makes them virtually irresponsible. There is a mutual compact among the members of this class which defeats all complaints against them, though complaints often are made, and are well founded.

MR. MANGLES explained that what he had said was, that he had never heard of torture being applied for the purpose of the collection of the revenue; though he had heard of torture being inflicted by police officers, who exceeded their authority, for the purpose of extorting confessions from criminals.

MR. ELLIOT said, that during a service of thirty years in India, and in connection with its administration, he had never heard of torture having been used for the purpose of collecting rent. He had not heard of such a thing until it was mentioned in that night's debate. He did not believe such a practice existed at Bengal or Madras. There might have been individual instances of misconduct on the part of Natives of India in authority; but he was perfectly satisfied that torture had never been resorted to as a system for the purpose of collecting revenue in any part of India. He might add that he had never heard of such a thing as a thumb-screw being used in India.

CONSTABULARY FORCE—IRELAND.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that, in bringing forward this Motion, he was not actuated by any feeling of sectarianism; but his object was to ascertain if there had been any unfair dealing with reference to promotion in the constabulary force; for, if anything of the kind existed, it was calculated to prejudice the character of the force. The main body of that force consisted of Roman Catholics, and it appeared that they had been almost entirely excluded from promotion. The whole force consisted of about 12,500 men, of whom, as well as he could ascertain, 9,000 were Roman Catholics, and the remaining 3,500 were Protestants. With regard to the officers of that force, there was one inspector general, who was a Protestant; two deputy inspectors, also Protestants; two assistant deputy inspectors, Protestants; and thirty-five county inspectors, who were all Protestants, with the exception of one, appointed since he had given notice of his Motion. The House must bear in mind that it was upon the recommendation of the county inspectors that all promotions from the lower grades were made. The paymasters, receivers, and surgeons were all Protestants. In the whole country there were 248 sub-inspectors, and of them 219 were Protestants; there were 322 head-constables, 268 of whom were Protestants; 1,800 constables, 1,300 of whom were Protestants; but of the sub-constables, who composed the main body of the force, the number of Catholics was 8,300, and of Protestants, 1,600. The effect of this system had been to induce many sub-constables to leave the force and to emigrate. He did not make this Motion, as he had just stated, with any sectarian spirit, for if the picture had been reversed, and if there were an undue promotion of Catholics, he should have still more willingly brought the circumstance under the notice of the House. The great power of this force was derived from the respect entertained for it by the people. Ireland was now almost denuded of soldiers, and the preservation of peace and order was intrusted to the constabulary, and he called on the Government not to allow a system to go on which would shake the confidence of the people in that force.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, Returns of the number of Inspectors, County Inspectors, Sub-Inspectors, Receivers, Surgeons, Assistant Surgeons, Veterinary Surgeons, Paymasters, Head Constables, Constables, and Sub-Constables, now forming the Constabulary Force in Ireland, and stating the pay and emoluments of each class, and the number of Catholics in each class:

"Of the number of Promotions or Appointments to each class above the rank of Sub-Constable in each year for ten years last past, and stating in each instance the number of Catholics promoted or appointed:

"And, of the number of Sub-Constables who have left the force within the last three years."

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, he hoped the House would support him in resisting this Motion, for he felt convinced that the production of a mere return of figures, unaccompanied by a statement, would be commented on as all such things were in Ireland, and would have the same gloss put on it as the hon. and learned Gentleman had endeavoured to throw over the statements which he had just made. He was prepared to assert that no injustice had taken place in the promotions in the constabulary force, nor did he believe that they had been at all influenced by any sectarian partiality. On the contrary, instead of the Roman Catholics having been unjustly treated, they had received even more than their just share of promotion. It must be remembered that, though the Roman Catholics formed the great majority of the population of Ireland, they did not form the majority of those classes who were eligible for situations where education and intelligence were required. The hon. and learned Member asserted that the Roman Catholics were quitting the force and emigrating on account of the unfairness with which they were treated in respect of promotion, but the numbers of Protestants who had left the force was much greater than that of the Roman Catholics; and he must, moreover, express his entire disbelief that the reason given by the hon. and learned Gentleman was anything like the true one for the resignations that had taken place. The grievance of which the constabulary had complained in their memorials to the Government was insufficient pay, and in no single instance had any complaint been made of partiality in the distribution of promotion. Originally the force consisted almost altogether of Protestants. When Sir Duncan M'Gregor took the command of it they were nearly two to one to the Roman Catholics, though now the proportions were exactly the reverse; but it must be remembered that length of service was one of the most important qualifications for promotion, and as all the older constables were Protestants, it was not unnatural that the higher officers were mostly Protestants. Thus, among the head constables of the class first, out of fifty-four only fourteen were Roman Catholics and the remainder Protestants, the proportion being seventeen to forty; among the head constables of the second class ninety-three were Roman Catholics and 173 Protestants, or as seventeen to thirty-one; while among the constables the numbers rapidly approached their natural proportions, there being 930 Roman Catholics and 808 Protestants, or seventeen to fourteen. There was no doubt, however, that in course of years, as the length of service of the Roman Catholics increased, they would gradually emerge into the higher ranks. With regard to punishments and rewards, last year he found that 174 Roman Catholics had been dismissed and seventy-six Protestants, while special rewards were granted to sixty-three Roman Catholics and twenty-eight Protestants, corresponding nearly with their respective numbers in the force. The resignations, too, seemed to hold pretty power ought to be conferred upon the Universities, and all the power ought to be conferred upon the Universities, and all the power, however, are anomalies present? They were twenty-two in the United Kingdom power of granting licences. Some of the power of conferring powers of granting licences in particular two counties, and of the kingdom to the Universities. Now what this is, to give the Universities power of granting licences in every district that was not in those districts.

By the Statute of 1831 power was given to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to grant licences for the practice of medicine in the United Kingdom except within seven miles of the City of London. The University of London Bill the advantages which were possessed by Oxford and Cambridge. In other words, the University of London, which was in the centre of the country, was to have power of granting licences where other licences might be granted. Now, but took no power to grant licences within seven miles of the city of London. Surely, if the University of London was to have the power of granting licences at all, that power ought equally to extend to the metropolis. He understood that the noble Lord proposed to alter the Bill in Committee, and further to amend it with reference to a point that had been amended before—namely, the exclusion of the College of Surgeons from its provisions.

He (Mr. Walpole) thought there were special grounds for excluding that college; but if the degree of any University was to be a sufficient licence to a man to practise in surgery, medicine, or physic of any kind—if such a degree was to give the power to the student to practise higher branches of the profession than that of surgery—why should the licence confer privileges in the one case which it did not confer in the other? Was the education in surgery less advantageous or less than in the London University than in medicine? On the contrary, he believed it was greater, and that and more scientifically conducted.

high as any University in Europe. Its professors had been most successful in training up a band of medical practitioners. The subject was one which the Government ought to have taken up long ago. The existing state of the law was such as to protect the unqualified practitioner. The continuance of this anomaly inflicted a great injury on medical science and the community at large. He therefore hoped the Government would introduce a Bill on the subject early next Session. He objected to the present Bill on the same ground as the hon. Mover of the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that when his attention was first drawn to the Bill, he certainly shared in the opinions which had been expressed by his hon. Friends behind him, and thought that it would be most desirable to postpone the measure until the Government had been able to mature some general arrangement for the consideration of Parliament. But he confessed that the representations which had since been made to him on behalf of the London University had altered the view which at first sight he was disposed to take, and he now thought that, with a change in the wording, which he should propose in Committee, and which would have the effect of merely carrying out the understanding that he conceived had been come to between the supporters and the opposers of the Bill, and the purpose of which would be to exclude the surgical practice and confine the privilege to be given to the London University to medical practice, in the same manner as practically the degrees of Oxford and Cambridge were confined, he might recommend the House to adopt the Bill. When the London University was first established, it was very much for the purpose of opening the channels of professional avocation to persons who did not belong to the Church of England. Degrees at Oxford and Cambridge were incumbered with certain tests and declarations which practically excluded Dissenters; and when the University of London was established there was a distinct understanding between the promoters of the University and the Government that the degrees to be granted by that University should for all professional, not ecclesiastical, purposes confer the same privileges and advantages as were conferred by similar corresponding degrees at Oxford and Cambridge. The professional advantages conferred related to law and medicine; and accordingly degrees in medicine had been granted, and he was informed, and he believed correctly informed, that the medical examination at the London University was quite as good as—if not better than—the examinations at either of the two Universities or that of the College of Physicians. In short the public had quite as good a security by means of the degrees conferred by this University as they had by the degrees conferred by any other. As far, then, as the interest of the public was concerned, no objection could arise from continuing the power the University had hitherto enjoyed. And as far as the Dissenters were concerned, it seemed to him that it would be a breach of faith to shut upon them now that channel to professional avocations which by means of this University had been open to them for a considerable period. Now what, then, was the circumstance which rendered any legislation at this moment necessary? The circumstance was this. In the course of last Session a Bill was passed regulating lunatic asylums, and connected with lunatics, which gave the power of granting certificates, and confined that power to persons legally authorised so to do, and doubts had since arisen whether, under the law as it now stood, those graduates of the University of London who had, in the course of their professional practice, given those certificates, might not be subject to penalties for having done so. Now it would be very unfair, he thought, to impose a new penalty upon gentlemen who, having taken degrees after examination, had fully sustained their qualifications to practise, and expose them to this penalty in consequence of the inadvertent legislation of last Session. It did not appear to him that the Bill would at all interfere with any general arrangement which Parliament might think fit to adopt in the course of next Session. It was exceedingly desirable that some general arrangement should be effected. He had been in communication with the Presidents of the two colleges of physicians and surgeons upon the subject; and only that morning one of those gentlemen had suggested to him a mode of coming to some arrangement, which he (Lord Palmerston) thought might possibly furnish the Government with materials from which to frame a measure for the consideration of Parliament. But if he thought this Bill would throw any difficulty in the way of such a general arrangement, undoubtedly that would constitute an objection to the measure. He could not, however, think that it would. On the contrary, if it confined the power and the privileges granted by the London University to medical practice, and did not extend them to surgical practice—if it simply gave to graduates of the London University those privileges of medical practice which the degrees of Oxford and Cambridge had practically given them—it would have this effect: it would merely confirm by law an arrangement which had existed ever since the commencement of the University; which was entered into with it when first its constitution was framed; and he thought it would be an act of injustice to the University, and especially towards the body of Dissenters, who were very much interested in the matter, if that House did not agree to the Bill, subject to the limitation in regard to surgical practice, which he should feel it his duty to propose if it went into Committee.

MR. ATHERTON said, it was his intention to support the Bill. He thought the opposition to it was based on the "dog-in-the-manger" principle. Nothing could be more disgraceful than the present state of the law regarding medical practice. The qualified practitioner had literally no protection; for, notwithstanding diplomas and degrees, quacks might practise surgery as largely and successfully as qualified persons, provided they gave up the questionable advantage of being able to sue for their fees. He thought the Bill would effect a desirable improvement as far as it went; and it was no reason for rejecting it that it did not apply to the three kingdoms. The University of Durham stood on the same footing as that of London, and was entitled to the same privileges.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought the effect of the Bill would be to increase existing anomalies, and therefore hoped it would not be further proceeded with during the present Session. He entirely agreed with the reasons which had been given for introducing the Bill, if it were not proposed to amend the general state of the law. If the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had the power of granting licences for the practice of medicine, which other Universities, like London and Durham, did not possess, that power ought to be conferred upon the latter Universities, and all the Universities should be placed upon the same footing. Was it advisable, however, he would ask, to introduce more anomalies into the law than existed at present? They must bear in mind that there were twenty-two different bodies in the United Kingdom which had now the power of granting licences of different descriptions. Some of these bodies had the power of conferring certain degrees, and others of granting licences; some of granting licences in particular districts, like two counties, and some in certain parts of the kingdom to the exclusion of others. Now what this Bill proposed to do was, to give the University of London the power of granting licences just in the very district that was already filled up, and not in those districts that were vacant. By the Statute of Henry VIII. power was given to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to grant licences for the practice of medicine in every part of the United Kingdom except within seven miles of the City of London; and the University of London asked by this Bill the advantages which were now possessed by Oxford and Cambridge. In other words, the University of London, which was in the centre of the metropolis, was to have power of granting licences where other licences might be given now, but took no power to grant licences within seven miles of the city of London. Surely, if the University of London was to have the power of granting licences at all, that power ought equally to extend to the metropolis. He understood that the noble Lord proposed to alter the Bill in Committee, and further to amend it with reference to a point that had been amended before—namely, the exclusion of the College of Surgeons from its provisions. He (Mr. Walpole) thought there were special grounds for excluding that college; but if the degree of any University was to be a sufficient licence to a man to practise in surgery, medicine, or physic of any kind—if such a degree was to give the power to the student to practise higher branches of the profession than that of surgery—why should the licence confer privileges in the one case which it did not confer in the other? Was the education in surgery less advantageous or less extensive in the London University than the education in medicine? On the contrary, he believed it was greater, and that it was better and more scientifically conducted than the education even in reference to medicine. That being so, he was anxious not to prevent the members of the London University from having the same privileges which were now enjoyed by the members of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and he wished the House not to interpose another anomaly which would interfere with any effective legislation upon the subject. He would therefore suggest that a new Bill should be brought in next year. Rather than give these twenty-two bodies co-equal and co-ordinate authority to grant licences—instead of enabling them to run against each other so that the public had no guarantee that the qualifications they granted were good—he would recommend a law securing, in the first place, uniformity of education in the different bodies granting licences, and secondly, uniformity of qualification. There was only one way of securing these objects, and that was by letting the Universities have the power, which they now possessed, of conferring degrees in the various branches of medicine on the young men who studied there, so as to give them the opportunity of going into the world with a certificate of merit when they began their practice; and to intrust certain bodies in each of the three kingdoms with the power of saying whether or not the qualifications of these young men were of such a character and their education had been carried to such an extent that the public might have a guarantee in these licences that they might trust their health and their lives to these young men. He concurred in thinking that if the power of granting licences were left with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge it must also be given to the London University.

MR. NAPIER said, he wished to say a word in behalf of the University of Dublin, which he had the honour to represent. He held that all colleges which gave a sound and sufficient education, and had not now the power of legally conferring a diploma or degree, ought to have such a power granted to them. The present Bill would, however, extend the limitations contained in the Statute of Henry VIII., and continue to exclude the University of Dublin from this privilege.

MR. STRUTT said, that from the original foundation of the London University, the clear understanding had been that its object was to give to those persons who were not members of the Church of England the same civil privileges as were possessed by the graduates of Oxford and Cambridge. That principle had been generally acted upon from that time to this, and had been recognised by every successive Government, including those of Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and the Earl of Derby; but during the last Session of Parliament two Acts were passed—one the Lunacy Act, and the other the Vaccination Act—from which the University of London was omitted; and the consequence was, that the graduates, who had passed a more severe test as to their medical knowledge than any that was imposed by either Oxford or Cambridge, were rendered liable to heavy penalties simply for doing that which the exercise of their profession required; and in one instance he understood an action had been brought for the recovery of those penalties. Under these circumstances it had been thought desirable that a short Bill should be passed to restore persons who had graduated at the London University to the position in which they had stood for the last twenty years, and in which they would still have remained but for the passing of the two Acts to which he had alluded. He trusted that the noble Lord the Home Secretary would, in the course of next Session, bring in a Bill for the purpose of placing the medical practitioners of the three kingdoms upon an equal footing; but that was no reason for a breach of the understanding which had existed with the London University for the last twenty years, or for the rejection of the present Bill.

MR. GROGAN said, he thought that the explanation given of the object of the Bill by the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) had very much altered the aspect in which this question stood. That object seemed to be to supply an omission occurring in two Acts passed last Session; but he doubted whether the introduction of a short Bill to remove that difficulty would not have been a preferable mode of proceeding.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would submit that the question before the House was not one of medical reform, but a question of whether that House was to do an act of simple justice to the University of London, which had been constituted by Royal Charter, and intended by that Charter to have all the privileges that were conferred upon the older Universities in the country, but which, for want of those privileges, had been placed in a position of undeserved inferiority.

Mr. MICHELL said, it was rather hard upon the graduates of the University of London that they had, upon the faith of Royal Charters and Acts of Parliament, paid money for degrees which were of no use. The noble Lord the Home Secretary had postponed until next Session any legislation upon the subject of the medical profession, but no Bill would be likely to be so beneficial to the medical profession as that brought in by the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady), which the noble Viscount had opposed. He would warn the noble Viscount that, if his Bill should preserve the monopoly of the College of Surgeons and the College of Physicians, they would never satisfy either the profession or the public. There were grave anomalies in the medical profession as at present constituted, and it was requisite that these should be removed for the interest of the public.

Mr. BRADY said, this Bill had been the means of eliciting opinions in that House which would give great satisfaction to the medical profession at large. There was no question more worthy the consideration of the House than that of medical reform, for he believed that, under the existing law, society was greatly injured by the anomalies which existed in reference to the medical profession. A man who took a medical degree at the University of London was considered equally competent to practise with any practitioner who obtained his diploma in any other part of the United Kingdom; and he held it would be a great hardship to the graduates of that institution if they were to be shut out from the privileges which the degrees they took there ought to confer upon them. The Bill now before the House was one which would do an immense deal of good, therefore he would have much satisfaction in voting for it going into Committee.

Mr. BELL said, he was quite alive to the necessity of a Medical Reform Bill, but the profession was a very united one, so far as opposing and throwing out all measures for the reform of their calling. If he believed this Bill would tend to protract or postpone medical reform, he would never have promoted and taken charge of it; but he fully believed that it rather tended to advance the cause of medical reform, and he hoped the House would not agree to the hon. Member for Kilmarnock's (Mr. Bouverie's) Amendment.

Mr. FORBES said, he opposed the Motion on the ground that the Bill, while opening the door to admit one University, would close it against other medical schools, which were just as celebrated as that of the University of London.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, there was a strong opposition to the Bill in Scotland, and as one of the few Members for Scotland who supported it he wished to say that he did so because he believed it was a step in the course of medical reform, and despairing of any great measure on the subject, he would accept any advance in that direction, however small.

Mr. DUNLOP said, he did not think it was a step towards medical reform to extend the system of allowing the position of medical men to depend upon the diplomas of the Universities.

Mr. HADFIELD said, he thought that a pressing case for legislation had been made, but when it was shown that honourable and learned men were liable to penalties unless this Bill should pass, were these gentlemen to wait until the profession could agree upon a Bill of medical reform, when every one admitted that the medical profession was the most quarrelsome body in the kingdom—far more quarrelsome than the lawyers themselves?

Mr. HENLEY said, he did not entertain a very confident hope that legislation upon this subject could take place this Session; but he should vote for going into Committee, believing that the discussion would be instructive, and might help the House on the subject of medical reform.

The House divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 26: Majority 64.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Graduates in Medicine of the University of London to be entitled to practise Physic in the same manner as Graduates of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge).

Mr. MOWBRAY said, he wished to move to insert certain words in the preamble, the object of the alteration being to confer on the University of Durham the same privileges as by the present Bill were conferred upon the University of London. He saw no reason why medical students of

Durham University, which was established by Royal Charter, and which required them to reside some years in the University, and to pass a rigid examination before degrees were conferred on them, should not enjoy the same advantages in this respect as students of the University of London.

MR. HEADLAM said, he thought the Committee could not but accede to the Motion; the objection to the existing law was, that it created something like a monopoly. No medical school bore a higher character than that of Durham, and it was highly desirable, considering the distance from the metropolis, that medical students in the north of England should have equal privileges conferred on them by going to a University in their own neighbourhood, as by coming to the metropolis.

MR. ATHERTON said, that the House, by going into Committee upon the Bill, had affirmed the propriety, as long as any difference had existed, of at least attempting to make the state of the law in each portion of the United Kingdom as perfect as possible, and it could hardly be contended that, because London was situated on the banks of the Thames, and Durham upon those of the Wear, that that was sufficient to justify a difference in principle. The Committee had heard that the degrees of medicine were not conferred until after the amplest opportunities of testing the capabilities of the student; and, indeed, it would be a most cruel thing to the community to send among them persons who were destitute of medical qualifications. He thought the Committee would do well to consent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Durham.

MR. NAPIER said, he did not object to the Amendment, but he must complain that, if they excluded the University of Dublin from the same privileges, they would be drawing a very invidious distinction; and he thought, considering the excellence of its medical school, it would be very unfair to extend the privileges of the London and Durham Universities, and continue the present restrictions of the practice of medical graduates of the Dublin University to Ireland alone.

MR. ELLIOT said, the same argument would apply to Scotch Universities. He should vote for the Amendment, on the understanding that he should be at liberty to propose that every person legally qualified to practise in any part of the

United Kingdom should be included after the word "London."

THE CHAIRMAN intimated that, by the rules of the House, such an Amendment could not be made without notice.

MR. COWAN said, he had opposed the Bill going into Committee, not from any unfavourable opinion he had of the University of London—quite the contrary—but simply because he thought it unwise to legislate for a single institution alone. Now that the Bill had gone into Committee, he thought it only fair and reasonable that its provisions should be extended so as to embrace all the Universities of Scotland.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought a very good case had been made out for the addition of the University of Durham, but he apprehended that it was not competent for the Committee, at that stage of the Bill, to introduce anything in it with regard to the Scotch Universities or the University of Dublin. He was not in a condition to state to the Committee any deliberate views as to the general subject of medical reform; but he was glad to say, so far as he had been able to consider the matter, it seemed to him that no measure of medical reform would be satisfactory to the country that did not place the medical degrees of England, Ireland, and Scotland upon the same footing, with the view to practising in any part of the United Kingdom. He thought an arrangement might be made, by which similar tests of qualifications might be applied to each of the three parts of the kingdom, and by which a medical or a surgical man, having submitted to those tests, on going to any part of the kingdom, might be furnished with a licence to practise, which licence should be coextensive to every part of the United Kingdom. If that was so, he thought it would not be desirable to deal with that question piecemeal upon a Bill of this sort. He should endeavour to deal with it when he introduced a general measure, but it seemed to him that it would be sufficient upon the present occasion to act upon the instructions already given by the House. They would only incur and embarrass their proceedings if they were now to discuss the right of medical men qualified in one part of the kingdom to practise in every other part.

MR. NAPIER said, he would beg to ask what in that case was the object of this Bill?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that by the accidental operation of an Act passed last year, persons who had taken medical degrees at the University of London were subjected to penalties which it was never intended they should be liable to, and it was therefore proposed to pass this Bill, to replace them in the position in which they had previously stood.

MR. WALPOLE said, nothing more applied to the students of the London University by the measure of last year than applied to them before. He supposed the noble Lord alluded to the interpretation clause of that Act, by which certain persons not qualified by law could not practise, and as long as the law remained what it was, they could not qualify. He thought the anomalies which he had already pointed out would be largely increased by this Bill. It had been said that a monopoly had been enjoyed by Oxford and Cambridge, which was to be taken from them and given to the University of London. He believed that six medical degrees were not conferred by those Universities during the course of the year; but they were going to give privileges to the London and Durham Universities which they denied to Dublin and Scotland. He must say, the more they advanced with this Bill the more he saw the impropriety of proceeding with it, unless those privileges were to be extended to the whole kingdom.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was the interpretation clause to which he alluded, and he apprehended that the present Bill was introduced to relieve medical graduates of the University of London from the penalties under that Act.

MR. NAPIER said, the noble Lord was doing more than curing a defect. The noble Lord would put other Universities—Dublin University especially—in an inferior position.

MR. THORNELY said, he was prepared to support any measure of general reform which should give to the University of London similar privileges in respect to medical graduates to those conferred on Oxford and Cambridge; but they ought not to confer them on the University of London without doing away with the anomalies in other parts of the kingdom.

MR. WALPOLE said, he was prepared to put all Universities on the same footing, but not to give privileges to the London University until the anomalous position of other Universities was remedied.

MR. COWAN said, that the object to which the noble Lord had referred was provided for by the second clause, which exempted the licentiates of the London University from the penalties to which they were supposed to be made liable by recent legislation with respect to lunatics and vaccination. He would now move that the Chairman should report progress, in order that, when the House resumed, he might move an instruction to the Committee to include the Scotch Universities in the operation of this measure.

MR. ATHERTON said, he considered it was a matter of good faith that the privileges should be extended to the University of London, and he thought it was not fair that hon. Gentlemen should take advantage of the forms of the House to reagitate the whole question.

LORD NAAS said, he had voted for going into Committee on this Bill under the impression that in Committee the Irish Universities would be included in it. As, however, that could not be done in accordance with the forms of the House, he could not assent to the Bill passing through the Committee in its present form. As it now stood it would enable the graduates of the University of London to practise over the whole of the United Kingdom, while those of the Irish Universities would be confined to Ireland, and those of the Scotch Universities to Scotland. He should, therefore, vote for reporting progress, in order that the Committee might be instructed to include the Scotch and Irish Universities in the Bill.

MR. PIGOTT said, that, by the law, as it now stood, a licentiate of the University of Dublin could practise in Ireland, and a licentiate of the Scotch Universities in Scotland; but the licentiates of the University of London could not practise in England. The object of the present Bill was to abolish this injustice.

MR. BELL said, medical men who had graduated in Scotch and Irish Universities could practise everywhere in those countries respectively, and the object of the present measure was to enable medical students who had graduated at the London University to practise all over England, which they could not do at present.

COLONEL DUNNE said, the Bill would give a most unjust monopoly to the London University. He thought it was one of the most unfair Bills that had been proposed to the House. The Irish medical and bear in mind that it was upon the recommendation of the county inspectors that all promotions from the lower grades were made. The paymasters, receivers, and surgeons were all Protestants. In the whole country there were 248 sub-inspectors, and of them 219 were Protestants; there were 322 head-constables, 268 of whom were Protestants; 1,800 constables, 1,300 of whom were Protestants; but of the sub-constables, who composed the main body of the force, the number of Catholics was 8,300, and of Protestants, 1,600. The effect of this system had been to induce many sub-constables to leave the force and to emigrate. He did not make this Motion, as he had just stated, with any sectarian spirit, for if the picture had been reversed, and if there were an undue promotion of Catholics, he should have still more willingly brought the circumstance under the notice of the House. The great power of this force was derived from the respect entertained for it by the people. Ireland was now almost denuded of soldiers, and the preservation of peace and order was intrusted to the constabulary, and he called on the Government not to allow a system to go on which would shake the confidence of the people in that force.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, Returns of the number of Inspectors, County Inspectors, Sub-Inspectors, Receivers, Surgeons, Assistant Surgeons, Veterinary Surgeons, Paymasters, Head Constables, Constables, and Sub-Constables, now forming the Constabulary Force in Ireland, and stating the pay and emoluments of each class, and the number of Catholics in each class:

"Of the number of Promotions or Appointments to each class above the rank of Sub-Constable in each year for ten years last past, and stating in each instance the number of Catholics promoted or appointed:

"And, of the number of Sub-Constables who have left the force within the last three years."

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, he hoped the House would support him in resisting this Motion, for he felt convinced that the production of a mere return of figures, unaccompanied by a statement, would be commented on as all such things were in Ireland, and would have the same gloss put on it as the hon. and learned Gentleman had endeavoured to throw over the statements which he had just made. He was prepared to assert that no injustice had taken place in the promotions in the constabulary force, nor did he believe that they had been at all influenced by any sectarian partiality. On the contrary, instead of the Roman Catholics having been

unjustly treated, they had received even more than their just share of promotion. It must be remembered that, though the Roman Catholics formed the great majority of the population of Ireland, they did not form the majority of those classes who were eligible for situations where education and intelligence were required. The hon. and learned Member asserted that the Roman Catholics were quitting the force and emigrating on account of the unfairness with which they were treated in respect of promotion, but the numbers of Protestants who had left the force was much greater than that of the Roman Catholics; and he must, moreover, express his entire disbelief that the reason given by the hon. and learned Gentleman was anything like the true one for the resignations that had taken place. The grievance of which the constabulary had complained in their memorials to the Government was insufficient pay, and in no single instance had any complaint been made of partiality in the distribution of promotion. Originally the force consisted almost altogether of Protestants. When Sir Duncan M'Gregor took the command of it they were nearly two to one to the Roman Catholics, though now the proportions were exactly the reverse; but it must be remembered that length of service was one of the most important qualifications for promotion, and as all the older constables were Protestants, it was not unnatural that the higher officers were mostly Protestants. Thus, among the head constables of the class first, out of fifty-four only fourteen were Roman Catholics and the remainder Protestants, the proportion being seventeen to forty; among the head constables of the second class ninety-three were Roman Catholics and 173 Protestants, or as seventeen to thirty-one; while among the constables the numbers rapidly approached their natural proportions, there being 930 Roman Catholics and 808 Protestants, or seventeen to fourteen. There was no doubt, however, that in course of years, as the length of service of the Roman Catholics increased, they would gradually emerge into the higher ranks. With regard to punishments and rewards, last year he found that 174 Roman Catholics had been dismissed and seventy-six Protestants, while special rewards were granted to sixty-three Roman Catholics and twenty-eight Protestants, corresponding nearly with their respective numbers in the force. The resignations, too, seemed to hold pretty much the same proportion, being 498 Roman Catholics, and 277 Protestants, during the last year. The average service of the officers promoted was, for the Roman Catholics, 19 1-13 years, and for the Protestants 22½; therefore, if anything had been done it was rather to promote the Roman Catholics than to keep them back. He did not think the return moved for by the hon. and learned Gentleman would be useful to the public service, and he should, therefore, not consent to it.

MR. J. O'CONNELL said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had made an admirable case for giving the return. Any evil that could result from publishing the figures would be produced by the discussion. If the return were granted, the right hon. Gentleman could take the opportunity of making any statement he wished.

LORD NAAS said, he should oppose the Motion. He had never heard one more likely to have a mischievous effect, from its sectarian tendency; nothing was more likely to give that character to the force, which had been so free from it since the first institution. The force possessed the confidence of every class, which it would not, if it was sectarian. The Motion was an attempt to get up a grievance, and make an attack on Sir Duncan M'Gregor, than whom there was not a better or more successful officer under the Crown. He had brought his force to as high a state of discipline as any regiment in Her Majesty's service. He wished the right hon. Secretary for Ireland had opposed the Motion, on the ground that it was an attempt to censure a meritorious officer. It would be different if the hon. and learned Member for Ennis had brought forward any case of injustice to a Roman Catholic; he did not, because none such existed. The men were leaving the force in large numbers, but that was because the Colonies presented more advantages than the low pay of the Government; but there was no discontent amongst them.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he entirely disclaimed any intention of attacking Sir Duncan M'Gregor. As the noble Lord, however, had challenged him he would produce an instance. There was only one Roman Catholic amongst the county inspectors. That gentleman, Mr. Bracher, had been appointed only since his notice had been on the book, and he believed in consequence of it; he was a most excellent officer, who had served as an inspector for twenty-one years. It was not the fact that when Sir Duncan M'Gregor took charge of the force it was almost entirely Protestant; he was only ten years at the head of it, and the returns showed that long before that time the proportion of Protestants and Roman Catholics in the lower ranks was nearly the same as at present. The force was disciplined by Colonel Shaw Kennedy. He should press his Motion to a division.

MEDICAL GRADUATES (UNIVERSITY OF LONDON) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BOUVERIE said, that with regard to Great Britain, certain medical bodies had the exclusive privilege of exercising the medical profession in England. Great exception was taken to this monopoly by learned and competent members of the medical profession who had graduated in Ireland and Scotland. The Bill now before the House proposed to extend the monopoly to those who had taken a medical degree in the University of London, and there was a further proposition to include the University of Durham. If the medical graduates of the London and Durham Universities were to be admitted to the monopoly of practising in England, they would naturally be anxious to perpetuate it, to the exclusion of their Irish and Scotch brethren. He thought the monopoly was a bad one, and that it ought to be got rid of, and he would therefore move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

MR. COWAN seconded the Amendment. He said he must contend that the University of Edinburgh had equal claims with any other to the consideration of that House. Its fame as a medical school was well known; in this respect it stood as high as any University in Europe. Its professors had been most successful in training up a band of medical practitioners. The subject was one which the Government ought to have taken up long ago. The existing state of the law was such as to protect the unqualified practitioner. The continuance of this anomaly inflicted a great injury on medical science and the community at large. He therefore hoped the Government would introduce a Bill on the subject early next Session. He objected to the present Bill on the same ground as the hon. Mover of the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that when his attention was first drawn to the Bill, he certainly shared in the opinions which had been expressed by his hon. Friends behind him, and thought that it would be most desirable to postpone the measure until the Government had been able to mature some general arrangement for the consideration of Parliament. But he confessed that the representations which had since been made to him on behalf of the London University had altered the view which at first sight he was disposed to take, and he now thought that, with a change in the wording, which he should propose in Committee, and which would have the effect of merely carrying out the understanding that he conceived had been come to between the supporters and the opposers of the Bill, and the purpose of which would be to exclude the surgical practice and confine the privilege to be given to the London University to medical practice, in the same manner as practically the degrees of Oxford and Cambridge were confined, he might recommend the House to adopt the Bill. When the London University was first established, it was very much for the purpose of opening the channels of professional avocation to persons who did not belong to the Church of England. Degrees at Oxford and Cambridge were incumbered with certain tests and declarations which practically excluded Dissenters; and when the University of London was established there was a distinct understanding between the promoters of the University and the Government that the degrees to be granted by that University should for all professional, not ecclesiastical, purposes confer the same privileges and advantages as were conferred by similar corresponding degrees at Oxford and Cambridge. The professional advantages conferred related to law and medicine; and accordingly degrees in medicine had been granted, and he was informed, and he believed correctly informed, that the medical examination at the London University was quite as good as—if not better than—the examinations at either of the two Universities or that of the College of Physicians. In short the public had quite as good a security by means of the degrees conferred by this University as they had by the degrees conferred by any other. As far, then, as the interest of the public was concerned, no objection could arise from continuing the power the University had hitherto enjoyed. And as far as the Dissenters were concerned, it seemed to him that it would be a breach of faith to shut upon them now that channel to professional avocations which by means of this University had been open to them for a considerable period. Now what, then, was the circumstance which rendered any legislation at this moment necessary? The circumstance was this. In the course of last Session a Bill was passed regulating lunatic asylums, and connected with lunatics, which gave the power of granting certificates, and confined that power to persons legally authorised so to do, and doubts had since arisen whether, under the law as it now stood, those graduates of the University of London who had, in the course of their professional practice, given those certificates, might not be subject to penalties for having done so. Now it would be very unfair, he thought, to impose a new penalty upon gentlemen who, having taken degrees after examination, had fully sustained their qualifications to practise, and expose them to this penalty in consequence of the inadvertent legislation of last Session. It did not appear to him that the Bill would at all interfere with any general arrangement which Parliament might think fit to adopt in the course of next Session. It was exceedingly desirable that some general arrangement should be effected. He had been in communication with the Presidents of the two colleges of physicians and surgeons upon the subject; and only that morning one of those gentlemen had suggested to him a mode of coming to some arrangement, which he (Lord Palmerston) thought might possibly furnish the Government with materials from which to frame a measure for the consideration of Parliament. But if he thought this Bill would throw any difficulty in the way of such a general arrangement, undoubtedly that would constitute an objection to the measure. He could not, however, think that it would. On the contrary, if it confined the power and the privileges granted by the London University to medical practice, and did not extend them to surgical practice—if it simply gave to graduates of the London University those privileges of medical practice which the degrees of Oxford and Cambridge had practically given them—it would have this effect: it would merely confirm by law an arrangement which had existed ever since the commencement of the University; which was entered into with it when first its constitution was framed; and he thought it would be an act of injustice to the University, and especially towards the body of Dissenters, who were very much interested in the matter, if that House did not agree to the Bill, subject to the limitation in regard to surgical practice, which he should feel it his duty to propose if it went into Committee.

MR. ATHERTON said, it was his intention to support the Bill. He thought the opposition to it was based on the "dog-in-the-manger" principle. Nothing could be more disgraceful than the present state of the law regarding medical practice. The qualified practitioner had literally no protection; for, notwithstanding diplomas and degrees, quacks might practise surgery as largely and successfully as qualified persons, provided they gave up the questionable advantage of being able to sue for their fees. He thought the Bill would effect a desirable improvement as far as it went; and it was no reason for rejecting it that it did not apply to the three kingdoms. The University of Durham stood on the same footing as that of London, and was entitled to the same privileges.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought the effect of the Bill would be to increase existing anomalies, and therefore hoped it would not be further proceeded with during the present Session. He entirely agreed with the reasons which had been given for introducing the Bill, if it were not proposed to amend the general state of the law. If the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had the power of granting licences for the practice of medicine, which other Universities, like London and Durham, did not possess, that power ought to be conferred upon the latter Universities, and all the Universities should be placed upon the same footing. Was it advisable, however, he would ask, to introduce more anomalies into the law than existed at present? They must bear in mind that there were twenty-two different bodies in the United Kingdom which had now the power of granting licences of different descriptions. Some of these bodies had the power of conferring certain degrees, and others of granting licences; some of granting licences in particular districts, like two counties, and some in certain parts of the kingdom to the exclusion of others. Now what this Bill proposed to do was, to give the University of London the power of granting licences just in the very district that was already filled up, and not in those districts that were vacant. By the Statute of Henry VIII. power was given to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to grant licences for the practice of medicine in every part of the United Kingdom except within seven miles of the City of London; and the University of London asked by this Bill the advantages which were now possessed by Oxford and Cambridge. In other words, the University of London, which was in the centre of the metropolis, was to have power of granting licences where other licences might be given now, but took no power to grant licences within seven miles of the city of London. Surely, if the University of London was to have the power of granting licences at all, that power ought equally to extend to the metropolis. He understood that the noble Lord proposed to alter the Bill in Committee, and further to amend it with reference to a point that had been amended before—namely, the exclusion of the College of Surgeons from its provisions. He (Mr. Walpole) thought there were special grounds for excluding that college; but if the degree of any University was to be a sufficient licence to a man to practise in surgery, medicine, or physic of any kind—if such a degree was to give the power to the student to practise higher branches of the profession than that of surgery—why should the licence confer privileges in the one case which it did not confer in the other? Was the education in surgery less advantageous or less extensive in the London University than the education in medicine? On the contrary, he believed it was greater, and that it was better and more scientifically conducted than the

education even in reference to medicine. That being so, he was anxious not to prevent the members of the London University from having the same privileges which were now enjoyed by the members of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and he wished the House not to interpose another anomaly which would interfere with any effective legislation upon the subject. He would therefore suggest that a new Bill should be brought in next year. Rather than give these twenty-two bodies co-equal and co-ordinate authority to grant licences—instead of enabling them to run against each other so that the public had no guarantee that the qualifications they granted were good—he would recommend a law securing, in the first place, uniformity of education in the different bodies granting licences, and secondly, uniformity of qualification. There was only one way of securing these objects, and that was by letting the Universities have the power, which they now possessed, of conferring degrees in the various branches of medicine on the young men who studied there, so as to give them the opportunity of going into the world with a certificate of merit when they began their practice; and to intrust certain bodies in each of the three kingdoms with the power of saying whether or not the qualifications of these young men were of such a character and their education had been carried to such an extent that the public might have a guarantee in these licences that they might trust their health and their lives to these young men. He concurred in thinking that if the power of granting licences were left with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge it must also be given to the London University.

MR. NAPIER said, he wished to say a word in behalf of the University of Dublin, which he had the honour to represent. He held that all colleges which gave a sound and sufficient education, and had not now the power of legally conferring a diploma or degree, ought to have such a power granted to them. The present Bill would, however, extend the limitations contained in the Statute of Henry VIII., and continue to exclude the University of Dublin from this privilege.

MR. STRUTT said, that from the original foundation of the London University, the clear understanding had been that its object was to give to those persons who were not members of the Church of England the same civil privileges as were possessed by the graduates of Oxford and Cambridge. That principle had been generally acted upon from that time to this, and had been recognised by every successive Government, including those of Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and the Earl of Derby; but during the last Session of Parliament two Acts were passed—one the Lunacy Act, and the other the Vaccination Act—from which the University of London was omitted; and the consequence was, that the graduates, who had passed a more severe test as to their medical knowledge than any that was imposed by either Oxford or Cambridge, were rendered liable to heavy penalties simply for doing that which the exercise of their profession required; and in one instance he understood an action had been brought for the recovery of those penalties. Under these circumstances it had been thought desirable that a short Bill should be passed to restore persons who had graduated at the London University to the position in which they had stood for the last twenty years, and in which they would still have remained but for the passing of the two Acts to which he had alluded. He trusted that the noble Lord the Home Secretary would, in the course of next Session, bring in a Bill for the purpose of placing the medical practitioners of the three kingdoms upon an equal footing; but that was no reason for a breach of the understanding which had existed with the London University for the last twenty years, or for the rejection of the present Bill.

MR. GROGAN said, he thought that the explanation given of the object of the Bill by the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) had very much altered the aspect in which this question stood. That object seemed to be to supply an omission occurring in two Acts passed last Session; but he doubted whether the introduction of a short Bill to remove that difficulty would not have been a preferable mode of proceeding.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would submit that the question before the House was not one of medical reform, but a question of whether that House was to do an act of simple justice to the University of London, which had been constituted by Royal Charter, and intended by that Charter to have all the privileges that were conferred upon the older Universities in the country, but which, for want of these privileges, had been placed in a position of undeserved inferiority.

MR. MICHELL said, it was rather hard upon the graduates of the University of London that they had, upon the faith of Royal Charters and Acts of Parliament, paid money for degrees which were of no use. The noble Lord the Home Secretary had postponed until next Session any legislation upon the subject of the medical profession, but no Bill would be likely to be so beneficial to the medical profession as that brought in by the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady), which the noble Viscount had opposed. He would warn the noble Viscount that, if his Bill should preserve the monopoly of the College of Surgeons and the College of Physicians, they would never satisfy either the profession or the public. There were grave anomalies in the medical profession as at present constituted, and it was requisite that these should be removed for the interest of the public.

MR. BRADY said, this Bill had been the means of eliciting opinions in that House which would give great satisfaction to the medical profession at large. There was no question more worthy the consideration of the House than that of medical reform, for he believed that, under the existing law, society was greatly injured by the anomalies which existed in reference to the medical profession. A man who took a medical degree at the University of London was considered equally competent to practise with any practitioner who obtained his diploma in any other part of the United Kingdom; and he held it would be a great hardship to the graduates of that institution if they were to be shut out from the privileges which the degrees they took there ought to confer upon them. The Bill now before the House was one which would do an immense deal of good, therefore he would have much satisfaction in voting for it going into Committee.

MR. BRILL said, he was quite alive to the necessity of a Medical Reform Bill, but the profession was a very united one, so far as opposing and throwing out all measures for the reform of their calling. If he believed this Bill would tend to protract or postpone medical reform, he would never have promoted and taken charge of it; but he fully believed that it rather tended to advance the cause of medical reform, and he hoped the House would not agree to the hon. Member for Kilmarnock's (Mr. Bouverie's) Amendment.

MR. FORBES said, he opposed the Motion on the ground that the Bill, while opening the door to admit one University, would close it against other medical schools, which were just as celebrated as that of the University of London.

MR. CRAUFURD said, there was a strong opposition to the Bill in Scotland, and as one of the few Members for Scotland who supported it he wished to say that he did so because he believed it was a step in the course of medical reform, and despairing of any great measure on the subject, he would accept any advance in that direction, however small.

MR. DUNLOP said, he did not think it was a step towards medical reform to extend the system of allowing the position of medical men to depend upon the diplomas of the Universities.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought that a pressing case for legislation had been made, but when it was shown that honourable and learned men were liable to penalties unless this Bill should pass, were these gentlemen to wait until the profession could agree upon a Bill of medical reform, when every one admitted that the medical profession was the most quarrelsome body in the kingdom—far more quarrelsome than the lawyers themselves?

MR. HENLEY said, he did not entertain a very confident hope that legislation upon this subject could take place this Session; but he should vote for going into Committee, believing that the discussion would be instructive, and might help the House on the subject of medical reform.

The House divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 26: Majority 64.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Graduates in Medicine of the University of London to be entitled to practise Physic in the same manner as Graduates of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge).

MR. MOWBRAY said, he wished to move to insert certain words in the preamble, the object of the alteration being to confer on the University of Durham the same privileges as by the present Bill were conferred upon the University of London. He saw no reason why medical students of

Durham University, which was established by Royal Charter, and which required them to reside some years in the University, and to pass a rigid examination before degrees were conferred on them, should not enjoy the same advantages in this respect as students of the University of London.

Mr. HEADLAM said, he thought the Committee could not but accede to the Motion; the objection to the existing law was, that it created something like a monopoly. No medical school bore a higher character than that of Durham, and it was highly desirable, considering the distance from the metropolis, that medical students in the north of England should have equal privileges conferred on them by going to a University in their own neighbourhood, as by coming to the metropolis.

Mr. ATHERTON said, that the House, by going into Committee upon the Bill, had affirmed the propriety, as long as any difference had existed, of at least attempting to make the state of the law in each portion of the United Kingdom as perfect as possible, and it could hardly be contended that, because London was situated on the banks of the Thames, and Durham upon those of the Wear, that that was sufficient to justify a difference in principle. The Committee had heard that the degrees of medicine were not conferred until after the amplest opportunities of testing the capabilities of the student; and, indeed, it would be a most cruel thing to the community to send among them persons who were destitute of medical qualifications. He thought the Committee would do well to consent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Durham.

Mr. NAPIER said, he did not object to the Amendment, but he must complain that, if they excluded the University of Dublin from the same privileges, they would be drawing a very invidious distinction; and he thought, considering the excellence of its medical school, it would be very unfair to extend the privileges of the London and Durham Universities, and continue the present restrictions of the practice of medical graduates of the Dublin University to Ireland alone.

Mr. ELLIOT said, the same argument would apply to Scotch Universities. He should vote for the Amendment, on the understanding that he should be at liberty to propose that every person legally qualified to practise in any part of the

THE CHAIRMAN intimated that, by the rules of the House, such an Amendment could not be made without notice.

Mr. COWAN said, he had opposed the Bill going into Committee, not from any unfavourable opinion he had of the University of London—quite the contrary—but simply because he thought it unwise to legislate for a single institution alone. Now that the Bill had gone into Committee, he thought it only fair and reasonable that its provisions should be extended so as to embrace all the Universities of Scotland.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought a very good case had been made out for the addition of the University of Durham, but he apprehended that it was not competent for the Committee, at that stage of the Bill, to introduce anything in it with regard to the Scotch Universities or the University of Dublin. He was not in a condition to state to the Committee any deliberate views as to the general subject of medical reform; but he was glad to say, so far as he had been able to consider the matter, it seemed to him that no measure of medical reform would be satisfactory to the country that did not place the medical degrees of England, Ireland, and Scotland upon the same footing, with the view to practising in any part of the United Kingdom. He thought an arrangement might be made, by which similar tests of qualifications might be applied to each of the three parts of the kingdom, and by which a medical or a surgical man, having submitted to those tests, on going to any part of the kingdom, might be furnished with a licence to practise, which licence should be coextensive to every part of the United Kingdom. If that was so, he thought it would not be desirable to deal with that question piecemeal upon a Bill of this sort. He should endeavour to deal with it when he introduced a general measure, but it seemed to him that it would be sufficient upon the present occasion to act upon the instructions already given by the House. They would only incur and embarrass their proceedings if they were now to discuss the right of medical men qualified in one part of the kingdom to practise in every other part.

Mr. NAPIER said, he would beg to ask what in that case was the object of this Bill?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that by the accidental operation of an Act passed last year, persons who had taken medical degrees at the University of London were subjected to penalties which it was never intended they should be liable to, and it was therefore proposed to pass this Bill, to replace them in the position in which they had previously stood.

MR. WALPOLE said, nothing more applied to the students of the London University by the measure of last year than applied to them before. He supposed the noble Lord alluded to the interpretation clause of that Act, by which certain persons not qualified by law could not practise, and as long as the law remained what it was, they could not qualify. He thought the anomalies which he had already pointed out would be largely increased by this Bill. It had been said that a monopoly had been enjoyed by Oxford and Cambridge, which was to be taken from them and given to the University of London. He believed that six medical degrees were not conferred by those Universities during the course of the year; but they were going to give privileges to the London and Durham Universities which they denied to Dublin and Scotland. He must say, the more they advanced with this Bill the more he saw the impropriety of proceeding with it, unless those privileges were to be extended to the whole kingdom.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was the interpretation clause to which he alluded, and he apprehended that the present Bill was introduced to relieve medical graduates of the University of London from the penalties under that Act.

MR. NAPIER said, the noble Lord was doing more than curing a defect. The noble Lord would put other Universities—Dublin University especially—in an inferior position.

MR. THORNELY said, he was prepared to support any measure of general reform which should give to the University of London similar privileges in respect to medical graduates to those conferred on Oxford and Cambridge; but they ought not to confer them on the University of London without doing away with the anomalies in other parts of the kingdom.

MR. WALPOLE said, he was prepared to put all Universities on the same footing, but not to give privileges to the London University until the anomalous position of other Universities was remedied.

MR. COWAN said, that the object to which the noble Lord had referred was provided for by the second clause, which exempted the licentiates of the London University from the penalties to which they were supposed to be made liable by recent legislation with respect to lunatics and vaccination. He would now move that the Chairman should report progress, in order that, when the House resumed, he might move an instruction to the Committee to include the Scotch Universities in the operation of this measure.

MR. ATHERTON said, he considered it was a matter of good faith that the privileges should be extended to the University of London, and he thought it was not fair that hon. Gentlemen should take advantage of the forms of the House to reagitate the whole question.

LORD NAAS said, he had voted for going into Committee on this Bill under the impression that in Committee the Irish Universities would be included in it. As, however, that could not be done in accordance with the forms of the House, he could not assent to the Bill passing through the Committee in its present form. As it now stood it would enable the graduates of the University of London to practise over the whole of the United Kingdom, while those of the Irish Universities would be confined to Ireland, and those of the Scotch Universities to Scotland. He should, therefore, vote for reporting progress, in order that the Committee might be instructed to include the Scotch and Irish Universities in the Bill.

MR. PIGOTT said, that, by the law, as it now stood, a licentiate of the University of Dublin could practise in Ireland, and a licentiate of the Scotch Universities in Scotland; but the licentiates of the University of London could not practise in England. The object of the present Bill was to abolish this injustice.

MR. BELL said, medical men who had graduated in Scotch and Irish Universities could practise everywhere in those countries respectively, and the object of the present measure was to enable medical students who had graduated at the London University to practise all over England, which they could not do at present.

COLONEL DUNNE said, the Bill would give a most unjust monopoly to the London University. He thought it was one of the most unfair Bills that had been proposed to the House. The Irish medical and surgical practitioners only asked the same privileges as were enjoyed by their brethren in England. He trusted that this Bill would be withdrawn, in order that a general Bill, applying to all parts of the United Kingdom, might be submitted next Session.

MR. GOULBURN said, that what was wanted was some general measure to secure the fitness of medical men. He feared that if, without passing such a measure, they were gradually to extend the permission to practise to the members of one body after another, such a course would very probably lead to a deterioration in the qualifications of the medical profession generally. He did not think it was expedient to extend the coveted privileges to Durham University, which did not furnish the same means of study that were afforded by the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would suggest that it was possible to limit the operations of this Act to England. That would avoid the objections started by the Irish and Scotch Members with respect to the injustice of giving the graduates of London or Durham the privilege denied to those of the Irish and Scotch Universities, of practising all over the United Kingdom.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that unless they agreed to report progress, they could not, as justice required, extend the operation of the Bill to the Irish and Scotch Universities. No injury was practically inflicted upon Irish medical men by giving the graduates of Oxford and Cambridge the privilege of practising in Ireland, because, as there was no school of medicine in either University, the privilege really amounted to nothing. That, however, was not the case with respect to the University of London, the numerous medical graduates of which would overrun Ireland, without the Irish being able to return the compliment. It was not a bad proof that the Bill was a bad one, that both the Irish and Scotch Members were united in opposing it; for when they hunted in couples there could be little doubt that they were asserting their proper rights and privileges.

MR. HEADLAM said, that the injustice supposed to be inflicted by this Bill upon the graduates of the Irish and Scotch Universities would be avoided by adding to the clause a proviso, "that nothing herein contained shall authorise or empower the graduates of the University of London or Durham to practise in Ireland or Scotland." No one denied that it was just that the graduates of these Universities should, as far as England went, enjoy the same privileges as those of Oxford and Cambridge. That object would be attained by the addition of this proviso, which would not curtail any privileges which the graduates of the London and Durham Universities already enjoyed by other Acts. It was quite clear that if progress was reported, the measure would be altogether defeated.

MR. COWAN said, the more they discussed the matter the more complex it became, and he should therefore press the Motion.

MR. STRUTT said, that the object of this Bill was simply to fulfil a pledge which was given twenty years ago to the Dissenters of England, that the graduates of the London University should be placed on the same footing as those of Oxford and Cambridge. They had been placed in a less advantageous position by the accidental operation of an Act which was passed last year, and under this grievance some 230 graduates, who had passed a far severer examination than was imposed at the older Universities, were now labouring. The question for the Committee was, whether they would now reimpose the stigma and the exclusion which, twenty years ago, that House resolved to abolish? If they were to attempt to insert the Irish and Scotch Universities in the present Bill, it would be defeated for the present Session, at all events, for it was clear that that question could only be dealt with in a general measure.

MR. NAPIER said, that a great many English Dissenters went to the University of Dublin, and took degrees. Why exclude them?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, no one could feel more strongly than he did the importance of putting the medical profession upon a proper footing, that should be consistent not only with the interests of the medical profession, but also with the interests of those who were to be the subjects of those members. He thought the last consideration as fully deserving the attention of the Committee as the former; but he thought that any attempt to make this Bill effect a general reform must inevitably fail, because no one could for a moment suppose that if they were to report progress for the purpose of moving an instruction to the Committee to extend the privileges to the other Universities, that such a Bill would pass into law. It would be going headlong to a conclusion without properly sounding their ground. He quite agreed that a medical degree given in one part of the kingdom ought to give the right to practise in all parts of the kingdom; but then they must establish in all places where they give degrees a uniform test, and that required some consideration. In the meantime he did not see why they should expose the graduates of the University of London to penalties. As to the notion that these graduates would invade Ireland and overrun Scotland, he thought there was sufficient nationality in those countries to protect them.

Mr. COGAN said, he hoped that the same course which had been pursued towards most of the other measures of the Session—postponement—would be applied to this measure.

Mr. BRADY said, he thought it was quite absurd to suppose that the graduates of London or Durham would "overrun" either Ireland or Scotland. Instead of Englishmen going to Ireland and Scotland, the fact was that Irishmen and Scotchmen came to practise in England.

Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that, if it was once established that the London University had a right to the privileges conferred upon its graduates by this Bill, it would be impossible, in a general measure, to refuse to extend similar privileges to the Universities of Ireland and Scotland. He believed, therefore, that the representatives of those countries were not really promoting the interests of their constituents by opposing this Bill. The only real objection to this measure would be perfectly obviated by agreeing to the proviso suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam).

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, the proviso which the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle had announced his intention of proposing had removed his objection, and he should now vote against reporting progress.

Mr. ELLIOT said, that the Scotch and Irish Members could not gain their object under this Bill, and if the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) would undertake to bring in a measure next Session, he thought it would be better to allow this Bill to pass.

Mr. MICHELL said, there was no school of medicine connected with the University of London. The mistake into which some hon. Members had fallen on this point had arisen from the idea that the school belonging to the University College belonged in fact to the University. Another strange error had also been committed with regard to Cambridge, where it had been stated that there was no school of medicine, although in point of fact there was no better medical school in the world. And the reason was plain. On the one side of the town there was a fen, and on the other a chalk district, so that you got all the diseases there that you would meet with in your life. He had been in the profession twenty-eight years, and he had visited the schools at Vienna, Paris, Dublin, and London, but he had nowhere seen a better educational hospital than that at Cambridge. He felt bound to say this, although the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn) had not seen fit to rise and contradict the assertion, that there was no school of medicine attached to his University.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 50; Noes 109: Majority 59.

The Amendment to insert after "London" the words "or Durham" was then agreed to.

Mr. MICHELL moved the insertion of words giving to the graduates the power of practising in London in the same manner as "any Fellow of the College of Physicians of London or." While this monopoly of the College of Physicians with regard to practising in the metropolis existed no good would be done in the work of medical reform.

Mr. BELL opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would open up the whole subject of medical reform in a far larger degree than the question with regard to the Scotch and Irish Universities.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 147: Majority 142.

Clause agreed to; as were also the remaining clauses.

Mr. WALPOLE said, he understood the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) to support a system of uniform education and uniform qualification in reference to the medical profession, and to say, in addition, that this uniform education and uniform qualification should be obtained through the different collegiate institutions of the country. What he (Mr. Walpole) was afraid of was, that if they proceeded in that way they would get neither uniform education nor uniform qualification. The Colleges of Physicians in Dublin, London, and Edinburgh should be put upon a good footing, so that they would be respected through the country, and would be responsible for that uniformity of qualification which would constitute the test to which persons should be subjected before they were allowed to practise in different parts of the country.

The House resumed; Bill reported, as amended.

PROPERTY DISPOSAL BILL—ADJOURNED DEBATE—(THIRD NIGHT).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [24th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, he had been in possession of the House when the adjournment of the discussion upon the measure had last taken place. He should not, however, avail himself of his privilege for the purpose of stating at any length the grounds upon which his opposition to that measure was based, inasmuch as he understood that it was the intention of the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) to withdraw it. He might, however, be permitted to say, that the Bill was one whose principle was in direct antagonism to the feelings and wishes of almost every Roman Catholic in Ireland, and in a declaration signed by nearly 250,000 persons it had been characterised as a mere cloak for sectarian bigotry, and as an insult to the Roman Catholic community. He was exceedingly glad that the shortness of the Session, and the discretion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, had put a stop to any further progress of this Bill.

Mr. WHITESIDE said, he wished to obtain the indulgence of the House while he stated the reasons why it was that he had come to the determination to withdraw the Bill under their notice. It would not, of course, be becoming in him to call into question a rule which had been framed by the House of Commons in its wisdom, and by which the minority were enabled to control the voice of the majority of its Members. He was of opinion, however, that it was due, as well to himself as to the House, that he should state the reasons which had induced him to give up a measure which he had ventured to introduce. He could only say that he gave up that measure from necessity—from the impossibility of being enabled to carry it during the present Session, and not from any belief on his part that the question relating to the disposition of property, as embodied in the Bill, was not one with which Parliament and the country could legitimately deal. What the Bill proposed to effect had already been done in France and in other Roman Catholic countries, and he could not, therefore, justly be held liable to the charge of intolerance because he had endeavoured to place the law of England upon the same footing as that which in those countries prevailed. He had brought forward the Bill in conjunction with a proposition which had been made by an hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. T. Chambers), but he thought it right to state that he had never had the honour of exchanging a word with that Gentleman until after his Motion had been made. In abandoning the Bill, he should take occasion to protest against the doctrine which was maintained by some hon. Members in that House—that subjects such as that with which the Bill proposed to deal were subjects into which individual Members of Parliament, or even Parliament itself, must not venture to inquire. No institution in this country could escape the ordeal of submitting to investigation if the Legislature should think it expedient that that investigation should take place; and, he should add, that facts fully justified a resort to inquiry, in order that it might be ascertained whether monastic and conventual establishments were institutions in conformity with, or antagonistic to, the interests of England. The reason why he had not pressed his Bill of late was because he had entertained a hope that a case which was pending in the other House of Parliament would have relieved the House from the necessity of deciding upon the principle of his Bill, by rendering it clear whether the law with relation to the civil death of individuals was still the law of England. The case to which he referred had, however, been compromised by the payment of a sum of money, and no judicial opinion upon its merits would, of course, be pronounced. The law relating to monastic institutions was in a most unsatisfactory state, and he was, indeed, but a short-sighted politician who was not aware that the question of placing it upon a sound footing was that which was uppermost in the minds of the people of England, and was a question which required, and which should receive, a speedy solution. In conclusion, he would beg to move for leave to withdraw his Bill.

MR. HADFIELD said, he was glad the hon. and learned Gentleman had consented to withdraw a measure which could only give rise to religious squabbles, and serve to display the intolerant spirit by which hon. Members on the other side of the House were actuated. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. NEWDEGATE rose to order, on the ground that the hon. Member had already spoken on the Bill, and was proceeding to address the House, but was interrupted by

MR. F. SCULLY, who said, he begged to submit to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire having been himself already heard on the Bill, was not in order in now speaking upon it.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member for Sheffield was out of order, because he had previously spoken on the Bill, but he was not aware that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had spoken on the question.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he must regard the objection which hon. Members opposite appeared to entertain to his being heard in the light of a compliment. He could assure those hon. Gentlemen, however, that he should not be deterred by their opposition from giving expression to his sentiments with reference to the subject under their consideration; and that even though he were to consent to be silent with respect to it, the feeling which existed in connection with it throughout the country was such as would give Parliament no rest until the question relating to monastic and conventual establishments was fairly solved, and those institutions were brought within the purview of the law of England. But to return for a moment to the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield). That hon. Gentleman had ventured to accuse those who sat upon his (Mr. Newdegate's) side of the House of manifesting a spirit of intolerance, but no person, he believed, who had heard the speech which the hon. Gentleman had delivered a few nights before with respect to the Regium Donum, could fail to be of opinion that the charge of intolerance came from him with a very bad grace indeed. A more bigoted speech than that of the hon. Member on that occasion—one breathing a more intolerant spirit with reference to members of the Presbyterian religion—he had never heard. He believed, and he hoped the country would perceive, that no course could be adopted more calculated to be fatal to the interests of Protestantism, or to the maintenance of religious freedom, than that which the hon. Member for Sheffield, and those other hon. Members who were equally indiscriminate and unjust in their attacks upon their brother Protestants, upon the ground that they received State endowments, had pursued. Those hon. Members were perpetually assailing the Established Church in this country, which was the great bulwark of Protestant freedom, and they thus rendered themselves nothing more nor less than agents in the hands of those who were the advocates of the supremacy of the Church of Rome. With respect to the Bill under their notice, he wished to make a very few observations. He for one felt deeply indebted to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) for having brought his great legal ability to bear upon the question with which that Bill proposed to deal. Under the operation of the law as it at present stood in reference to that question, convents were permitted to exist; but, at the same time, the conditions upon which their existence was based—so far as those conditions related to the possession or disposition of property upon the part of their inmates—were by the law totally ignored. The law presumed that a nun was a free agent, quite as unfettered as any unmarried woman at large throughout the country. Now, the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen had upon a former occasion explained to the House in the fullest manner that the vows which were taken by a nun extended to the question of the disposal, not only of such property as she might possess at the time of her entrance into the convent, but also of all property which might subsequently accrue to her either by gift, by will, or inheritance; that this was a state of things which rendered the position of a nun wholly different from that of any other member of the community, and which made it perfectly clear that the law proceeded upon a false assumption in dealing with the nun as a free agent in the disposal of her property. Now, the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend proposed to deal with the subject as it stood, and to throw upon the superiress and the other inmates of the convent the onus of proving that the nun had not been coerced with respect to the mode in which her property should be disposed of. The Bill of his hon. and learned Friend must, however, he supposed, share the fate of another attempt which had been made during the course of the present Session to deal with the anomalies of the existing law, and must be withdrawn, in deference to that persevering abuse of the forms of the House which had been put into practice by some of its Members. He should warn those hon. Members, however, that their attempt to coerce the voice of the House of Commons upon the subject—that every instance in which the Government had either tacitly or otherwise aided them in making that attempt—would merely serve the purpose of strengthening the determination of the Protestants of England that the hands of the Legislature should be set free, and that the laws of this country should be adapted to the altered relations which notoriously had subsisted between the Roman Catholic body and the State ever since the occurrence of that Papal aggression which the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill had been framed to suppress. He could tell the Roman Catholics that, if they hoped to exempt themselves from the control of the laws by resorting to the practice of coercing the voice of the House of Commons, they would fail in the attempt, for the members of the Church of England would never submit to the renewal of that ancient principle of abuse—the privilegium clericale. They were, on the contrary, determined that all religious institutions in this free country should be subject, and equally subject, to the jurisdiction of the law. In conclusion, he had merely to express his thanks to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Enniskillen for the ability and industry which he had brought to bear upon the subject with which his Bill proposed to deal.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he never would be a party to originate any religious discussion calculated to wound the feelings of any Members of that House; and, were he to use strong expressions, they would only be directed against one or two individuals who were perpetually treating the Catholic Members with insulting language. He wished the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen had simply withdrawn the Bill, without observing that he was yielding to a factious opposition. That was not the fact, for the Bill had been allowed to stand over on a former occasion because the hon. and learned Member was absent from the House, being more profitably employed elsewhere. However, he congratulated the hon. and learned Gentleman that on this day, the 12th of July, the hon. and learned Gentleman was doing an act of charity.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

JURORS AND JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, he hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside) who had introduced the Bill would consent to its being withdrawn for the present Session. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had taken the subject of the constitution of juries in Ireland into his consideration, and had already almost fully prepared a Bill upon that subject. If the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite would consent to withdraw his Bill, the Attorney General would bring in the measure to which he (Sir J. Young) had just referred at the commencement of next Session.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the course which the right hon. Baronet proposed for his adoption was one of an extraordinary—perhaps, with the example of the Government before him, he should rather say of an ordinary—character. The right hon. Baronet and himself had been Members of a Committee which had been appointed to inquire into the prevalence of crime and outrage in Ireland, and before whom a great deal of very valuable testimony had been laid. That Committee had agreed to a Resolution to the effect that they had ascertained from the evidence which had been adduced that the present system of preparing the jury list in Ireland was radically wrong, and that the jurors' book should be made up of a list of all persons rated under the Poor Law valuation at a sum afterwards to be fixed. A second Resolution, to the effect that one and the same jury panel should answer in civil as well as criminal cases, had also been agreed to by the Committee. Now, that being the case, he could not understand why the right hon. Baronet, a Member of the Committee by whom these Resolutions had been framed, should endeavour to impede the progress of a Bill which aimed at the reform of a system which he knew to be radically defective. He could account for the course which the right hon. Baronet deemed it advisable to take only upon the supposition that the Government, having made no attempt themselves to remedy the evils of that system, were determined to obstruct the efforts of those who sought to amend the existing law. If the Attorney General had informed him before he introduced his Bill that it was the intention of the Government to deal with the question of the constitution of juries in Ireland he certainly should not have ventured to meddle with the subject. No such announcement, however, had been made upon the part of Her Majesty's Ministers, nor did he believe that they had at the time the slightest intention of taking the matter into consideration with a view to immediate legislation. Under those circumstances he had endeavoured to frame a measure, against whose provisions he had heard no valid objection urged, but which the right hon. Baronet now asked him to withdraw. In that measure he proposed to make the qualification for a juror dependent—not upon the choice of the sub-sheriff or the sub-sheriff's clerk—but upon the intelligence of the individual himself, and the amount of property which he possessed. The Attorney General for Ireland—of whom he should not speak as approving of the Bill—had told him that in his opinion a man possessed of a freehold to the value of from 20*l.* to 50*l.* ought to be eligible to serve on a jury; and he (Mr. Whiteside) had proposed that a man who was rated under the Poor Law at 30*l.* should be competent to act as a jurymen in all cases, whether civil or criminal. Those who at present were selected to act as jurors in criminal cases were of a class inferior to those who served in civil cases, and he had deemed it to be advisable that the qualification should in both instances be the same. Such were some of the principal improvements which the Bill was intended to effect. It was extremely desirable that some alteration in the mode of empannelling juries in Ireland should speedily be made, and he must confess that he did not feel that confidence in the promise which the right hon. Baronet had made which would induce him to entertain any very sanguine expectation that Her Majesty's Ministers would deal immediately and effectively with that subject.

He feared that the contemplated measure would be, like so many of its predecessors, an abortion. For his own part he could only say that he had done his duty, and it would rest with Her Majesty's Government to cast aside the Bill upon their own responsibility.

MR. KEOGH said, his right hon. Friend near him had informed the House that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill next Session for the purpose of amending the law relating to the qualifications of jurors in Ireland. To that intimation upon the part of his right hon. Friend the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had replied in a tone which—when he considered the quarter from which it came—he felt to be in accordance with the hon. and learned Gentleman's ordinary mode of proceeding. The hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to the Report of the Committee upon crime and outrage in Ireland, and had called the attention of the House to a Resolution which had been adopted by that Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman had gone further, and had stated that he had framed his Bill in accordance with the terms of that Resolution. Now he (Mr. Keogh), too, had had the honour of sitting upon the Committee in question, and he felt himself compelled to state that the provisions of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Bill were drawn up in direct contradiction to the Resolution of that Committee. That Resolution was to the effect that the names of the jurors should be taken from the rate list as kept under the operation of the Poor Law, and not, as the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed, from the list of Parliamentary voters. The hon. and learned Gentleman was well aware that there existed the greatest distinction between the two lists, and that the number upon the Parliamentary voters' list bore only the proportion of one to seven to the number upon the list of rated occupiers. The hon. and learned Gentleman must be also aware that, under the operation of his Bill, any man might disqualify himself from serving upon a jury by not paying his rates within a particular day, and thus disqualifying himself from being placed upon the list of Parliamentary voters. He was perfectly ready to admit that the law required amendment, but he felt persuaded that the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman was not one by which that object could be effected. Such was the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, Baron Lefroy, an able and impartial judge, and one who could not be supposed to have any political bias in favour of the present Administration. That learned Judge had, in a letter to his right hon. Friend near him (Sir J. Young), protested, in the most distinct terms, against the enactment of the measure under the notice of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman had also stated that he had had some communication with the Attorney General for Ireland upon the subject of his Bill, and he (Mr. Keogh) could not understand why his learned friend's name had been introduced, unless it were for the purpose of showing that he entertained opinions favourable to the measure.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he had not at all meant to lead the House to suppose that the Attorney General for Ireland approved of the Bill.

MR. KEOGH said, he wished to call the attention of the House to a communication which he had received from his learned friend upon the subject. In that communication his learned friend stated, that in his opinion cases would frequently arise for which there was no clause whatever in the Bill to provide. He also added that there was at the moment at which he wrote a cause pending in the Court of Queen's Bench, which it was supposed the 43rd section of the Bill would meet, but he could only say that that section was a disgrace to our legislation, and could only lead to eternal litigation. On referring to Hansard, he found that a similar provision had been strenuously opposed by the Duke of Wellington. But the members of the legal profession in Ireland were not the only persons opposed to the passing of the Bill under their consideration. He had received a communication from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce in Dublin, conveying a Resolution which had been passed by that body, and which was to the effect that, if the Bill were to pass into law, it would be productive of great public inconvenience. It had also been condemned by the Corporation of the city of Dublin, and by the sheriffs of the counties of Leitrim and Kilkenny. When the hon. and learned Gentleman introduced his Bill, he (Mr. Keogh) had stated that in his opinion no measure could with safety be passed upon the subject with which it proposed to deal until the necessary returns had been obtained from the Poor Law Board. Those returns had not yet been published, but they were in progress, and would, he hoped, soon be laid upon the table of the House. If the hon. and learned Gentleman should then withdraw his Bill, he would only be acting in conformity with the opinions expressed on the matter to which it related by the Chamber of Commerce of Dublin, by the Corporation of Dublin, and by the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and by the Attorney General for Ireland; and when the Government recommended the adoption of the same course, the hon. and learned Gentleman had no right to charge them with any unfair or factious opposition to this measure, and still less had he any right to say that, although they had stated that it had been their intention to have introduced a Bill upon that subject, they, in reality, had entertained no such intention.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he must express his decided disapproval of the Bill. It would reduce to a most unreasonable and inconvenient extent the number of persons liable to be placed on the jury lists in Ireland.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that considering there was not sufficient time to discuss the measure in the present Session, he should move an Amendment to postpone the second reading to that day three months. The whole machinery of drawing juries in Ireland required remodelling, in order to assimilate it to the system that prevailed in this country.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. M'MAHON said, he wished that a measure should be introduced upon the subject, which would extend to the whole of the United Kingdom.

MR. NAPIER said, he thought his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) was rather hardly dealt with in the matter. On the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, the hon. and learned Gentlemen the Attorney General for England and the Solicitor General for Ireland had expressed their approval of its object and of its main provisions, and yet the Government turned round upon his hon. and learned Friend in the course of the progress of the measure, for the purpose of preventing him from proceeding with it. It appeared to him (Mr.

Napier) that his hon. and learned Friend ought to be allowed to complete the work which he had so honourably and successfully begun, and that it ought not to be taken out of his hands by the Government.

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, he must beg to state that, on the second reading of the Bill, he told the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was not his intention to support the measure, and since that time he had received several communications from parties, assigning reasons why the Bill should not pass in its present shape.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he had no recollection of any such statements having been made on the second reading as the right hon. Gentleman had just mentioned.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he thought that sufficient reason for the withdrawal of the Bill was to be found in the fact that the country had not had an opportunity of pronouncing upon it. He thought that this was a question which ought to be left to the Government, and that the public had a right to complain that neither the present nor the late Government had taken any step to carry out the recommendations of the Committee on this subject.

MR. F. SCULLY said, he would suggest that, in any measure to be brought in by Government for the reformation of the jury system in Ireland, its provisions should not be confined to mere nisi prius juries, but should be extended to grand juries, the grand jury system in Ireland requiring as much reformation as the other branch.

LORD NAAS said, that the late Government had made considerable progress in the preparation of a Bill to deal with that subject. They could not have brought forward a measure founded on the Report of the Committee which had inquired into the question during the Session in which they had been in office, as that Report had not been produced until the beginning of the month of June, and as the Session had been brought to a close in the beginning of the month of July.

Words added: — Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

THE SLAVE TRADE ON THE COAST OF CIRCASSIA.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD claimed the indulgence of their Lordships while he put a question to the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, of which he had given him notice, and which was one of great interest to the public. He had to recall to their Lordships' recollection that there had appeared in the public journals within the last few days a series of statements, which would lead their readers to imagine that the first effect of the deliverance of the Circassian coast from the Russian domination had been to revive there, in its worst form, that greatest curse with which the human race had ever been afflicted—the slave trade. A correspondent of one of the morning journals wrote as follows—

"At present the only trade that may said to be carried on here is that in women, and that seems to be extraordinarily active at present, from the large prices obtainable in Constantinople, and the removal of all obstacles. I have been told from good authority that a girl bought for 15 purses here, is sold in Constantinople for 40. Numbers of little boats arrive all along the coasts from Trebizonde almost every day. They haul themselves up on the beach and spread the sails on the sides of the boat to form tents; here the captain sits, and the natives bring down to him their girls to exchange against his cargo, which generally consists of calicoes, prints, and other stuffs, and of salt. There is no money in the country, so that all the bargains are struck with reference to so many pieces of calico, each piece being called a 'mall'; one 'mall' is worth about 15s., and 25 'malls' make a Turkish 'purse.'"

Another correspondent wrote—

"I regret to state that the slave trade is greatly on the increase here. Every boat that arrives from the ports of Abasia brings in eight or ten girls or boys destined for the Constantinople market. It is right to add, that when the coast was blockaded by the Russians this traffic necessarily ceased. But now that communications with Trebizonde are free, the rush to dispose of daughters, sons, sisters, &c., is immense. I hope that our Government at home will bear this in mind, and put an end to such ill-practices. I regret, also, to mention that the Austrian steamers do not raise objections to convey the slaves to Constantinople, and every boat takes 80 or 100 down."

Now, he thought it was of great moment to call their Lordships' attention, and that of Her Majesty's Government, to such a statement as that; because, although happily at present the great and necessary war in which this country was engaged, was highly popular, there was no reason why, if it was of long continuance, it should not share the same fate of all the wars in which England had been ever embarked, and become eventually unpopular; and he was sure their Lordships would agree with him in the opinion, that it would be a great misfortune if the objects for which the war was undertaken were left unaccomplished at its termination. On the other hand, he conceived nothing would tend more to the creation of such an unhappy feeling in the public mind of the country than a belief that the very first effect of the arrival of our arms off the coast had been to revive this abominable evil. He thought, however, it would tend greatly to quiet the minds of many throughout the country if Her Majesty's Government were able to say that their attention, at least, had been given to the subject, and that whatever might have been the first effect of the demolition of the Russian forts, it would be no fault of England. He was sure that the minds of the great mass of the people of this country would be not a little misguided if they were led to believe that the first effect of a war, undertaken in the name of justice and righteousness, and for the protection of the liberties of Europe, was to perpetuate and increase in Turkey the worst evil to which humanity could be exposed.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he had read the paragraph to which the right rev. Prelate had alluded with sentiments of horror and repugnance similar to those to which he had given utterance, and he certainly was not surprised that his right rev. Friend, with his well-known feelings upon this subject, and with his hereditary claims to advocate the cause of the slave, should have drawn the attention of their Lordships and of Her Majesty's Government to the subject. Their Lordships were well aware of all the features of what he might term the social system of Turkey, and they need not, therefore, be told of the extreme difficulty that existed of inducing a Mahomedan Government to entertain seriously the question of the abolition of this horrible traffic. But he could assure their Lordships that the efforts of Her Majesty's Government, as well as those of other Governments, had been directed to the subject, and, although Her Majesty's Ambassadors at Constantinople had stated reasons why they feared the abolition of this traffic amounted almost to an impossibility, yet, two or three years ago, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, acting upon instructions received at the time from Lord Palmerston, did bring the matter formally and seriously before the attention of the Ottoman Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; but he regretted to say that Lord Stratford did not consider he could afford any reasonable hopes that such interference upon the part of foreign Governments would be successful, because of the habits and customs of the Ottoman people. With regard, however, to any particular information possessed by him on the subject, he was unable to tell his right rev. Friend whether the description he had communicated this evening to their Lordships was correct or not, or whether the statement was well founded that the trade had greatly increased since the withdrawal of Russian troops from the coast, or whether the description merely referred to the ordinary traffic. However, even since his right rev. Friend had given notice of his intention to put his question, he had seen a despatch which had arrived from Admiral Dundas, saying that his attention had been called to the subject, and that consequently most strict orders had been sent to the officers commanding Her Majesty's forces on the coasts of Georgia and Circassia to intercept and prevent by all friendly means the continuance of the traffic; and, what was of more importance, Admiral Dundas said, that having ascertained that Schamyl was unfavourable and hostile to the trade, Her Majesty's officers had received orders to communicate with him and with his deputies, in order to concert together measures for its suppression, and prevent its continuance. That, then, was the first opportunity which Her Majesty's Government had had of directly interfering in reference to the traffic, but he hoped he need not assure their Lordships that no effort would be wanting on their part to effect its entire suppression as soon as possible.

COUNT PAHLEN—RUSSIAN SUBJECTS IN LONDON.

EARL GRANVILLE said: My Lords, I trust I may claim your indulgence while I make a very short statement on a subject personal to myself, arising out of a charge to which—from the place in which it was made—it would be irregular for me to refer more particularly. I have been accused, and it has been imputed to me as a grave offence, of having introduced into English society, and presented to an English club, a Russian subject—the subject of a country with which we are at present at war. Count Pahlen, my Lords, a Russian subject, is at this moment in this country. I believe he is well known to several of your Lordships; his high character, his accomplishments, and his partiality for this country, are also well known. He has come here, not from Russia, not from any part of the Continent, but from Madeira, where he has been spending the winter for the advantage of the climate. I believe he has never been employed in any capacity by his Government; but he has spent the greater part of his life in travelling in various parts of the world, and this country he has visited repeatedly. His object in coming here at this time is to settle some small pecuniary matters, but principally to take leave of those intimate friends whom he has here, before that, which at his age, and under present circumstances, may be a final separation from them. As to the charge of introducing Count Pahlen into English society, I think I need only say, that at the time of my birth he was an intimate friend of my father, of the Duke of Wellington, of Earl Grey, and of a great many of the most distinguished men in this country. Since the earliest time that I can remember I have received kindness from that gentleman, and I have always seen him treated with the greatest respect by those on whose judgment I have been taught most to rely. On his arrival here I invited him to my house, and I signed, as I have frequently done before, the printed form of recommendation, on the receipt of which it is usual for the Committee of the Travellers' Club to invite strangers as visitors to the club. That my conduct has not been distasteful to that society, I infer from the fact that in the space of one short ride along Pall Mall yesterday not less than twenty members of the club stopped me to express their indignation at the complaint which had been made. I have stated thus much to show the character of Count Pahlen's visit here, and that, from the somewhat exceptional position which he holds, he has strong claims to courtesy and civility from the members of English society with whom he has been so long in honourable relation; but I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words upon the more general question. I entirely deny that it is not justifiable on the part of an Englishman to treat with civility and kindness the subject of a foreign Power, even when we are at war with that Power. The cases to the contrary are numerous on both sides, even during the late war, when the struggle was so intense, and when so many new restrictions were imposed on international intercourse. The law of nations in times of war was originally barbarous and unchristian in the highest degree; but, as civilisation advanced, mitigations have taken place from time to time in the severity of that code. The office which I lately had the honour to hold gave me the opportunity of taking a humble part in the modification of our own practice in time of war. Those modifications have received the almost unanimous approval of this country and the sanction of public opinion all over the world. My Lords, it must be the interest of all civilised nations to mitigate, as far as possible, the evils of war; but, if it is the interest of any country, it is especially the interest of this country, which has connections and subjects all over the world, and even at this very moment in Russia itself. The only limit I know to such mitigation is, that we should not diminish our own power of carrying on the war with vigour, and therefore of bringing it to a speedy conclusion; but I ask your Lordships, whether civility to an individual stranger in this country, where everything is as open as noonday, can in the slightest degree weaken our means of attack or strengthen our enemy's means of defence? For my own part it appears to me that, if a perfectly faithful statement were taken to the Emperor of Russia of the material state of this country at the present moment, and of the feelings which animate every class of society with which at least I am in the slightest degree acquainted, such an account would not lead that Monarch to take a more favourable view of the probable issue of the war than he does at present. But, my Lords, as I have been accused of acting, not only in an unbecoming, but also in an illegal manner, it is some consolation to me to be able to say, that I have the sanction of the highest authority living in international law for every proposition which I have taken the liberty of laying before your Lordships. As a mere individual Member of your Lordships' House, I might, perhaps, have thought it impertinent—if I may use such a word—to trouble your Lordships with any observations arising out of this subject; but, looking to the official position which I hold, and to the effect which any misrepresentation might have on our national relations, I thought it right to trouble your Lordships with this short statement; and I hope I sit down cleared, in your Lordships' opinion, of having acted improperly or unbecomingly, either as a servant of Her Majesty or an individual Member of your Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, although I think that my noble Friend has somewhat exaggerated—has stated more strongly than he need—the remarks which appear to have been made against him upon this subject, I am very glad that he has brought it before your Lordships, that the country may see that on both sides of the House there is no sympathy with the remarks which have been made, offensive to the noble Earl, and offensive to a high and honourable gentleman, who has for a few days enjoyed the hospitality of this country. I can only say that for my own part I regretted to see those observations made both in a public journal and in another place. I have had the honour of knowing Count Pahlen for many years. He is, perhaps, more interested in, and has a greater partiality for, this country, than any other foreigner whom I ever knew. I know that the whole occupations of his life, his private tastes, and his love of travelling, remove him entirely from diplomatic or political questions, in which he takes only that interest which every intelligent person must take in the questions which are being discussed at the present moment; and I cannot conceive how any exaggeration could have seen, in his presence, any danger to the interests of this country. Your Lordships know that I am personally an eager advocate for the vigorous prosecution of this war, which I consider both just and necessary; but your Lordships will do me the justice to say, that in this House I have never used language which may be construed, even by those partial to the Russian Government, as implying abuse either of Russian statesmen and diplomats, of the manner of their performing their duties, or of the Russian nation itself. I have heard the word “barbarous” used in this House as applying to Russia, and I should be anxious that all foreigners should think that when we use that adjective it is applied not to the persons of the Russians as being Russians, but to their mode of Government as compared with ours. We all know that there are many Russian gentlemen of most accomplished and polished manners and understandings. The gentleman who has been alluded to is one, and we have seen others in this country who are models of the intelligence and the high feeling—who are too well known to your Lordships to make any language necessary to prove how unjustly the word “barbarous” can be applied to them, or indiscriminately to the country and people they represent. That the Russians are not barbarous has been proved by the conduct of their generals. I know nothing more touching, and have read nothing in history more gratifying to our feelings of chivalry and Christianity, than the behaviour of the Governor of Odessa, General Osten Sacken, and his most amiable wife. I believe your Lordships know how the General himself behaved towards the prisoners, and how his lady behaved to their wounded officers and the poor boy who had fallen into the power of the Russians. I am glad to have said what I have done, because, although no one can more strongly feel anxiety for the carrying on of this war with the whole force and vigour of this country, though no words that I can use can express my desire that Her Majesty's Government should continue it, yet I should be sorry that in an Assembly which I may call the highest, and which, I believe, is certainly the oldest Legislative Assembly in the world, language should be used which should cause misapprehension on this subject, or that our feelings upon the point to which my noble Friend has called the attention of your Lordships should be misunderstood and misconstrued.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD said, that he could boast of forty-two years' intimacy with Count Pahlen, and considered the friendship of such a man a legitimate subject of congratulation.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: It is scarcely necessary for me to occupy your Lordships' time in rising to bear my cheerful testimony to the worth and merit of that distinguished gentleman, whose friendship noble Lords on both sides of the House seem mutually desirous to acknowledge and to boast of. I can only say, that I myself have personally had the advantage of knowing Count Pahlen for the last thirty years, and a man more distinguished in society I do not know, or one who has made himself more respected and esteemed in every way. Under all circumstances and at all times during the period I have had the pleasure of knowing him, I can truly say that all my experience of his character and conduct leads me to speak in the highest terms of both; he is a gentleman who, from the habits and tendencies of his mind, has kept himself peculiarly free from political occupations. He is really a citizen of the world, and as one of those many foreign and distinguished men who have a taste for the society of our countrymen, I believe him entitled to our high consideration and esteem. I am one of those, my Lords, who think that in a time of war, equally as in a time of peace, there should be men who form as it were the connecting links of society, and who exert the vigour of their minds, the purity of their intentions, and the greatness of their genius, in unison with the intelligence of the great and learned men of all other countries, as well as their own, to combine, and, as opportunities occur, to diffuse the blessings of civilisation to the different nations of the world, and this in the face of, and independently of war.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that the highly respectable gentleman to whom reference had been made needed no testimony from him, after what had fallen from noble Lords on both sides of the House. With all that had been said in praise of Count Pahlen he most heartily concurred. He rose principally for the purpose of declaring how entirely he concurred with his noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne), that it was a most excellent thing that we should, as far as it was possible, mitigate the inevitable horrors of war by not imposing more restraints upon private and personal intercourse than the necessities of war rendered imperative. It was a great mistake to suppose that such intercourse of a few individuals was in any way a modern invention. Until the Emperor Napoleon, then First Consul of France, took the step which he did in 1803, that intercourse was most usual during the whole course of a war of extraordinary violence and excitement between the parties; and even after the breaking out of hostilities in 1803 there were numerous, though not so frequent, instances of Frenchmen being allowed to remain in this country, and of Englishmen remaining in France, with the proper passports, and under the proper restraints and superintendence, but still being allowed freely to inhabit the two countries. He had himself known many instances of this. It was not even in modern times, and in the more mitigated form of war alone, that this had prevailed. It was known to their Lordships that, even in the dark ages, there were great exceptions as regarded individuals to the rule which excluded the intercourse of people in time of war. He had only to remind their Lordships of a distich, which, though not very classical, expressed a much more amicable feeling than classical times frequently exhibited:—

This showed that we acted for our own interest in thus mitigating the severities of a state of war; and he thought it would be equally to our interest to extend still further that mitigation.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE: I have had the pleasure of knowing Count Pahlen for many years, and of meeting him in many countries and under various circumstances, and I am enabled to say that I never met a man who, while having due regard to the interest of, and attachment and affection for his own country, became entitled so much to the respect of every other country that he visited. I have the greatest pleasure in bearing my testimony, as a sincere friend, to his goodness and worth.

LORD CAMPBELL rejoiced that his noble Friend (Earl Granville) had been induced to say what he had upon this subject, and thought that his noble Friend had not had due credit for the exertions which he had used to effect the improvement that was required in the law of nations. There was no doubt that the laws of this country said, that a contract with an enemy was an unlawful contract; but no one ever could suppose that such an enactment was intended to apply so as to forbid the indulgence of the ordinary civilities of private life with the subject of a foreign country with which we might be at war, and that the encouragement of such civilities could in any way be construed as treason, misprision of treason, felony, or misdemeanor. He considered that the noble Earl had been very improperly assailed on this subject, and he thought too much praise could not be bestowed upon him for his exertions in mitigating the restrictive laws of warfare. We talked much about law reform; now this branch of the law had received an unspeakable improvement since hostilities began; because, preserving our right of blockade, preserving our right of preventing contraband of war being imported into an enemy's country, we had given a great accession to our strength as well as to the commerce of the world, by saying that free bottoms should make free goods.

THE EARL of ELLESMERE said, that his imagination could suggest to him only two grounds on which any person could entertain apprehensions concerning the presence of this distinguished foreigner in our country. One was that he was employed as a diplomatic agent to the Government. That imputation Her Majesty's Government had fully answered, and he was sure that the experience of the noble Lords on the opposite side who had spoken would show them how unlikely it was that Count Pahlen should be here in such a capacity. The next imputation would be more offensive—namely, that he was here as a spy. An intimacy of thirty-four years' standing would prevent his (the Earl of Ellesmere's) believing for a moment that such an employment was consistent with the high character of that gentleman; but assuming that he was employed in that capacity, he said that it would be the interest of this country, and the duty of their Lordships to retain him in this country altogether rather than to dismiss him, to give him access to all the clubs, and to all the information that society could afford him; for what lesson would he carry back to his own country? We were told the other day with perfect truth and justice, in a speech delivered by a very distinguished servant of the Crown, upon a public occasion, that much of the misfortunes of this unhappy contest originated in the ignorance of the Sovereigns of the Continent. He believed that to be the root of the matter. What, then, would be the report of an intelligent Russian as the result of a mission to this country? Is there anything which we should seek to conceal from his knowledge? Would he not tell his Sovereign that the people of this country are rallying round its standard with a unanimity which could never have been anticipated by those who do not understand our institutions and our habits? Would he not tell him that an alliance, which he doubtless thought would never come to pass, now appeared to promise immutability, if that term might be applied to any human institutions? And if this were so, would not the lesson he had learnt as to what he had seen and what he had heard be such as we could allow him safely to carry home to his Sovereign? These were the lessons which even a three weeks' residence in this country would enable Count Pahlen to carry back to his Sovereign, and he should very much regret the withholding of such lessons from the Sovereign of Russia.

THE EARL of ABERDEEN: My Lords, after what has passed and the observations which have been made from all parts of the House relative to Count Pahlen—and in which, as far as they personally affect that gentleman, I cordially join—it will scarcely be necessary for me to assure your Lordships that Count Pahlen has not arrived in this country on a secret mission to me—a notion which has been, I hope, not seriously entertained, but at any rate put forth and asserted by those who oppose the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government generally, and mine in particular. ["Name!"] The authority I refer to is that of a newspaper which it is very well known is the organ of the noble Lords opposite. ["No, no!"] Well, then, in connection with the name of this Russian gentleman, and to show the truth of such authoritative statement, I beg to assure your Lordships that, although for the last forty years I have been a more intimate friend of Count Pahlen than I have been of his Sovereign, yet, notwithstanding this friendship, until I was made aware of the attack which has been made upon my noble Friend (Earl Granville), I had not even heard that Count Pahlen was in this country.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved the second reading of this Bill, the provision of which he stated, and said that, in asking their Lordships' assent to the second reading of this measure, he would remind them that within the last few years most important alterations had been made in the laws regarding merchant shipping. He was sure that their Lordships would feel pleasure in being informed that these alterations had been attended with the greatest benefits, and that the measure of last year had relieved the merchant shipping of this country of about 100,000*l.* of dues. There was a balance of 70,000*l.* remaining in the marine department of the Board of Trade, and there was a sum of 50,000*l.* expected to be added to that amount in the course of the present year, which would enable the Government to make further reductions. By the Bill recently passed for opening the whole of the coasting trade to the shipping of all countries further advantages had been gained. And their Lordships, he was sure, would agree with him in the opinion that the mercantile marine of this country had never shown greater activity and greater energy than at the present moment, or a greater desire to construct vessels of the highest class and on the most scientific principles of naval architecture. Above all, their Lordships would feel still greater satisfaction at the fact that there never was a period when the remuneration of those who were spending their capital and energies in those works was so great as at present.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD CAMPBELL concurred in the general objects of this Bill, which he thought would be attended with beneficial results. With regard to the liability of shipowners in case of accidents, he was in favour of limitation to the value of the ship, but would reserve his consideration of the mode proposed till they got into Committee. There were nearly 600 clauses in the Bill, which would require very careful consideration on the part of their Lordships.

LORD COLCHESTER was highly favourable to the principle of consolidating the laws affecting our mercantile marine, and was glad that the whole subject had been brought before them in this Bill. It dealt with no fewer than eleven different branches connected with shipping, and there could be no doubt of the benefit that would be derived from having all these matters brought under one Act of Parliament. There were one or two points on which he thought amendments might be made, and these he would submit to their Lordships when the Bill went into Committee. He thought this measure would be of the greatest possible benefit to all connected with our mercantile marine.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

NEW FOREST BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into Committee.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he desired to call their Lordships' attention to the present state of the forest. Notwithstanding all the legislation that had taken place upon this subject within the last five years, he was sorry to say that the state of feeling in the forest was worse than he ever remembered it to have been before. It had been supposed that the destruction of the deer would tend to improve the morals of the people; but so far from that having this result, it appeared to have had a contrary effect, for there had been no fewer than twenty-one incendiary fires in various parts of the New Forest between February and May last. This would give their Lordships an idea of the state of feeling which existed. The fact was that the laxity which had prevailed for a great number of years—he might say for upwards of a century—with respect to the rights of the commoners and of the Crown, had been followed by a sudden and severe reaction, and the consequence of this reaction had been that a vast number of those people had been stopped from exercising rights which for many years before they had been allowed to exercise without any molestation. Their Lordships would see that at this moment, when coals were 25s. per ton, turf was extremely valuable, and the right of cutting it was a matter of considerable importance, not merely to rich proprietors and their tenants, but also, and more particularly, to the poor. If his noble Friend opposite would consent to introduce a clause, preserving the right of turbary to those who had enjoyed it before the year 1800, it would let in a great number of persons who were now excluded, and would be received as a very valuable boon. He was particularly anxious, also, that in a country remarkable for its beauty no useless destruction of timber should take place; and he wished to call the attention of the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government to the fact—which a noble Friend of his upon the cross-benches (the Duke of Buccleuch) would corroborate—that within the last two or three years some magnificent trees had been cut down, which were perfectly valueless, either for sale or ship-building, and could only have been felled through carelessness; and to express a hope that such orders would be issued as that a repetition of this might be prevented.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH could assure their Lordships that in one particular instance a clump of trees had been cut down, which was not only an ornament, but a landmark in that country. Every single tree had been swept away, and a remarkable feature of the country, to which the inhabitants were very much attached, entirely destroyed. These trees were wholly valueless for ship-building; and having had considerable experience in the management both of old and young timber, he would venture to say, as an additional reason why these trees should have been left standing, that it was very important to the growth of young timber that a sufficient quantity of old timber should be left for shelter, and to check the violence of the wind.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, this was the first he had heard upon the subject referred to by the noble Earl opposite, and by his noble Friend upon the cross-benches (the Duke of Buccleuch). He did not know at what time this destruction had taken place, but, whenever it was, he should regard such proceedings as had been described as amounting to wanton destruction instead of being a proper administration of the forest affairs. It never could be the object of the Government, or anybody having the management of the forest, to sanction a proceeding of that kind; and he could only assure the noble Earl that although his noble and learned Friend behind him (Lord Lyndhurst) considered him a "rock" and a "stone" in public matters, with respect to this question of old timber he had a very tender heart indeed.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY was understood to consent to the introduction of a clause preserving the right of turbary to the houses which had enjoyed it before 1800, limiting the right, however, to cutting for use, and not for sale, and at the same time providing for the protection of the herbage.

On Question, agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received to-morrow.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY BILL.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3^a.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE said, in the discussion which had taken place on Tuesday on the report upon this Bill, it had been stated, and he believed more than once, that he had expressed a wish that the new private halls should be "retreats" for Dissenters. Now, he was not prepared to say that his words had been incorrectly quoted, but he did mean to say that his meaning had been inaccurately conveyed.

The Duke of Buccleuch

His wish was—in accordance with the clauses introduced by the House of Commons, and happily adopted by their Lordships—that Dissenters should be admitted to the advantages of a University education; and his next wish was, that they should be infused into the general body of college students, among whom, both as regarded their general conduct and their religious feelings and habits, he did not anticipate they would appear to any disadvantage. That was what he thought would be a preferable course—that they should be infused into the general body, and admitted into the present colleges and halls. But he understood that it had been intimated by the noble Earl the Chancellor of the University that he thought it probable that the authorities of the present colleges and halls might impose conditions on the Dissenters who might be admitted which would be incompatible with their religious convictions—for instance, the compulsory attendance on divine worship, although he admitted that it would not necessarily be so. Now, he conceived that, in the new private halls, the same rigid adherence to existing rules and to existing customs and observances might not be so strictly exacted; and in that case, but in that case only, he expressed a wish that these halls should serve as retreats—he would not shrink from the word—that they should serve as retreats as well for Dissenters themselves as for that liberty of conscience which had been thus far given to them.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly, with the Amendments; further Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) BILL, AND LEASING POWERS (IRELAND) BILL.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, the day before yesterday I gave notice that to-day I would call the attention of the Government to two Bills which were sent up from this House to the House of Commons on the 26th of May last. I mean the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill, and the Leasing Powers (Ireland) Bill. In order to make myself clearly understood it will be necessary to go back to what took place on this subject last year. Your Lordships will recollect that when my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) was at the head of the last Administration he caused three Bills to be framed on this subject, which were intended, if possible, to quiet the agitation which had taken place in Ireland with regard to tenant-right; but before he could bring these Bills before Parliament in such a shape that they could be discussed, a change of Government took place. Subsequently, as your Lordships are aware, these Bills were referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons, who altered them into various shapes. The first two Bills, namely, the Landlord and Tenant Bill and the Leasing Powers Bill, although changed from the form in which they were framed by the Earl of Derby's Attorney General for Ireland, still retained so much of the spirit which he intended should be infused into them that when they were again brought forward in their altered shape by the present Government, the Members of the late Government thought it right to continue to support them, and voted that your Lordships should go into Committee on them. With regard to the third Bill, the Tenants' Compensation Improvement Bill, which the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Newcastle) endeavoured to include with the others for our adoption, the alteration effected was so great that we refused to have anything to do with it. Mr. Napier, on reading it in its altered shape, said to me that he could not accept the paternity of it; and in this House I myself stated to the noble Duke, in the name of the late Cabinet, that I repudiated it. On that occasion the noble Duke seemed to be impressed with the opinion that it was of the utmost importance that for the purpose of appeasing agitation in Ireland this question should be settled, and the Bill pass your Lordships' House; but I cannot help thinking that since that time the noble Duke must have adopted the opinions which his Colleagues expressed at that period—namely, that as only eight or nine days of the Session remained, and there would not be time to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, it would be advisable to postpone legislation until the present Session. The noble Earl at the head of the Government said that such was the course he should take, and it was approved of by the Opposition, the understanding on both sides of the House being that the Bills were to rest during the recess, and that they should be reintroduced as soon as possible in the present Session, and first in your Lordships' House. In the present Session the Government lost no time in bringing forward three Bills, which were I believe the identical Bills of the previous Session.

These Bills were presented, as we understood them, as Government Bills, and I think it would be hardly worthy an English Government to say they were not Government Bills. They were endorsed with the name of the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Newcastle), were referred to a Select Committee upstairs, and some of the most distinguished Members of your Lordships' House served upon it. But besides the Government Bills to which the name of the noble Duke was attached, there was an analogous Bill brought in by the Earl of Donoughmore, and another by the Marquess of Clanricarde. We considered these Bills in the Select Committee, and had the advantage of the presidency of the Lord Privy Seal (the Duke of Argyll), who represented the Government on that Committee. I never knew a Committee work harder, with more good humour, or with a more sincere desire to frame in their Report such an arrangement of legislation as should meet the approval of all parties. We were mainly assisted by the efforts of the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll), and we looked on him as the agent and representative of the Government. We appealed to him, as we should have appealed in this House to any Member of the Government sitting on the opposite bench, and we received all his communications with the weight that attached to them as coming from a Cabinet Minister. Your Lordships agreed in the Report presented by the Committee to your Lordships, which was to the effect that the Landlord and Tenant Bill and the Leasing Powers Bill should be recommended to Parliament for legislation; whilst the Tenants' Compensation Bill was rejected by the Committee as not being an advisable measure to be passed. When the Lord Privy Seal moved that the Report of that Committee be received, he said that, "The Committee having approved of a Bill which dealt with the question of buildings, it was not thought desirable by the Committee to have a separate Bill on the subject of roads and fences." And it was understood in the Committee that the noble Duke, both as his own private opinion, and as representing the opinions of the Cabinet, did not think it necessary to press on the Committee or upon the House the passing of the Compensation Bill. It was clearly thought to be his opinion that the first two Bills should be passed, and the third be dismissed. Your Lordships then came to the third reading of these Bills on the 27th May, when the noble Duke the Secretary at War (the Duke of Newcastle) used expressions which showed that the Government adopted the Bills as their own. The noble Duke distinctly stated that the Government were prepared to accept the responsibility of the Bills in their present form as if they had been introduced by the Government. Such, my Lords, was the language used by two noble Dukes—language which I think does them credit for wisdom and proper feeling, showing as it does that they were conscious of the dignity which should attach to the Government in such a matter. The impression left on my mind by the communications of the Lord Privy Seal was, that the Government would do their utmost to carry these Bills through the other House of Parliament. It was also my impression that these Bills would receive the support of a great many Members sitting on the Opposition side of the House; that if any obstruction were made by a certain part of the Irish Members, who were sure to obstruct the Bills if possible, that obstruction would be met in a manly manner by the Government; and that measures which it had taken your Lordships two months to examine would be passed into a law. This delusion, my Lords, was suddenly dispelled the other day by a statement which has been made to the House of Commons, not by a Cabinet Minister, but by the Secretary for Ireland, the pith of which is that the Government had abandoned these important Bills. The language of Sir J. Young, in stating the reasons why the Government have so acted, was very different from that which has been held by the two noble Dukes. He said that—

“ If these were Government Bills, he did not scruple for one moment to say that they would not have been proposed at that period of the Session for the consideration of the House. He was bound in candour to say that he did not think any Bill of this kind would be satisfactory without a Compensation Bill; but the Compensation Bill had been rejected, and therefore the measures which he had supported were not before the House, and how, then, could it be said that he was responsible for them? He believed the Bills were good, as far as they went; but the question was, were they to have legislation upon a part of the subject only, and would that course be satisfactory?”

On that ground, my Lords, Sir J. Young seems to have withdrawn the Bills on behalf of the Government. Your Lordships will observe, in the first place, that he repudiates them as Government Bills, although the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Newcastle), in the strongest way, acknowledged them to be Government Bills, and accepted the responsibility of them; and when the right hon. Baronet spoke of the Tenants' Compensation Bill as indispensable, he was utterly at variance with the noble Duke, who did not at all deem it a sine quid non. It must have struck your Lordships that when the noble Duke was asked how this had happened, he was ignorant that it had happened, or that it was likely to happen. My Lords, I do not accuse the noble Dukes of having dealt unfairly by your Lordships if they were ignorant of what was going to occur. But I have a right to say that the Government has acted as Governments seldom have acted, and as I hope no Government will ever act again. Their conduct displays an extraordinary degree of insubordination on the part of certain inferior Members of the Government, who give up Bills for which two Cabinet Ministers—the two noble Dukes opposite—made the Government responsible. What are we to suppose, my Lords, is the cause of such conduct? It does not appear that in the other House any Cabinet Minister endeavoured to explain it. The whole thing has been done by a subordinate Member of the Government, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who declares that he abandons the Bills because the Tenants' Compensation Bill is a sine quid non. Sir John Young said, that if they had been Government Bills they would have been brought forward at an earlier period of the Session; but they had been brought forward by the Government as early as possible: the Committee sat upon them one week only after the Easter recess, the Tenant Right Bill passed on the 26th of May; now it is the 13th of July, and it was only on the 10th that the matter was mentioned in the House of Commons. What then did Sir J. Young mean by his statement as to want of time? What had been done during the six weeks which had elapsed between the 26th of May and the 10th of July. It appears plainly that the proceeding taken by Sir J. Young has nothing to do with any delay of the measures in this House, and that it was not sanctioned by any Cabinet Minister in this or the other House of Parliament. It is, therefore, with considerable astonishment that I ask the Government if the Bills are abandoned at a period when we have more time to consider them than we had on a former occasion, when the Bills were first brought in in the other House, and after they have been thoroughly sifted by a Committee of your Lordships? I ask the Government whether it is true that these Bills are abandoned?—and, if so, why have they been abandoned? and then, thirdly, I ask, how is it that the Chief Secretary for Ireland has taken upon himself to state to the other House that these Bills were abandoned for the reasons which he mentioned, when the noble Dukes opposite—Cabinet Ministers—were not aware either of the fact of the abandonment, or of such statements having been made or being about to be made?

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE could not help thinking, although the noble Earl was exceedingly ingenious in discovering any ground for throwing censure on Her Majesty's Government, that on the present occasion he had signally failed in making out a case with reference to these Bills. Before he took any notice of what the noble Earl had said as to these Bills, he must refer to the first part of his statement as to what had occurred last year—and he referred to it with great unwillingness, because personal differences and disputes as to facts had taken place on that occasion, which, if the noble Earl had permitted, he should have wished to remain buried in oblivion. But the noble Earl having referred to those facts, he felt bound, in justice to himself, to say he had misrepresented what took place last year between him and a gentleman who did not occupy a seat in that House. The noble Earl said that these Bills were moved by him, and pressed by him last year in a manner which warranted him in drawing a distinction between the course he took, and the course taken by the noble Earl at the head of the Government, in that discussion. He would state shortly what took place. These Bills were brought in by Mr. Napier, as the organ of Lord Derby's Government, in the course of the short Session at the end of 1852, and were referred to a Select Committee of the other House, upon which Members of all parties sat and devoted much attention to the subject during the whole of that Session. When these Bills had passed through Committee, and were nearly on the point of coming up to this House, it was asked by Gentlemen connected with Ireland, who was likely to take the Bills up, as they were not Bills belonging to this Government, but to the preceding Government, which Members of this Government had done their best to put in a shape to enable the Legislature to pass. Some conversation took place, and eventually, in consequence of his having devoted great attention to the subject when he was Secretary for Ireland in 1846, and having brought in two measures himself, he was asked whether, if no one else would take them up, he would. He replied that if it were wished, he was willing to do so; and shortly after Mr. Napier sent for him to come to the bar of their Lordships' House, and told him how glad he was that he had consented to take charge of the Bills; and he told him also, in most distinct terms, that although the Session was late, there would be no difficulty in passing them; that Lord Clanricarde and one or two other Peers connected with Ireland were opposed to their passing, but that the noble Earl at the head of the late Government, and the late Lord Lieutenant for Ireland, and one or two others who had not held office, but whom he named, would give their utmost support and assistance. What he stated last year, and he repeated now, was the assurance he received from Mr. Napier. And further, when the noble Earl opposite referred to a letter of Mr. Napier's—

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY denied that he had referred to any letter.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE appealed to their Lordships whether the noble Earl had not distinctly referred to a letter of last year, in which Mr. Napier said the three Bills were so completely altered?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he had referred to what Mr. Napier said in the House of Commons.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE repeated, that the noble Earl had distinctly referred to a letter from Mr. Napier; and, as he had done so, he also referred to a letter, if not of the same date, one which he received about the same time, and in which Mr. Napier did not make any such statement, but requested him to take charge of all these Bills, and led him to expect that the noble Earl opposite, and those who acted with him, would, if they did not agree to every clause, at least give every facility to passing them. He had been placed in a most unfair position, for when he brought forward the Bills under that assurance, he found that a most active whip was used to bring up noble Lords even from the Isle of Wight and other places by the Opposition, for the purpose of throwing out the Bills after the declaration of their own officer to him that they would support the Government in passing them. When it was seen that the Bills would be disputed clause by clause, then, undoubtedly, the noble Earl at the head of the Government, not acting at variance with the course he had taken, but in entire accordance with his views, and after consulting various Members of the Government, agreed that the circumstances were so completely altered that it would be right to withdraw the Bills, and proposed that they should be introduced in the next Session. Those were the facts connected with the Bills of last year; and he would willingly have said not one word on that subject had the noble Earl not chosen to revive the discussion—a discussion which was extremely painful to him, though he was prepared there and elsewhere to maintain that he had not overstated one single fact of the part he took in these transactions. In fulfilment of the pledge which was given at the commencement of the Session, he brought in the three Bills in statu quo as they had been postponed the last year. The noble Earl said they were brought in and recognised as Government Bills. He wished to prevent misapprehension, not to raise any quibble, for he was ready to defend every act of the Government; and must therefore say the noble Earl had misrepresented what took place on that occasion. He stated broadly that the Bills were brought in in fulfilment of the pledge which had been given in the last Session, and that if they had been brought in as Government Bills there were certain alterations which he should have introduced; and he was quite confident a noble Earl, who brought in other Bills, blamed the Government for bringing them in precisely in the same shape as in the previous Session. The observation then was, that there was not sufficient responsibility on the part of the Government; and now they were told the whole responsibility devolved on the Government, because they recognised the Bills by introducing them. He was perfectly ready to adopt every word he used on the third reading, but he said the Bills were not introduced as Government Bills, and the Government was attacked because they were not introduced as Government Bills. What then occurred? The Bills were referred to a Committee upstairs, and his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal took the Chair, and assented to a great extent, though not entirely, to certain alterations; and he (the Duke of Newcastle) then said, and he said now, that the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) having presided over that Committee, and having reframed these Bills, with the assistance of others, the Government adopted them on his authority and recommendation as measures which might advantageously be passed, as so far settlement of the questions involved in them. He stated on that occasion that in his opinion the Bills had not gone sufficiently far, but that the Bills were good Bills, and the Government would take the responsibility of sending them down to the other House. The noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury), acting, he supposed, on behalf of his party, and in the absence of the usual leader of Opposition in that House, now said they were taken up as Government Bills, and abandoned in the other House as Government Bills. What was the fact? So long as there was a prospect of these Bills being passed, and as long as there was some popularity attaching to them, they were not allowed to be considered Government Bills—Mr. Napier took them up as his Bills. Though literally not moved by Mr. Napier, he, being absent in Ireland, wrote to Sir John Young, requesting him to move the second reading in order to save time. Sir John Young having complied with this request, the Government, when it afterwards suited Mr. Napier's views, were said by him and his Friends to have adopted the Bills. On his arrival from Ireland, however, Mr. Napier, not having yet thought of resigning the Bills into the hands of the Government, would not allow the Government the responsibility or the credit, but gave notice that it was his intention—not the intention of the Government—to move the recommitment of the Bills,—with a view to introduce certain Amendments. The Bills then were still his at that time, and he continued to claim them as his up to Tuesday last, but now all responsibility was to be thrown upon the Government. On Tuesday the Bills came on for discussion in Committee in the other House. The noble Earl said the circumstances were different from the circumstances under which the Bills came up to this House last year, and that they were sent down to the other House considerably earlier, and that they might have passed through the Commons in a short space of time, inasmuch as they had been thoroughly sifted by a Committee of this House. They certainly were sent down a few days earlier; but as to their being sifted, the noble Earl did not seem to consider that the Bills when they came up from the other House last year had been sifted in a Committee of the other House ; but as their Lordships would not allow that to be any authority for them, they could not expect the House of Commons to take the Committee of this House as a bit more binding upon them—the Commons were as little inclined as were their Lordships to pass measures sub silentio and without examination. Well, on Tuesday the Bills came before the Committee of the House of Commons, and Mr. Napier having had the opportunity of recommending all manner of alterations and withdrawals—in fact, he was almost a Member of their Lordships' Committee—notwithstanding these advantages gave notice of a few Amendments, and he held them in his hand—no less than eight closely printed pages of Amendments, amounting to something like 200, to say nothing of Amendments by other Members of the House. These innumerable Amendments were proposed on Bills which had been so thoroughly sifted by their Lordships' House, and so thoroughly recognised by Mr. Napier, who fathered them, that the Government was taunted with the difficulty stated by Sir John Young in passing them. The noble Earl said that at this point of time the Bills were withdrawn, and by the Government, which statement was incorrect. So anxious was the noble Earl to make his onslaught upon the Government, so anxious was he not to lose the advantage of his temporary leadership, that before he knew anything of the facts he gave notice of this question. But, surely, in two days he might have found out the facts a little better, and come down prepared to substantiate what he advanced. The Bills were not withdrawn. They were on the Votes of the House of Commons now ; for all he knew, the discussion was then going on upon them. The Government could not withdraw Mr. Napier's Bills. Mr. Napier was so jealous of these Bills that, instead of Sir John Young calling the Bills Government Bills, all that took place was this :—at the close of a long discussion, in the course of which Members from all parts of Ireland, and not of extreme opinions, had expressed their opinion that it was impossible to pass these Bills satisfactorily in their present shape at this late period of the Session, the Secretary for Ireland said, with the feeling evinced by the House, if the Bills had been Government Bills, and in his charge, he should not be prepared to press them, and that he believed the interests of the measures themselves would be promoted by being postponed to another Session of Parliament. Whether rightly or wrongly, that was the opinion of Sir John Young. He did not know what was the feeling in Ireland upon the subject, his right hon. Friend had the means of judging ; and, in his opinion, these Bills, good in themselves (for in the speech irregularly quoted by the noble Earl, though he did not complain, he said he thought they were good), would not be satisfactory in Ireland, unless the compensation principle were carried further. He knew the opinion of his right hon. Friend was, that they were good in themselves, but that it was almost impossible to carry them in the present Session, and that they could not be carried in that temper to do the same benefit to Ireland, which they would probably effect if carried in the next Session. He believed in the present state of Ireland no pressing necessity rendered it essential that they should be passed this year. At the same time, he should greatly regret if the Bills should not be passed—if indeed they were not to pass. He believed the Bills were good ; but he had not yet received information whether or not they were to be persevered with. Probably, by that time, Mr. Napier had made up his mind what course he meant to take with reference to these Bills. He regretted they had not passed, and undoubtedly, if the further question of compensation were to be raised at some future time, he knew enough of the circumstances of that country to be persuaded that any matter taken out of the category of constant agitation was so much gained for Ireland.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, the Bills which came to this House in July last were two Bills—the Landlord and Tenant Bill and the Leasing Powers Bill—which were proposed by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Napier), and a third Bill proposed by the present Chief Secretary for Ireland—the Tenants' Improvement Compensation—identical in name with a Bill of Mr. Napier's, but differing from it in its provisions and its machinery. There was an extraordinary discrepancy between the language of the Government in this House then and the language in another place now. Then the noble Duke did everything to fix the responsibility of that third Bill on that side of the House, and now Sir John Young said the Bill was his, and he was responsible for it; therefore it was clear it could have nothing to do with the Opposition. The noble Duke had entirely misunderstood the statement of Mr. Napier. Surely, it ought to have been in the noble Duke's recollection that, so far from there being any concert between Mr. Napier and the leader of the Opposition in this House, Mr. Napier told him he had not spoken on the subject to Lord Derby, but would do so, and no doubt Lord Derby would support the Bills. [The Duke of NEWCASTLE: I utterly deny it! I utterly deny it!] He was merely putting in contrast with the noble Duke's statement what he believed to be in the recollection of his right hon. Friend. Mr. Napier had always asserted, both in his place in the House of Commons and in private communications with him and with the noble Duke, that he never for a moment wished to give up that responsibility to any one. But, at the same time, his right hon. Friend thought, and he entirely agreed with him, that after these Bills came out of the Select Committee, over which the noble Duke the Lord Privy Seal presided, the Government had adopted and were responsible for them. The speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle), in moving the third reading, on the 26th of May, proved conclusively that the Government had adopted them as their measures. The first reading, the second reading, the recommittal, and the third reading of these Bills were all moved by the noble Duke, and if that were not proof that the Bills were considered to be Government Bills, he did not know what proof they could have. The Bills went down to the House of Commons, and the second reading was moved by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. [The Duke of NEWCASTLE: I stated so distinctly, at Mr. Napier's request.] He thought it was perfectly natural that Mr. Napier, taking great interest in these measures, should have written to the Secretary for Ireland and requested him to proceed with them. Did the noble Duke mean to say that the having written that letter took the Bills entirely out of the hands of the Government? Then he supposed he was to understand that the Government were perfectly willing to pass these Bills, provided the merit were given wholly to them, but would give them up if their originality was to be attributed to any one else?

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: So far

from that, the Secretary for Ireland acted as second to Mr. Napier, leaving him the full credit throughout.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: And leaving him that full credit, the Government would have nothing further to do with them. The noble Duke had laid great stress on the Amendments which his right hon. Friend intended to propose in Committee on these Bills. On that point he would state that Mr. Napier was requested by the Select Committee to revise these Bills, particularly one of them, which had undergone much discussion during the Easter recess, and have them reprinted. But owing to the printers taking holiday the printed Bill was not sent to Mr. Napier in Ireland, and it was impossible to get the Bill reprinted before the third reading. The noble Duke, he believed, considered it was a great object to send the Bills as soon as possible down to the other House, and therefore they had not that thorough revision which, in Bills dealing with legal questions, was so necessary. Therefore it was that these Amendments were proposed; but, with one exception, they were merely verbal, to make the sense more clear. After the second reading of the Bills in the House of Commons, Mr. Napier, anxious that they should come before the House in a more perfect shape, asked leave to have the Bills recommitted, that these Amendments might be introduced. That favour was refused, and the consequence was, all these verbal Amendments appeared upon the paper. The noble Lord said the Bills were not withdrawn, and he had admitted, as a matter of form, they were not withdrawn; but why? They remained on the paper, to allow of his right hon. Friend explaining the improper position in which he was placed by the conduct of the Government, and defending his character from all imputations. Mr. Napier, as well as their Lordships, had been led to believe that these were Government Bills, and that his aid and assistance, from being thoroughly conversant with the questions, were desired by the Government. Mr. Napier had no complaint to make of the noble Duke the Lord Privy Seal; on the contrary, he stated nothing could be more kind or more handsome than the conduct of the noble Duke throughout the whole course of these transactions; but he did complain of the conduct of the Government. The Compensation Bill, which the Secretary for Ireland thought indispensable, was withdrawn by the Government in the Select Committee on the 11th of May, and subsequently Mr. Ferguson, who had been engaged in preparing these Bills, was brought over from Ireland and paid a large remuneration by the Government for his services. If it was not intended to proceed with these Bills, that was a gross waste of money. Mr. Napier's statement was, that up to four o'clock on Tuesday he believed the Government intended to use their utmost endeavours to pass these measures, and that they were glad of his assistance on a subject with which he was so familiar. He could not understand the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle), that Mr. Napier had taken the matter out of the hands of the Government. The only proof he alleged was the letter written to the Secretary for Ireland, requesting him to move the second reading. Surely it was but natural that Mr. Napier, absent on business, should wish to have the measures forwarded. The right hon. Gentleman must have been a madman to take the matter wholly out of the hands of the Government, for he must be well aware, with the few opportunities private Members had, at that period of the Session, to bring forward their own measures, it would be impossible to pass these Bills, unless the Government took them up, and used their influence and the time at their disposal for the purpose. As to what had been the cause of this conduct, he hoped he should not offend the noble Duke if he said a few words of the plain truth. At the last general election a certain number of Irish Members were returned, pledged to vote for Mr. Sharman Crawford's Tenant Right Bill, and to oppose any Government which would not make that a Cabinet measure. He need say no more about Mr. Sharman Crawford's Bill than that it contained provisions as absurd as the theories of Prudhon and Cabet. When the present Government acceded to office they received support which was felt to be inconsistent with the pledge, and displeasing to many supporters of the question of tenant right. The position of the Government, then, was this—they were obliged to yield to their Irish supporters, and to keep open a sore which every patriot would wish to see closed for ever, because their friends felt that their political vocation in Ireland would be endangered if this question was settled. He went further, and said that it was lamentable they should have a Government which was so weak that it was obliged to yield to the demands of that party, to give up for that purpose measures which it acknowledged to be useful and desirable, and to keep open an agitation which was, of all agitations, the most dangerous and most to be regretted in Ireland, and all because the Government had not either the inherent strength or the moral courage to make even one effort to pass those measures in the House of Commons.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: My Lords, I cannot allow the statements which the noble Earl has just made to your Lordships, and which were cheered by at least one Member of the late Government, to pass without at once rising, not only to contradict what the noble Earl thought himself entitled to call the plain truth, but to state to your Lordships how the matter really stands as regards the late Government and the question of tenant right in Ireland. The present Government is not bound in any way whatever to those who advocate extreme views of tenant-right in Ireland, and the noble Earl ought to have known better than to make such a statement. If the noble Earl chooses to represent the present Government as bound in any way to those Gentlemen, I think he ought to be a little more cautious in the use of his expressions in this House; and the noble Marquess the late Lord Privy Seal (Marquess of Salisbury) ought also to be a little more cautious how he cheers statements addressed to your Lordships. How stand the circumstances connected with the late Government and the general election in Ireland? It is perfectly notorious that those who were sent to stand for the cities, the boroughs, and the counties in Ireland on behalf of the late Government were instructed by those who manage these things to hold very strong language upon the subject of tenant right, with the full understanding that there would be no inconvenience attached to the course which was subsequently to be taken with regard to that question. That is a matter of perfect notoriety. What did the late Government do after the election? The noble Earl talks of Mr. Sharman Crawford's Bill, and of Prudhon and Cabet. What did the late Government do with that which was a counterpart of Sharman Crawford's Bill—I mean the Bill introduced by Mr. Serjeant Shee? When a critical division was about to take place, they made a bargain with the supporters of that Bill, and agreed to refer it to a Select Committee, thereby recognising its principle. The noble Marquess may shake his head; but the fact is well known, and can be substantiated, that the late Government referred Mr. Serjeant Shee's Bill to a Select Committee, and thus encouraged the agitation in Ireland. [The Earl of Roden: Hear, hear!] The noble Earl opposite, himself a supporter of the late Government, acknowledges and cheers that statement. I believe, my Lords, that the agitation of extreme views of tenant right was more promoted and encouraged by the course adopted by the late Government, both during the general election in Ireland and subsequently in the House of Commons, than by any step which any Government, either preceding or subsequent, has taken; while, for the present Government, I utterly deny what the noble Earl has been pleased to call the plain truth.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I know nothing of this subject, except what I have heard to-night. I heard the commencement of this discussion with some regret, and that regret has been constantly increasing during the whole period that the discussion has lasted. My Lords, when the noble Earl who began the discussion asks two or three questions, I must crave the pardon of your Lordships to ask another. It is this—what benefit can the public derive from a discussion carried on in the temper in which this discussion has been carried on? My Lords, the noble Earl on this side of the House thinks that there is insubordination in the camp of the Government, and the noble Duke on the opposite side of the House thinks that there is some degree of insubordination in the camp of the Opposition. Now, I will not say that there is insubordination in either; but I must believe, from what I have heard to-night, that there is a want of that previous communication on both sides between the leaders and those who act with them—who are not the subordinates, but who co-operate with them—the presence of which would most materially conduce to the public service. With respect to these Bills, it is clear to me that there is a very great extent of misunderstanding, and that misunderstanding will only be increased by what has taken place to-night. I deeply regret it. It is evident from what has proceeded from both sides of the House, that substantially these measures are good measures, and measures required for the benefit of Ireland. I will not say whose cause is made better by the discussion of this night, but I am quite sure that the cause of the Bills is made a great deal worse. All I venture to hope is this, that for the sake of the public interests these personal feelings and discussions will be put an end to, and that those Gentlemen who are interested in these Bills will communicate with each other in a friendly spirit, having regard solely to the public advantage, with the view of seeing, even now, whether these Bills may not pass.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he entirely concurred in the observations of the noble Earl. He bore his willing testimony to the good temper and good feeling shown by the Members of that Committee over which he had the honour to preside; and when he remembered the manner in which they discussed the details of these Bills, he felt that he had entered a very different atmosphere when he listened to the violent and most unworthy party attack made by the noble Earl opposite. The whole history of these Bills showed that they were disputing about words. In one sense they had been Government Bills, in another sense they had not been Government Bills. If by Government Bills were meant party measures passed through Parliament with all the strength of the Government, without reference to individual opinions, then undoubtedly they never had been Government Bills, either in their origin or in their subsequent progress through Parliament. The noble Earl opposite had himself related a fact which showed clearly that the Bills had not been Government Bills, properly so called. Instead of the Government or the Committee referring for advice and assistance to the present law officers of the Crown, they consulted almost exclusively the law officers of the late Government; and he was bound to say that, so far as he had had any communication with the late Attorney General for Ireland, he had no reason to believe that there had been anything influencing the mind of that Gentleman except a sincere desire to get the Bills passed. He must add, however, with regard to the conduct of noble Lords opposite, that their whole endeavour had been to avoid the smallest acknowledgment of the principle of tenant compensation in Ireland. Although he admitted that the Members of the Committee had shown a good spirit and good temper in dealing with the details of the Bills, chiefly, he believed, in consequence of the personal exertions of Mr. Napier, yet he did feel it odd, when the Bills were brought down from the Committee, that those Members of the late Government who were responsible for their original introduction should have been the parties to resist to the utmost even the smallest acknowledgment of the principle of compensation. He believed that the vast majority of noble Lords opposite, whatever they might say now, rejoiced that there was a prospect of these Bills failing in the present Session. Nothing but the personal exhortation and entreaties of Mr. Napier, and the proceedings of the Committee, would have induced them to pass the Bills through that House, even in a very damaged state; and he did not think they seriously regretted that it would be impossible at this late period of the Session to pass the Bills through the other House of Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the noble Duke opposite had been pleased to inform their Lordships that the late Government encouraged the agitation of the tenant-right question in Ireland. If by that the noble Duke meant that the late Government permitted their law officers to prepare Bills for setting the question of tenant right at rest, and to submit those Bills to the country, then undoubtedly he was quite right, but not otherwise. The late Government certainly did, with the full consent of the Lord Lieutenant, permit Mr. Napier to prepare the Bills in question; but he was at a loss to conceive how that could possibly be construed into an encouragement of the tenant-right agitation. The noble Duke had denied that the Bills were presented to their Lordships in the present Session as Government Bills, and, as evidence of the accuracy of his statement upon that point, had laid great stress upon a conversation which he had with Mr. Napier; but he would defy the noble Duke to get over the fact that the Bills were introduced and moved by himself as the organ of the Government, even after he had been informed by Mr. Napier in writing that a noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore) would take charge of the Bills before their Lordships. Again, the noble Duke had said that the Bills were moved in the House of Commons by Mr. Napier, but the fact was not so, for both the first and second readings were moved by Sir John Young.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: I have twice distinctly stated that Mr. Napier wrote from Ireland requesting Sir John Young to move these Bills for him, and that Sir John Young did so.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was glad that fact was admitted, for it proved that the Bills were considered to be Government measures. He was surprised, therefore, that it should have been stated in another place, that at this late period of the Session it would be impossible to proceed with these Bills. It was true that Mr. Napier had requested the permission of the Committee to correct several inaccuracies which had crept into the Bills; but, in the opinion of the noble Duke the Lord Privy Seal, who presided over the Committee, those Amendments were merely verbal, and might be made in the House of Commons without leading to much discussion, there not being a single principle involved in them. For his own part, he was not one of those who would abuse the Government for withdrawing Bills. They had done so very often during the present Session. He agreed with them that second thoughts were best, and for withdrawing these and other Bills he begged them to accept his most sincere thanks.

LORD MONTEAGLE hoped their Lordships would turn their most serious attention to the steps that were absolutely necessary to be taken before the close of the Session, if they wished to do their duty to the people of Ireland. It was to him a matter of comparative indifference what might be the relative claims of the Gentlemen concerned in the production of these Bills, or what had been the conduct of the late or the present Government; but as an Irish proprietor—as one interested in the well-being of that country—he took the liberty of calling their attention to the unfortunate position in which they now stood. He might be allowed to say, however, that although it was perfectly true that the Committee sought the advice and assistance of the Gentleman who had so long applied his great energy, his indefatigable industry, and his undoubted public spirit to the settlement of the difficult question of tenant right, yet he never heard it suggested for a single moment that they were thereby casting on Mr. Napier a personal responsibility for these Bills. This was so far from being the case, that he believed he did not misinform their Lordships when he stated that the Committee actually sent a message to the law officers of the present Government, requesting their advice and assistance likewise in dealing with this intricate subject. The Committee felt some reluctance and delicacy in calling upon Mr. Napier, whom they only knew as a private

Member of the House of Commons, to assist them in preparing measures for the House of Lords, and which had been introduced and moved by a Member of the Government; and most assuredly they never imagined that the time would ever come when by reason of the help most patriotically and freely given, the whole responsibility of these Bills would be thrown upon Mr. Napier. He was happy to say that the discussions in the Committees had been conducted in a fair and temperate spirit, though some provisions of it were carried, not because they were right, but because it was thought they would conciliate the Commons. This was a fatal error. When the Report was presented to their Lordships, and the time arrived for the third reading of the Bills, he certainly did feel that the Bills were not only under the charge of the Government, but that he was entitled to look to the Government as responsible for them. His mind was more fully satisfied upon that point, when, wishing to ascertain the responsibility of the Government for the Bills as they then stood, as against the risk of finding them returned in an altered shape from the House of Commons, he put a question on the subject, and the reply given by the noble Duke the Minister of War distinctly was, that he considered the Bills to be the Bills of the Government. But, leaving that branch of the subject, he entreated their Lordships to believe that this question was not one of indifference, or without danger, in Ireland. He admitted, for the sake of argument, that the responsibility of the Government had now ceased, so far as the present Bills were concerned; but they continued responsible for the tranquillity of Ireland, and for the maintenance of that tranquillity it was necessary that the Government should inform the people of Ireland, plainly and distinctly, what they really intended to propose. Suspense and uncertainty were as mischievous as they were unpardonable. These had been the sources of agitation and danger. It was a fatal mistake originally to have sent into Ireland a roving Commission to take evidence of all kinds, and to give the people of that country such a picture as that contained in the Devon Report, if they were not prepared, the moment the Report was laid before Parliament, either to introduce such remedial measures as they considered necessary, or else to confess frankly that they had no intention to bring forward any measure at all; but to leave the country for a series of years expecting a measure from the Government, or threatened with a measure by the Government, allowing the whole of the agitation to be directed against the proprietors and the management of land in Ireland, was one of the most dangerous, fatal, and unjustifiable courses ever pursued by any Government. He agreed with the noble Duke the Minister of War that it was dangerous and culpable on the part of the late Government to deal with this question in the way they had done. When the Secretary of State (Mr. Walpole) consented to read a second time a Bill which the head of his Government (the Earl of Derby) was compelled to disavow, he was, in fact, giving to a bad, mischievous measure, the same weight of Parliamentary and Governmental authority which he granted to a Bill prepared by the law officers of the Government themselves; but all this was now past, and, instead of dwelling upon former errors, it was their duty to see what could be done, and that immediately and undisguisedly, towards the settlement of a question that had long disturbed and agitated Ireland. He believed that there never was, or perhaps never would be, a better opportunity for effecting that object than the present moment; and he thought that the Government would be highly to blame if they did not, before the close of the Session, lay upon the table the Bills which they intended to abide by. He therefore called on the Government to declare their real intentions by producing a definite measure. The Bill introduced and carried by the Ministers in one House had been repudiated by the Secretary for Ireland in the other. Let them tell us to what we are to trust—let them frame and produce their own measure—let there be no further question of mixed responsibility. He did did not call upon them to adopt this or that measure. By the rejection of the Bills which had passed this House they had at present a tabula rasa before them, and it was their duty to produce what might emphatically be called their own Bills. They could no longer plead the responsibility of the Earl of Derby or Mr. Napier—they were bound to show to the people of Ireland that which, in their judgment, was wise, moderate, and practical; if they would produce and carry such a measure, it would at once save that country from the dangers of agitation, and protect themselves from the risk and hazards of the next Session.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he wished to correct one mis-statement on a point of fact which had fallen from his noble Friend who had just sat down. He was sure that mis-statement was quite unintentional on his noble Friend's part. He understood his noble Friend to say that the only argument used in Committee with reference to the tenants' compensation clause was that it had been put in in order to satisfy the House of Commons, and not because it was right or just in itself. Now, he (the Duke of Argyll) had most distinctly contended that the clause which was drawn up on this subject for allowing compensation to the tenant was just and equitable in itself. He confessed that he had been greatly astonished to hear his noble Friend's exhortation to the Government that they ought to introduce a Bill exclusively confined to the question of tenants' compensation. [Lord MONTEAGLE: No.] If his noble Friend merely meant that the Government should bring in a Bill on the subject of leasing powers, or a Bill for the simple consolidation of the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland, without touching at all upon compensation to tenants, it was not at all improbable that such measures would be received with general assent on both sides of that House; but it was the subject of tenants' compensation that his noble Friend must have meant when he said that it was a dangerous subject of agitation in Ireland; and if it was now his advice to the Government that they should pass a Bill on that question, certainly that counsel was strangely at variance with the language that had been previously held by his noble Friend both in the Select Committee and in their Lordships' House, because his language had hitherto uniformly been that they ought to let that question alone—that they should not touch the subject of compensation to tenants; and, above all, that they ought not to give any retrospective compensation—that the agitation on the subject was dying away; and that they should not keep it alive by any legislation of this kind. Therefore he could not see that there was much consistency in his noble Friend's exhortation to the Government to introduce a Bill on that question. However, he (the Duke of Argyll) would express his own individual opinion to his noble Friend in reference to this subject. He held in the main that for the future the relation between landlord and tenant ought to rest upon contract, and upon contract only; and he believed that the most mischievous parts of the Bill that was introduced by the late Government were not those that were retrospective, but those of a prospective character; and the patermity of the latter the noble Earl opposite would hardly deny belonged to the late Government. He (the Duke of Argyll) said that, whatever their legislation might be, it ought to be confined to the past, and should declare that in future the relations of landlord and tenant must rest on that which was the only sure and solid foundation—namely, contract, and contract alone. That was his individual opinion, for which nobody but himself was responsible; and he repeated that whilst it would be but right to adopt a measure giving compensation to the tenant under a state of things that was now rapidly passing away, and in which it was but fair and just that his exertions and his outlay should be considered, let their compensation be retrospective, and retrospective only, and for the future let it depend entirely upon contract.

LORD MONTEAGLE explained that he had not meant to say that the noble Duke rested his advocacy of the compensation clause exclusively upon the strong feeling entertained in the House of Commons in its favour, and the consequent necessity of conciliating that branch of the Legislature; but certainly there could be no doubt that, but for the argument which had been urged with regard to the feeling of the other House, that clause would never have been carried by their Lordships. To this principle he had strongly objected, as an unworthy motive for legislation. As to the course which he had ventured to suggest that Her Majesty's Government should take, and which he considered to be the only wise and just one, it referred to the duty of delivering a deliberate and final opinion on the general question of the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland. He was, indeed, far from asserting that the Government ought to bring in a measure for giving tenants compensation, but that they ought in a distinct and manly manner declare the principles by which they meant to abide. For this purpose they were bound to lay upon the table of the House such measures with reference to this important subject as they really intended as a Government to propose and adhere to, so that the people of Ireland might know what they had to expect from them on this question, and might be undeceived with respect to their future intentions so far as those intentions might be inferred from the course taken by their Colleagues in the other House.

THE EARL OF RODEN said, that he had listened with great regret to the debate which had just taken place on a measure materially affecting the interests of that part of the empire with which he was connected. No noble Lord who had yet spoken on the question had expressed sentiments with which he (the Earl of Roden) could entirely agree. He lamented as much as the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) the spirit that had been evinced on both sides of the House, and concurred with him in thinking that such a discussion could be of no possible advantage, but quite the reverse to the great interests at stake on this question. He was sorry to hear from the noble Duke opposite that Her Majesty's Government had not withdrawn these Bills, and he had been in hopes that he would have to discharge the pleasing task of thanking them for adopting such a course, and he knew that in so doing he should only have been expressing the opinion of the great majority of the landed proprietors of Ireland. He knew that they were opposed to these Bills, as being founded upon a principle that was unjust and on a principle of legislative interference with the management of property in Ireland that no Government would venture to introduce in reference to England. The landlords of Ireland felt that they were capable of managing their own property as well as the landlords in England, and they expected that the same law and justice would be dealt out to the one part of the empire which was enjoyed by the other. He agreed with his noble Friend opposite (Lord Monteagle) that it was very desirable that something should be said or done on the present occasion calculated to disabuse the minds of the people of Ireland of the idea that any such measure as some persons had led them to look for would ever be allowed to become the law of the land. He believed that a great change for the better had taken place within the last few years in the management of Irish property; and he entreated their Lordships to leave this subject alone, and not to take measures or bring in Bills by which matters could only be rendered worse and worse, and which, instead of allaying discontent and setting this question at rest, could only tend to exasperate public feeling, and to make it more unsettled than ever it was before. These were the sincere opinions of one who was not unacquainted with the circumstances of Ireland. He had now spent a long life in that country, and knew well the feelings of its people—knew the objects which they had at heart, and was likewise aware of the improvements that had there taken place; and, therefore, in expressing thus strongly his opinion upon a question of such vital importance as the present, he felt that he could speak as one who had authority to do so. He would only entreat them then to forbear from legislating upon that of which legislation had hitherto proved the ruin. It was never known in Ireland, from one year to another, what the law upon this subject might be, the changes that were made being so constant and frequent; and he therefore trusted that their Lordships would now allow that country to enjoy a little of that repose and respite from legislative meddling which prevailed so happily in England.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said: My Lords, I think it incumbent on me to explain myself in reference to the accusation made against me, to the effect that this attack had something personal and was intended to be personal. My Lords, I utterly deny that accusation. If there was any expression of mine that could by possibility offend any noble Lord, I am ready to withdraw it, and also to express my sorrow for having used it. But I am so certain of my expressions, of the spirit of what I say, and of the feeling with which I have accused Her Majesty's Government, that I know no word or expression unbecoming a Member of your Lordships' House has escaped my lips, or could even be construed of a personal nature. I wish, my Lords, I could say as much for noble Lords on the opposite side. Of the noble Duke the Secretary for the War Department I will say nothing beyond this, that he does not at all times display that control over his temper and language which his position as a Member of Government would lead the governed to expect. However, I shall only say of the noble Duke, that, altogether, he made as good a defence as possible to my accusation. There is another noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) of whom I must complain for using expressions not at all customary in your Lordships' House, and which are not at all borne out by what I have stated. The noble Duke said my attack was "unworthy." My Lords, I consider that an offensive expression. I am sure I meant nothing offensive. But the noble Duke should know such language is not ordinarily used in this House; and I cannot see how my attack can be construed into an "unworthy" one, when your Lordships will recollect how much I have been identified with this subject. What are these Bills? They originated with a Government of which I had the honour to be a Cabinet Minister. The following year a discussion—a very warm discussion—took place on the subject. Another year passes, and discussion is again taken on the subject, and I am appointed a Member of a Committee to which these Bills are referred. I attend regularly on that Committee for two successive months, and give the Bills every possible attention, therefore, that being the case, I say I should be a dolt indeed if, understanding those Bills and devoting so much time and attention to them, I had remained careless of their fate, and heard with indifference that they were abandoned by Her Majesty's Government. When comparing the policy and intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers with their acts at this moment, though I am certain of my language, I cannot say what my manner might have been in giving it utterance. But I know I used no expression "unworthy" the dignity of your Lordships' House, although the noble Duke opposite designated my attack as "unworthy." I hope the noble Duke will withdraw that phrase.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL was sorry if he had said anything personally offensive to the noble Earl; and if the noble Earl thought he had done so, he would withdraw it. All that he had meant to say was, that the attack was a party one, and therefore, in that sense, an unworthy attack. He considered that this question was not a party question, and ought not to be so treated; neither did the noble Earl's own friends treat it as such in the Committee; although he certainly thought they were now doing that. They first said it was a Government measure, meaning thereby, a party measure (otherwise their argument was worthless), and then they made what he conceived to be a party attack on the Government.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I am quite satisfied with what the noble Duke has stated as applicable personally to myself; and I assure him I entertain no party feeling beyond that which must always exist in a House divided into two parties—the duty of the Opposition being to scrutinise, on behalf of the country, the proceedings of those in authority; and the duty, or one of the duties, of the Government, being to sit still and receive Opposition attacks. In reference to the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle), to the effect that the late Administration had authorised or encouraged its supporters to use the cry of tenant right, I have only to say it is the first time I heard such a statement, and, what is more, I do not believe it. As far as my knowledge goes such is not the fact; and it scarcely could have been the case without my knowledge. But, my Lords, I am not anxious to occupy your time, and shall, therefore, conclude by saying that, upon the main point, I wish to know if these Bills are given up, or if they are to be persevered in. On that we have not had a distinct answer throughout the evening.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that if the noble Earl had given him a few minutes' notice of his question, perhaps he might have been able to give him a more distinct answer to it. He was not aware of what had that night taken place in the other House on this subject, and, perhaps, the noble Earl knew more of it than he did. But he already stated what was the literal fact, namely, that when the Bills were under consideration in the other House the day before yesterday (Tuesday), the Secretary for Ireland said that if he had the charge of the Bills—and it was generally thought that they required a very lengthened and laborious discussion in Committee—he should certainly be prepared to state that at that period of the Session they ought not to be persevered with this year. There the matter rested till that day, and the Bills remained on the books of the other House for six o'clock. He had not seen a Member of the House of Commons, and did not know what had since occurred; but this he could say, that the Government felt that several evenings must be employed in discussing the Estimates and in other important business; and, that, therefore, at this period of the Session, if there was an intention on the part of the fifty or sixty Members for Ireland in the other House who took an interest in this question to raise a discussion upon every clause, it would be impossible to proceed with these Bills during the present Session of Parliament.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

THE WAR WITH RUSSIA—BLOCKADE OF THE RUSSIAN PORTS—QUESTION.

MR. HUTT said, he begged to ask the noble Lord the President of the Council what was the actual state of the blockading operations undertaken by the British Government in the Black Sea, and whether the Government contemplated an immediate blockade of all the ports in the Black Sea and the Sea of Azoff?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, with respect to the first question of my hon. Friend, the answer I can give is, that there is an effective blockade of the mouths of the Danube, which has just been regularly notified. With regard to the question as to what are the intentions of the Government with respect to the immediate blockade of all the ports in the Black Sea, and the Sea of Azoff, I must answer it with some reserve. Admiral Dundas, the commander of our fleet in the Black Sea, came to an arrangement with Admiral Hamelin on this subject; it was, however, necessary that the propositions should be transmitted to Constantinople, and Paris as well, for the purpose of coming to some agreement on the subject. On the arrival of the document at Constantinople, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe had some doubt whether the propositions made by the two Admirals were in strict conformity with the law of nations, and thought it necessary to refer them to this country. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has taken opinions on the subject, which have been transmitted to Constantinople, and afterwards the intentions of Government will be declared.

MR. HUTT said, after the statement the noble Lord had made relating to the Black Sea, he should like to know something with respect to the White Sea; and he begged to ask the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty what were the intentions of the British Government as to the blockade of ports in the White Sea?

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, by an arrangement with the French Government, orders have been transmitted to the French and English Admirals commanding the combined fleets at the entrance of the White Sea to institute a strict blockade of Archangel and other ports of the White Sea, commencing on the 1st of August.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) BILL, AND LEASING POWERS (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read; House in Committee.

MR. NAPIER said, he rose to make the statement of which he had given notice in the early part of this week on the subject of these Bills. It was in consequence of the appeal he had made to the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) on a former night, that he was then enabled to make observations which he deemed necessary in reference to the extraordinary statement of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland, to which, as yet, he had had no opportunity of replying. He confessed that statement had quite taken him by surprise; and it was, therefore, with the deepest and sincerest regret that he now felt himself compelled to ask the attention of the Committee to the circumstances under which he was called upon to address them. The right hon. Baronet, at the end of the morning sitting of Tuesday, said—and that he (Mr. Napier) might not misrepresent him in anything, he would give the leading passages in his speech on that occasion as they were reported in the Times, and he believed the report was substantially correct—the right hon. Baronet had stated, in reference to the two Bills before the House—namely, the Landlord and Tenants (Ireland) Bill and the Leasing Powers (Ireland) Bill—that if they had been Government Bills, they would not have been proposed at this period of the Session—

“ Sir J. Young assured the House that if these had been Government Bills, they would not have been proposed at this period of the Session. Nothing could be fairer than the course taken by the Government upon these Bills, or more courteous to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Napier), to whose skill and ability they were undoubtedly owing. A Committee of that House, fairly appointed last Session, discussed these Bills, and at a late period of the Session they were sent up to the House of Lords. They were taken up by the Duke of Newcastle, but it was found impossible to carry them at that time. The Landlord and Tenant Bill, the Leasing Powers Bill, and the Tenants' Compensation Bill, were read a second time by the House of Lords, and it was resolved that the Bills should be considered by a Select Committee at the beginning of the present Session. A noble Lord, a Member of that House, brought in this year a Landlord and Tenant Bill, and a Leasing Powers Bill, which had a resemblance to the Bills of last Session, but without the Tenants' Compensation Bill. These Bills were all sent to a Select Committee of their Lordships' House. The Landlord and Tenant Bill emerged from that Committee, but no Tenants' Compensation Bill, and that which he (Sir J. Young) proposed and was responsible for was not before the House at all. The two first-named Bills were, he thought, good measures as far as they went. The Landlord and Tenant Bill was a good consolidation of the law, and the Leasing Powers Bill was a very good measure, and, taken by itself, was a great improvement on the law. But was he to take this for the whole code of tenancy? Was the House to take a part of legislation without the rest, and would the two Bills now before the House be acceptable without a Tenants' Compensation Bill? He inclined to think they would not. If hon. Members who were usually supporters of the Government had asked the Government to proceed with the Bills this Session, the Government would have done so. But no one representative of an Irish constituency, who had come to him on the subject, had wished these Bills to be persevered with during the present Session. Still he had determined to leave the decision to the House, and he had obtained a morning sitting for the discussion of this subject. After what had taken place that day, he must confess he did not think it fair and right to press these Bills further upon the House. The compensation clauses of the first Bill, unless accompanied with the provisions of the Tenants' Improvement Compensation Bill, would only create dissatisfaction."

Not only was he (Mr. Napier) desirous not to misrepresent the right hon. Baronet, but he was anxious to put his observations in the best light. It was quite true, as the right hon. Baronet stated, that he (Mr. Napier) had been treated up to yesterday with very great courtesy, and with every respect by the Government in the matter; but having been so treated, with propriety and candour, as he supposed, he could not have had any doubt that he was in full co-operation with the Government to have these Bills passed with all the energy which could be brought to bear upon them by both. The first intimation he had received of the slightest indisposition on the part of the Government to proceed with these Bills occurred yesterday—not before; and he (Mr. Napier) would appeal to the Committee and to the country, therefore, as to the manner in which all parties had been treated in the matter. But more than that, he complained of the way in which a question which he conceived to be most important to Ireland had been dealt with. The right hon. Baronet put his case on this ground. He admitted that the two measures then under discussion were valuable measures, and that there could be no objection to them; but that the third Bill, which he (Sir J. Young) had proposed—the Tenants' Compensation Bill—and for which he claimed the responsibility, not having come down to that House from the Lords, he considered it would be unfair to ask the House to go on with the other two Bills, which, he added, were not Government measures, or they would not have been proposed at that late period of the Session for the consideration of the House. A discussion had previously been raised as to whose Bills these were, some hon. Members saying that these were Government measures, and others that they were his (Mr. Napier's); and the very first words used by the right hon. Baronet were "if these had been Government Bills"—and the right hon. Baronet added that he was not responsible, because the whole of the measures were not before the House, and he would not go on with but a part, said to be imperfect and defective. In the other House of Parliament, however, the Duke of Newcastle had made a very different statement on the same afternoon. On that occasion the Duke of Newcastle expressed himself in these terms—

"The Duke of Newcastle said it would have been very convenient if the noble Earl had given him only five minutes' notice of the question which he had meant to put to him, as he had only heard of the facts to which he referred just as the noble Earl rose, from a noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Bath), and therefore had had no opportunity of conferring with his Colleagues on the subject, and of confirming or setting right the statement which the noble Earl had made. He would, however, take the earliest opportunity of doing so, but he might say now that it was always intended, that it had always been intended, to persevere in the Bills to which the noble Earl referred to, if the circumstances of the Session permitted, but still, at the present period of the Session, and considering the lengthened discussions which had always taken place on this subject, it might be impossible, even if a few Members persevered in their opposition to it, to carry those Bills without throwing over all other public business. The Bills were not party Bills, and had never been looked on as such, and though, technically speaking, they might not be Government Bills, there was no doubt that the Government had adopted them in their essence. He was quite sure that there was no unfair repudiation of these Bills contemplated by Her Majesty's Government, and that the only reason why they were withdrawn was, that it had been found impossible to proceed with them during the present Session."

Nothing could have been more fair than this statement. If the case presented by the right hon. Baronet had been, that from circumstances over which he had no control, or from the unscrupulous use of the forms of the House by Members who opposed the Bills, he had been defeated in his attempts to proceed with these measures, he (Mr. Napier) should have had nothing to say on the subject, as he would consider that a fair excuse for relinquishing them. But the right hon. Baronet did not put the case on that ground; he put it entirely on this ground—that as they were not accompanied by the Tenants' Compensation Bill, which had passed the House last Session, he could not go on with them. He (Mr. Napier) had never had the slightest intimation from the Government, though he had been in frequent communication with them on the subject of these Bills, that it was not their intention to press two without the third; or that the Tenants' Compensation Bill, having been rejected by a Select Committee of the Lords, they felt themselves not to be bound by that decision, and that they did not intend to press forward the others. So far from this, he believed there was not a dissentient voice in that Committee, on which were several Members of the Government—the Duke of Argyll presided over it. The other two Bills were adopted as a fair settlement of the question, and sent down to the House of Commons as Government Bills. The first reading was moved by the right hon. Baronet, and he (Mr. Napier) believed the second reading also; certainly it was moved by a Member of the Government; and the day was fixed for going into Committee. He was himself at that time absent in Ireland. Communications had been made to him with regard to them, and he applied to the noble Lord to know what day he could give for them to be taken into consideration. He admitted that every courtesy was shown him at that time, and everything conducted to make him think they were to be bona fide proceeded with. He had kept continually working at them with that view, spending his own time and that of others in considering them; and now, having proceeded so far in this way, under the belief that these two Bills were to be passed, he learnt from the lips of the right hon.

Mr. Napier

Baronet that they were renounced by the Government in consequence of the rejection of the Bill of the right hon. Baronet by the Select Committee of the Lords; and the sore that had so long been festering in Ireland was to be again torn open, with the intimation that these Bills would not be proposed unless that rejected Bill accompanied them. He (Mr. Napier) wished to know whether the Members of the Government in the two Houses resolved on speaking different things. The right hon. Baronet had talked of those Members who honoured the Government with their confidence; perhaps he had communicated his intentions to them. But those hon. Members who represented Ulster, and who, for the most part, did not honour the Government with their confidence, they were certainly kept in ignorance, as well as he (Mr. Napier) himself, on the subject. The first thing the right hon. Baronet said was, that these two Bills were not Government Bills. If so, who placed them on the paper? By whom had they been brought forward? The right hon. Baronet wished, perhaps, to say that he would not take the onus of these Bills. He had intimated that they were his (Mr. Napier's) Bills. He (Mr. Napier) could have well understood the right hon. Baronet if, on the rejection of the third Bill, he had come forward and stated that he would not be bound by the Select Committee; but that he had not done, nor had he intimated to him (Mr. Napier) and such intention or opinion. Let him for a moment trace the history of these Bills. Originally there had been three of them—the two now before the House and the Tenants' Compensation Bill. All three were confided to the Duke of Newcastle to take charge of them in the House of Lords, and in his Grace's hands he had been quite satisfied to leave them, knowing that when Secretary for Ireland, in 1846, he had given great attention to the subject and in conjunction with the right hon. Baronet, prepared a Bill on the same subject, which had not gone beyond the first stage of it in consequence of the change of Government. They were presented to the House of Lords accordingly. But a noble Marquess, who endeavoured to be as unkind to him (Mr. Napier) as possible, asked the Duke of Newcastle, on the 8th of August last year, whether the Bills had been submitted to the law advisers of the Irish Government, and what was their opinion as to the safety and accuracy of the Bills. To that his Grace replied that, after the change of Government, it was thought desirable that the Bills should be submitted to the law officers of the new Administration; they had been accordingly submitted to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the Attorney and Solicitor General for Ireland, and they reported that the Bills had been drawn up with great care and accuracy, accompanying their report with a recommendation that they should be passed as speedily as possible into law. Under these circumstances he (Mr. Napier) thought he needed not be ashamed of the paternity of the two Bills, as there were no higher authorities on the subject who could be officially consulted. On the next day, on moving the second reading of the Bills, the Duke repeated that the Bills had been referred to and approved by the present Lord Chancellor and the present law officers of the Crown in Ireland. He ended by saying, "Her Majesty's Government were ready to place the responsibility of settling this question to the credit of the late Government, if the proposed measures succeeded, with a certainty of blame to themselves if they did not." What occurred last Session of Parliament was this:—When his Grace proposed to submit them to the House of Lords, he (Mr. Napier) was absent in Ireland, and there was great confusion and unpleasantness on the matter; and it being then close on the end of the Session, the Earl of Aberdeen said, that the Government would undertake themselves at the beginning of the next Session to send the Bills to a Select Committee of the House of Lords, and have them fully considered—that they would then see what could be made of them, and would endeavour to pass them as they should be moulded by the Committee. In the interval between Session and Session, he (Mr. Napier) had again looked over them, and he had taken all the advantage in his power of the observations made in the House of Lords. He could not but perceive, he admitted, that the Tenants' Compensation Bill was objected to in all its parts, and he found that so much misrepresentation prevailed in Ireland, that, in reply to his noble Friend (the Earl of Donoughmore), he addressed him a letter stating the true facts of the case. He then sent this to the Duke of Newcastle and informed his Grace that he would disembarass him of the two Bills. The difficulty was to find a father for the Tenants' Compensation Bill, though with regard to its authorship there was no doubt, for in the official list of Bills published in July, 1853, the Landlord and Tenants Bill and the Leasing Powers (Ireland) Bill were set down to him (Mr. Napier), and the Tenants' Compensation Bill to the Government; the third reading was, in fact, moved by the Solicitor General for Ireland. He (Mr. Napier) had endeavoured, as he said, to amend the two Bills, and the Earl of Donoughmore proposed them in their amended form upon the first night of the Session. The Duke of Newcastle thought, in consequence of the pledge already given at the end of the last Session, that he ought to produce all in their original form, and he did so. In three weeks after, the noble Marquess alluded to (the Marquess of Clanricarde) produced another Bill, and a fourth Bill was produced by a noble Lord connected with the north of Ireland (Lord Dufferin). All these Bills were referred to the Select Committee over which the Duke of Argyll presided. Shortly after that Committee sent a message requesting him (Mr. Napier) and the Solicitor General for Ireland to attend and give evidence. He (Mr. Napier) did for many days attend accordingly, and he heard with some surprise and indignation the charge which had been made against the Committee the other day by the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny, after witnessing the unwearied pains, the ability, the attention, and the impartiality of that Committee. It was in his (Mr. Napier's) mind impossible to have made a better selection than the Duke of Argyll to preside over such a Committee, conversant as he was with Scotch law, from which several of the provisions of the Bill were borrowed; his Grace had made himself master of almost every branch and every detail of the question, and he had never met and he could never expect to meet with greater courtesy and fairness than had been exhibited by that nobleman. His Grace it was who suggested that Mr. Ferguson, to whom he (Mr. Napier) was so deeply indebted for the preparation of these Bills, should be sent for and paid by the Government; and it was due to the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Young) to state that he at once acceded to that proposition. The Committee went to their work, and on the 11th of May they made their Report. On the 18th of May the Duke of Argyll, on moving the recommitment of the Bills, made a full explanatory statement. He said—

"With regard to the first Bill, when it was read a second time some weeks ago a strong feeling with reference to some of its provisions was expressed by noble Lords on both sides of the House. In the discussion which had taken place in the Select Committee there had been, on the one hand, a firm determination to maintain those great doctrines of property on which must depend all agricultural and, indeed, all other improvement; while, on the other hand, there had been an equal determination not to allow a pedantic adherence to abstract principles to stand in the way of the real justice of the case."

After mentioning the titles of the various Bills referred to the Committee, the noble Duke said that—

"With respect to this measure, the whole of their discussions had arisen with respect to the clauses relating to the compensation to be given to the tenant for existing improvements. It would, however, be a mistake therefore to suppose that these clauses were all that was important in this Bill, for, in truth, the most important parts had no reference whatever to compensation. On this question he (the Duke of Argyll) adhered to the great fundamental principle that the relation between landlord and tenant should be founded upon contract. In perfect consistency with this, however, he thought they might pass enactments referring to the relations between landlords and tenants in cases where there was no agreement, or where the agreement was silent."

The noble Duke went on to say—

"He thought that it would be politic in the House to ease off the hardships which might be attendant upon this period of change, by making provision for the compensation of tenants for the expenses they had actually incurred by erecting buildings under customs which were now passing away. With this view the Select Committee had determined, to a certain extent, to give a retrospective operation to the principle of the Act of 1851, which he had already described to the House. In the Bill as it was originally introduced, it was proposed to declare absolutely that 'all buildings which shall have been erected at the sole expense of the tenant shall belong to him, and be removable from the farm.' It was, however, objected to this that in many cases the tenant had been sufficiently compensated for his outlay by the length of his lease, and the Committee had therefore modified the clause as follows. They had prepared a list, in the first place, of the cases in which any claim on the part of the tenant should be absolutely barred; and, in the second place, a list of circumstances which should be taken to limit the amount of the claim. The tenant was to be absolutely barred from making any claim for buildings erected at his own expense if they were erected in pursuance of any agreement, if they had been already compensated for by any abatements or allowances of rent, or if they were erected in violation of any covenant against sub-letting, and, lastly, if they had been enjoyed for twenty-one years. The amount which could be claimed by the tenant as compensation, should the landlord elect to purchase the improvement, was to be reduced in proportion to the length of time short of twenty-one years, during which the tenant had enjoyed the improvement; and the landlord might also reduce it by showing that allowances or abatements of rent had been made on account of the improvement, or by showing that arrears of rent were due to him. He believed that, thus modified, the clause was founded upon sound principles, which it would be equally for the interests of landlords and tenants that that House should adopt. After the Landlord and Tenant Bill and Leasing Powers Bill had been passed through the Committee, they next came to the consideration of the Tenants' Compensation Bill. It was proposed originally that the Bill should have reference to improvements not only in, but on, the soil; but when the Bill left the House of Commons the improvements in the soil were totally excluded, and as the Bill came to the House of Peers there was nothing referred to in it but roads and fences. It was thought by the Select Committee that it would be absurd to have a special Bill for roads and fences, having already dealt in another measure with houses and buildings, and the Committee had reported against the expediency of proceeding further with the Tenants' Compensation Bill. They had reported in favour of the other two Bills, and he should, therefore, move their Lordships to go into Committee on those Bills."

It certainly was most satisfactory to himself, as a matter of personal congratulation, that out of all the Bills which had been referred these two alone should have been selected by the Committee to be proceeded with. In May the right hon. Baronet was aware that the two Bills went into Committee of the House of Lords. On the 11th of May the report was brought up, and every one was aware that in that report the Tenants' Compensation Bill was unanimously abandoned. On the 18th May the Duke of Argyll made a speech, and explained the reasons for this proceeding; so, therefore, the right hon. Baronet must have been aware that his Bill relating to tenants' compensation would not go on; and yet Mr. Ferguson was brought over at the expense of the Government. The two Bills came on for third reading on the 26th May. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde), with persevering consistency, called attention to the fact that no one was responsible for the Bills. The Duke of Newcastle then made a statement, in reply to the noble Marquess—

"The Government had no disposition whatever to please any extreme party in Ireland by these Bills. So far as the Government had had a hand in these Bills no such object had existed. It had undoubtedly been sought to allay any irritation which might exist on the part of any of the people of Ireland, in consequence of injustice which they might feel had been inflicted upon them; but the object of the Bills had been simply to amend the law relating to landlord and tenant, as much for the benefit of the landlord as for that of the tenant, and to satisfy those moderate men who wished the interests of both to be consulted, and not any extreme party whatever, whether of landlords or tenants. The noble Marquess, and also the noble Earl who moved the first Amendment, had complained that these Bills had been introduced without any one being responsible for them. Now, though he (the Duke of Newcastle) had introduced these Bills in the exact form in which they were last Session received from the House of Commons, in order that they might be referred to a Select Committee to be moulded into a form for submission to the House, yet the Government—one of its Members having presided over that Committee, and having most carefully superintended the examination of these Bills and been a party to the amendments which were made—the Government was not prepared to throw upon that House or upon any other person the responsibility of these Bills. The Government accepted the responsibility of them exactly as if they had been framed under its direction, and had been introduced in the shape in which Government Bills were generally introduced. If the noble Marquess meant to deduce from his argument that the Government intended to shift upon the House the responsibility of accepting these Bills in whatever form they might come from the House of Commons, he could assure the noble Marquess that there was no such intention; but the Government was not prepared to offer to the House of Commons the insult of saying that they would reject any amendments which might be introduced into the Bills in that House. As regarded these Bills, as regarded others going from this House, the Government accepted the responsibility of them in the shape in which they were sent down to them by their Committee, and they would judge how far the principles involved in the Bills, as they now stood, were affected by any alterations which might be made in another place, and by their honest conviction as to the condition in which they came up they would be guided in the course which they should take." [3 Hansard, cxxxiii. 1006.]

Now, at that time the Tenants' Compensation Bill had been rejected by two Cabinet Ministers, by the unanimous Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords; and no one on the part of the Government had raised a voice against the other two Bills, which it was proposed should be proceeded with as Government Bills, and might therefore be regarded as a fair settlement of the question. The proceedings were fair and open; they were dealt with in the other House as Government Bills, and for his own part he shrank from no just responsibility, and he would ask the House to say if he had not acted with the most perfect fairness with respect to these Bills. He had no wish to refer to personal matters; he always avoided doing so if possible, as he desired only to have kindly feeling, whatever might be their political differences. But he was bound to refer to Tuesday last, and before doing so he would just state that he had previously received one letter from a Member of the Government inclosing a suggestion relative to the Landlord and Tenant Bill, and another letter from another Member with a suggestion as to the Leasing Powers Bill. These suggestions, he would say, he considered to be valuable. He repeated it was not his inclination to refer to personal matters, but he must do so on this occasion, and he then must fearlessly ask the House to say if he had been honourably treated in this matter. He would appeal to the noble Lord to say whether it was likely he would, day after day, have given his time to the question, or have attended every time he was requested by the Duke of Argyll and the Lords' Committee to give assistance, had he not thought the measures would be proceeded with bona fide, and had he not known that there existed a great anxiety in Ireland to have the question settled? It had been the fashion to keep the question open—a question affecting a large mass of property; and it was generally felt that any settlement was better than no settlement. But what was the present position of the question? After so many years of labour, it was never worse than now; and all this had been accomplished by the unexpected and unjustifiable statement made by the right hon. Baronet on Tuesday last. He (Mr. Napier) owned the subject was one of intense interest to him; he had given his assistance and his time to the Government freely and without stint, and he owned he thought that under such circumstances a high-minded Government would have rallied round him to support a beneficial measure—not a measure that was all that every one might wish—not such a measure as the right hon. Baronet might wish—nay, not even such a measure as he (Mr. Napier) would have wished; but a measure which had in view, and certainly was calculated to accomplish largely a beneficial purpose. He would say, in a Constitution like ours, it was impossible that the views of one should override the opinion of many, and though he might desire to go somewhat further than the House of Lords—yet, looking at the prevailing opinions on the landlord and tenant question—looking at the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice Campbell and other high authorities—looking at the difficulty of dealing with the question and the general opinion of moderate men that the two Bills presented a fair settlement of the question; considering that so much was already done towards that settlement, and that what was done had been mainly owing to the good sense and ability of the Duke of Argyll in consequence of the manner in which he had managed the proceedings of the Committee, he deplored the conclusion at which the Government had arrived. He much doubted whether any other man could have got so liberal a settlement of the question as had been obtained by the Duke of Argyll. The two Bills came from the House of Lords substantially as Government measures. The House of Lords had passed these two Bills, considering them to contain a fair settlement of the question. And what was the course taken in the House of Commons when the Bills came down? The right hon. Baronet, holding, as he did, a high official position, ought not—he would take the liberty to say—ought not to hand himself over to any particular section of Irish Members. These measures related to property in Ireland, whether connected with landlord or tenant; the question, therefore, was one which ought not to admit either of party or class legislation. The right hon. Baronet knew how he had been attacked by both parties in Ireland for the course he had taken with reference to this question; he had endured much abuse, and had been subjected to a great deal of misconception, for dealing with the question at all between landlord and tenant. But the right hon. Baronet now took a new position, and said it was unfair to press the two Bills, because they were not accompanied by the Compensation Bill. Why, how were the Bills proposed to the House? The second reading was moved, a debate was got up, and the Bills were proceeded with in the ordinary way. Was the right hon. Baronet, then, taken by surprise by what occurred here last Tuesday? These Bills were on the paper yesterday; and the right hon. Baronet asked whether he could have expected that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Serjeant Shee) would have allowed the Bills to proceed—he could not have expected that, for it would have been ruin to some Members had he done so. Why, so long ago as the 15th of June, he found on the paper a notice standing in the name of Mr. Serjeant Shee, to the effect, that, on the Motion for leaving the chair, he would move that these two Bills be postponed until the second reading of his own Tenants' Compensation Bill. He (Mr. Napier) came down yesterday and heard a long speech in which he was coarsely abused; he expected that, as he was accustomed to it, always consoling himself with Dean Swift's lines—

"On me when dunces are satiric,
I take it for a panegyric."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said he would not trust him (Mr. Napier) out of his sight, for he had not his confidence. He did not want the hon. and learned Gentleman's confidence. The hon. and learned Gentleman appeared, however, to have none to spare, except for the Government, who appeared to give their confidence to him in exchange. The hon. and learned Gentleman complained of the number of Amendments he had placed on the paper, and enumerated them. But these Amendments nearly all related to verbal matters. The number of Amendments occurred this way. They were noted in the Committee of the House of Lords, and he was told that the House of Lords would adopt them; and during the recess he was ready to put them in a legal form. But he could get no copies of the Bills at that time, as altered by the Committee in time for the House of Lords, and as he had only recently obtained copies he could not introduce the Amendments before. These Amendments were mostly verbal and grammatical; some proposed to substitute clauses more accurately framed; but, with the exception of one of the Amendments, there was not any which had anything to do with any question of disputed principle. When he proposed to have the Amendments printed he was opposed by the learned Gentleman, who would not consent to so reasonable a thing. He was obliged to sit down without obtaining his object, that object being merely to make the Bills at an early stage more accurate and complete. He would do the right hon. Baronet the justice to say it was not on that ground he had put his case. The right hon. Baronet had put it on this one point, that his Tenants' Compensation Bill ought to accompany the other two Bills, because, after what had taken place, the compensation clause of the first Bill, unless it were accompanied by the Tenants' Compensation Bill, would only create dissatisfaction. If that was the opinion of the right hon. Baronet and the Government, let the House just see in what position they were placed. The Select Committee of the Upper House, the Duke of Argyll presiding, and acting on the part of the Government, the House of Lords itself, and, indeed, almost all parties were agreed as to the value of the two Bills, and were of opinion that the Tenants' Compensation Bill should not pass. And yet Government now said that the two Bills could not proceed, however valuable they might be, unless the Compensation Bill accompanied them. He did not object to Government having their opinion on the subject, but then he would ask, was it fair, reasonable, or just to the country, or to himself, after bringing the Bills up to the point at which they stood—Bills pressed forward substantially as Government measures—after throwing the responsibility on others, and after he had been invited by Government to give his unremitting attention to that subject—after he had given his time and attention to the Bills, believing them to be bonâ fide beneficial measures, was it fair to him to say, if the Tenants' Compensation Bill could not be passed, the whole question should be thrown overboard, and the decision of the House of Lords pronounced to be wrong? Was it fair, he would ask, for the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny to taunt him with bringing in a Bill from political objects rather than to settle a great question? He would ask the House whether from the first time he had spoken on the question, he had ever shown a disposition to act with party or political feelings? It was at the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet, before he took office himself, that he had given his attention to this question. When the right hon. Baronet sat on the opposition side of the House in February, 1852, at a time when there was a severe attack on the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) the right hon. Baronet, as well as the Secretary of the Admiralty, asked him to take up the question. His opinion was then well known—it was embodied in that publication for which he was substantially responsible. He did take the question up from that time, and having taken it up as an independent Member, and followed it up with all the weight he could bring to bear as a law officer of the late Government—after having throughout followed one consistent course in reference to the question—he thought that at least he was not open to any of the imputations that had been thrown out against his course of proceeding. With respect to the Bills before the House, the right hon. Baronet admitted their value—they had the approbation both of the Government and the House of Lords, and the Tenants' Compensation Bill was the right hon. Baronet's Bill. The right hon. Baronet would recollect that when he introduced his Bills, two of them were more or less connected with the subject of tenants' compensation. One of these Bills he admitted was more comprehensive in one respect than the measure of the right hon. Baronet. But the Select Committee were of opinion that his measure was too complex. He believed there was no section of that House who refused to concede the abstract principle, that if a tenant made an improvement on his farm he ought to be compensated; the only difficulty was as to the mode of carrying the principle out. The Committee of 1853 examined a good deal of evidence, and here was the Resolution they came to—

“That the attention of the Legislature be directed to an early consideration of the laws which regulate the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland, with a view to their consolidation and amendment; and especially to consider the practicability of such legislation as might provide adequate security to tenants for permanent improvements, and otherwise place the relation on a more satisfactory basis.”

Well, then, he did accordingly attempt to consolidate and amend the law on these subjects. The two Bills were to be considered as consolidating and amending Bills. With regard to tenants' compensation, he did the best he could to adjust it; but the Committee thought the machinery too complex, and they set it aside. The right hon. Baronet then brought in his Bill, and that Bill he supported, and as far as he was individually concerned he did not think it would be injurious to property; but he found that great dislike existed towards it in Ireland, and that scarcely any was inclined to accept it. Many said it was contrary to all principle, and as it did not include compensation for improvements in the soil, others said it was worth nothing. The right hon. Baronet brought forward his Bill in the belief that it would be of use, but it had been ultimately rejected in the House of Lords. The question, then, was—the two Bills being considered a fair settlement of the question—Government having endorsed and adopted them in two Sessions—the Bills having passed through Committees of their own nomination in both Houses—he having given his co-operation, because invited to do so by Government—and having not the slightest reason to expect but that the two Bills would be passed, the question was, whether under all these circumstances the Government were justified in having at the last moment thrown these Bills overboard for the reason given by the right hon. Baronet? And he fearlessly put it to the Committee and country to decide, whether his conduct had not been consistent, and whether they who had thrown up the whole question at this moment, after so much had been done, were the parties deserving of praise or censure? He believed honestly that it was only holding out a delusion to the farmer tenants to encourage them now to look forward to the passing of this rejected Bill. Had he foreseen what was to be the result of the matter, he certainly would have taken no part in the question. The course adopted by Government would only invite further agitation hereafter, and keep the minds of the tenantry of Ireland in an unquiet state of expectation; that was not just to them, nor honourable and candid to him. It was always his wish and desire, whatever might be the difference of political opinion, to be on terms of good feeling with all parties, but under the present circumstances he thought he had a right to complain of the manner in which he had been treated, and the unjustifiable course pursued towards him by the Government.

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, it appeared to him that the right hon. and learned Gentleman made his complaint upon two grounds. The first was, that he had not been treated fairly—that he had not been honourably treated by him; and the second, that the postponement of these questions was not, under the circumstances, wise and judicious, and was likely to lead to evil. Now, with respect to this last point, it was clearly a matter of opinion to be decided on by every one according to the facts to be brought before them; but with respect to the right hon. Gentleman's first ground of complaint—that he had not been treated fairly by him—all he could say was, that if the right hon. Gentleman thought he had not been fairly treated, he very much regretted it. But he would recall to the right hon. Gentleman's recollection the circumstances under which he had spoken on Tuesday last. He had pressed the noble Lord the leader of the House to give the right hon. Gentleman a day for proceeding with his Bills, and finally Tuesday last was fixed. He (Sir J. Young) then came down, having heard that considerable opposition would be offered to the Bills. He had, in fact, a fortnight ago stated to the right hon. Gentleman his fear that they would be met with strong opposition. At that time, however, he certainly had had no idea of the strength of this opposition; he had thought that the opposition would have soon died away, but on Tuesday, as would be recollected,

Mr. Napier

Mr. Bouverie had scarcely taken the chair in Committee before the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Serjeant Shee) rose to propose that he should report progress; and the hon. and learned Gentleman was followed by a number of other Members on that side of the House, who were generally supporters of the Government, and who repeated in public the statements they had made in private—that they one and all opposed further proceeding with these Bills during the present Session, and stating their wish that they should be postponed in order to allow of its due consideration by all parties in Ireland. That wish was also expressed with equal emphasis by more than one deputation which came from Ireland, and it did not seem very unreasonable. Last year these Bills were brought forward, and met with strong opposition in the House of Lords, and were postponed in that House; this year, parties who were supposed to represent the tenant interest one and all prayed for the postponement of the measures, in order that they might have time to consider them, and see whether they would or not accept the propositions that were made by those who might be considered representatives of the landlords. There were two perfectly distinct phases of opinion under the guise of tenant-right agitation in Ireland—one to a certain degree fair and reasonable; the other wild, visionary, and unpracticable. There was one set of political agitators who aimed at no agricultural improvement, whose only object was merely to keep alive the cry at elections, and to place the tenants in a position of independence of their landlords, so that they might be enabled to vote against them. Another class based its views upon a real desire for agricultural improvement, and in that view insisted on the right to compensation for improvements actually made by the tenant, as in Ulster. It appeared to him impossible for human ingenuity to devise a scheme that would unite the allegiance of two parties with views and ends so different; but every one with whom he came in contact, as representing either the one or the other party, had begged for the postponement of the legislative measures, in order that the propositions of the House of Lords might be duly considered. The question was, how far he was precluded from entertaining this request. The right hon. Gentleman said they were the Bills of the Government. Either they were so, or they were not. Supposing they were, was not Government at liberty to deal with them? If they were, then he dealt with them as the Bills of the Government, and it was their judgment that, with a view to the final settlement of the question, a postponement should take place, and that time should be given to those representing the tenant interest to consider fully their own position, and the state of opinion both in Parliament and in the country, in order to see whether they could agree upon reasonable terms. Supposing the Bills were not Government Bills, what was there unfair or dishonourable in his tendering his advice to the person who had charge of them not to press them on at present? He did not act with a view of exciting agitation, or of keeping open a difficult question; but, on the contrary, he believed that the time given by the recess for consideration would facilitate the settlement of the question. He did not believe that the tenant class in Ireland were so easily misled as to be induced to suppose that this question could be carried against the public opinion of England, against the unanimous voice of the House of Lords, and when in that House it had been found difficult to get a small majority to carry the moderate proposition of last year. He was convinced that the postponement of these Bills, so far from keeping the question open, would turn to good account, and would lead to its being satisfactorily adjusted. He was ready fully to admit that the right hon. Gentleman had all along bestowed the greatest pains upon this subject, and that he had acted towards him (Sir J. Young) with the greatest courtesy; but the view which the right hon. Gentleman took was, that he was to act for both parties. Surely it was not acting for both parties when there were men interested on both sides who broadly declared that they would not accept this settlement of the question as at present advised, and asked for time till next Session to consider the subject fully? That was a fair proposition, and one that he was bound to accept. He did not know that he could say anything more in defence of the course which he had pursued, except to repeat that either these were Government Bills, or they were not. If they were Government Bills, he had surely a right to deal with them, and he thought that, under the circumstances, the wiser course would be to postpone them;—and if they were not Government Bills, surely he had a right to advise their postponement. With regard to the Bills themselves, what were they? The Leasing Powers Bill was an enabling Bill, giving to landlords the power of making leases which should be binding on their successors, and the other, the Landlord and Tenant Bill, was a consolidation of the existing laws, and, as he had been informed, a very good consolidation, but neither one nor the other contained any element for the final settlement of the landlord and tenant question. Representations had been made to him by persons who represented, he believed, the tractable and industrious tenantry of Ulster, that the retrospective clause in the Landlord and Tenant Bill would leave the tenantry of Ulster in a worse position than if no such clause existed. The complaint made by those persons was, that owing to the custom of the country, upon the faith of which the tenantry had laid out large sums of money, the tenant was supposed to have some claim to a renewal of his lease, and they wanted validity to be given to that custom. That custom went beyond the retrospective clause of the Bill, for the Bill said that a tenant should have an interest in improvements which he might make, but that that interest should cease after the lapse of twenty-one years. Now, in Ulster, it had never been the habit to lay out money when the tenure was so short as twenty-one years, so that this clause would not be of as much advantage to the tenantry as the custom at present in existence. He questioned if any Gentleman in that House would take a farm and lay out 200*l.* in improvements if he lost all interest in them in twenty-one years. That was what the clause proposed, and the tenantry of Ulster said that they would be placed by it in a worse position than they were at present, for, although their custom was not imperative, it was so sanctioned that, in reality, they received more than this Bill would give them. When such persons came to him and made these representations, and when deputations came to him, as he understood, from the respectable tenantry in different parts of Ireland, surely it was not unreasonable in him on that ground alone to have urged the House not to pass these Bills during the present Session? On the other hand, on Tuesday four hours were occupied in advancing a single clause of the Bill, so that, supposing these Bills, which had gone through a Select Committee of that House, which had been for about two months before a Select Committee of the House of Lords, to have been debated clause by clause in that House, he would like to know to what date the Session would have been protracted to pass them? There was one other position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman which was, that he (Sir John Young) should be allowed the conduct of these Bills with the proviso that he was not to make any alteration in them. If he had the responsibility of these Bills—and he was quite willing to take it—although he did not wish to detract from the merit due to the right hon. Gentleman for his attention to this subject, still he was bound to state his conviction that the best course to be pursued was to postpone these Bills to next Session, and then to take them for what they were worth. If anything were to be superadded to them to meet the demands of the tenants, that would be a separate and distinct question, which might be dealt with in time to come; and he did not believe that any difficulty would be added to the final settlement of the question by having given to the tenantry time fully to consider the subject. He thought if any man had been aggrieved in this matter, he (Sir John Young) was the party, and not the right hon. Gentleman. On Tuesday last the noble Lord the Member for Coleraine (Lord Naas) got up and asked what course the Government proposed to take with regard to these Bills. He (Sir John Young) was “discourteous” enough not to make any answer. Shortly afterwards the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) rose and urged the Government, in no very polite terms, to state what they intended to do. He (Sir John Young) still remained silent. Hon. Gentlemen opposite then put up another hon. Member to ask the same question. Then it was, being so pressed, that he stated that he thought it would be better, under the circumstances, not to proceed with the Bills during the present Session. Therefore, instead of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Napier) being the aggrieved party, he (Sir John Young) thought that he himself was the party aggrieved. He believed if the question had been left to the right hon. Gentleman himself no more would have been heard about it, but a noble Lord in another place on the same evening referred to the subject. He had reason for that supposition, because on the 26th clause of one of these Bills he had proposed an important Amendment, which the right hon. Gentleman at first would not hear of, but which, after a few days’ reflection, he had adopted and embodied in the Bill. That showed what was the result of reflection with the right hon. Gentleman, and he was persuaded that in this case reflection would have produced the same effect. He should be sorry for anything to occur to interfere with the courtesy and good feeling which had always existed between the right hon. Gentleman and himself; but he thought that it would have been well if the right hon. Gentleman had taken more time for consideration before making this attack upon him. He (Sir John Young) repeated that he was the aggrieved party; he had treated the right hon. Gentleman throughout with uniform courtesy and with perfect fairness, and the only return he had had from him was, several very cavilling observations and perfectly groundless accusations.

Sir J. Young

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that in the ordinary course of proceeding, the Landlord and Tenant and the Leasing Powers Bills would not have come under discussion at this time; but when he heard that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had a personal complaint to make against the Government, having great respect for the right hon. Gentleman, and not wishing the Government to remain under that imputation without an opportunity of explanation, he had consented that the charge should be made and the explanation given at the commencement of the sitting that evening:—and he had done so at some sacrifice, because there was a Bill which stood next, of which he had charge, and which it was important to proceed with. He would now submit, therefore, to the Committee that, the right hon. Gentleman having made his charge as fully as he wished to make it, and his right hon. Friend having made his explanation, this matter should not be pressed further. [“Hear, hear!”] If any hon. Gentleman said it was his wish that the debate should go on, certainly he (Lord J. Russell) had no power to prevent it; but in that event it would assuredly prevent him showing any similar courtesy again. What he should now propose would be, that he should move to report progress. The Bills would then remain in the possession of the House; the right hon. Gentleman might afterwards, before the close of the Session, if he thought fit, move that they be brought forward in Committee; but in that case his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Young) would move that the Chairman report progress, with the view of proceeding no further with them in the present Session. He believed that the whole of this misunderstanding had arisen from a misinterpretation of a few words which had fallen from his right hon. Friend on a recent occasion. The right hon. Gentleman said that his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Young) had stated that he would not propose these Bills, and the right hon. Gentleman founded a good deal of argument upon that remark. Such a statement would certainly be inconsistent with the course which the Government had taken in either House of Parliament, and inconsistent with what his right hon. Friend had said and done in that House. But what his right hon. Friend said on the occasion in question was, that he thought it right not to press these Bills during the present Session. Now, between the words "propose" and "press" there was great difference. He (Lord John Russell) was not present on the occasion, but he understood that "press" was the word which his right hon. Friend used, or meant to use. Be that as it might, however, looking at the progress they were likely to make with these Bills before the close of the Session, and considering that so many hon. Gentlemen objected to them, he (Lord John Russell) thought it would be inexpedient to proceed further with them for the present.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the noble Lord would agree with him that they who represented the opinions of Ulster in that House would be condemned in the eyes of their constituents if they had not elicited from the Government what their intentions were in reference to that the most important question that affected their country at this moment. The complaint that he had to make against the Government was of a breach of faith. That accusation at least had the merit of being short and distinct. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Young) had complained that he was the aggrieved party, if any, in that it was not until he had been pressed by several hon. Members on Tuesday last that he disclosed the intentions of the Government as to the measures in question. It was perfectly true, as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, that he was greatly indisposed to respond to the questions then put to him; but he (Mr. Whiteside) had not been five minutes in the House on Tuesday before he was told by an hon. Member that he would find, from the tone of the speech made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Serjeant Shee), that these Bills would be abandoned by the Government. He was told that by an experienced Member of that House, who well understood the by-play of the Government. It was of that that he (Mr. Whiteside) had now to complain. Nothing could be more courteous and kind than the conduct of the Government in the other House of Parliament in regard to this question. The other House of Parliament, through the intervention of the Ministers there, threw out one of the three Bills—a circumstance which the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Young) pretended was the reason why they should not proceed with the two remaining good Bills which he (Mr. Whiteside) for his country should pass into a law. What was the language used on Tuesday by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Serjeant Shee)? "Here is a code," said he, "to which the Government are pledged, one Bill a very good Bill, another a very good Bill, and a third my own Bill, much better than either. I cannot accept these two good Bills, which are calculated to tranquillise the country." He, and those acting with him in this matter, did not represent the counties of Tipperary, Kilkenny, or Clare, where there were very few improving tenants, but they sat in that House representing the industrious population of a province in which tenant right was a matter of the last importance. He said that these Bills had been sacrificed by the right hon. Gentleman to gain a certain support in that House, and that he and those with whom he acted were astonished at the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman, and quite as much pained as surprised. Now, whatever might be said of the legal reforms of the Lord Chancellor, he never heard any one doubt his Lordship's veracity. What did the Lord Chancellor say when this subject was under discussion in the other House? He said—

"The true mode of legislating on this subject, as well as the most safe and efficacious, was to give the greatest facilities for contracts, and the greatest facilities for enforcing them. When that was done by Parliament, Parliament had done nearly all which legislation could effect."

Then, with reference to the third Bill, he said—

"The question of retrospective compensation stood on a very different footing, and he confessed he looked on that portion of the measure with some trepidation."—[3 Hansard, cxxxi. 50.] On the first night these Bills were introduced into the other House these were the opinions expressed by the Lord Chan.

cellor; and, after that, did any one doubt that the third Bill could never be passed into a law? And what did the Duke of Newcastle, who introduced the Bills, say? The noble Duke was a War Minister now, but at that time he was a Minister of peace. He said—

"They would refer these three Bills to a Select Committee, in order that men representing all parties in Ireland might combine, and, if possible, come to some conclusion, aye or no, on the question of compensation to tenants. He could not but believe, with respect to two of the Bills, that, under the superintendence of noble Lords in Committee, they would be made sufficient for all purposes and most invaluable to Ireland."—[3 Hansard, cxxi. 28].

Yes, those Bills were most invaluable to Ireland. Did the noble Duke know what one of those Bills did? Why, it enabled any person or corporation under disability, to make leases precisely, as the Lord Chancellor said, in the direction in which Parliament might safely walk. And it was not merely an enabling Bill, but it was a remedial one also, for it provided means for the future of obtaining compensation for all rational improvements. It carried out what was reasonable and right, and what was approved by the Ministers of the Crown. If the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Young) was opposed to retrospective compensation, why could he not have had the manliness to say so at once? The right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to place the House in a dilemma by saying that these Bills were either Government Bills or not; but he (Mr. Whiteside) did not think that a Minister of the Crown, or a Gentleman holding the position of the right hon. Baronet, could safely speak as he did on Tuesday, and then use that language. The right hon. Gentleman in his (Mr. Whiteside's) hearing said distinctly that these were not Government Bills; and he said because they were not Government Bills he could justify the conduct he had pursued towards them. When, however, they turned to the language used by Ministers in the other House, they found they were treated as Government Bills. He (Mr. Whiteside) would tell the right hon. Gentleman why he was called on to justify the conduct pursued by him on this occasion. It was because Her Majesty's Ministers, consisting individually of many talented men, were, as a Coalition Ministry, without consistency, without principle, and without a policy. After what had taken place, the right hon. Gentleman and the other Members of the Government might rest assured that ere the next winter was past the Tenant League agitation would be again renewed in Ireland, and that men, having no interest in the soil of the country, would recommence their criminal tactics of agitation, and, in order to gratify a criminal ambition, disturb the peace of the country in the vague endeavour to obtain some visionary advantage for others and themselves. It was true the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Serjeant Shee) made a long speech on Tuesday; but had he not a right to make a long speech? It was equally true that he praised the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Young); but the moment he (Mr. Whiteside) heard the panegyric, he saw the fate of these Bills. What was the result? The hon. and learned Gentleman might retire from that House satisfied that, because he had aided the right hon. Gentleman in defeating two useful Bills, it was in the power of that indefatigable party with whom he was identified, not only to defeat Bills of a certain kind, but to defeat every Bill, and to become the rulers of the British Senate. He (Mr. Whiteside) believed these to be good Bills—he believed them also to be Bills calculated to give great satisfaction to the country; but because they were likely to give satisfaction to Ireland, the hon. and learned Gentleman would not allow them to proceed, lest some cause of agitation should not remain among his unfortunate countrymen, by means of which men, when they ceased to be agitators, might sink down into contented placemen.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that he was not aware that there sat on that side of the House any Members of the Tenant League, though there were on the other side several Members connected with the League, with whom the hon. and learned Gentleman frequently had the satisfaction of voting in the same lobby. The hon. and learned Gentleman had accused the Government of a breach of faith and an abandonment of principle—language that could only be justified by the most extreme necessity. The observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman led to the inference that the Government had abandoned these Bills, not because they were bad Bills, or because they were not calculated to benefit the country, but in order to catch votes, and to gratify a particular party in that House. But what took place on Tuesday night? Not alone the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny, but the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon), whom no one would accuse of being a supporter of the Government, and several Members on that (the Ministerial) side, pressed upon the right hon. Gentleman the inexpediency of proceeding further with these Bills during the present Session. When the Bills were introduced into that House, they were, along with a Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny, referred by the Government to a Select Committee. He might remind the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside), that two days afterwards, the Earl of Derby, then at the head of the Government in the other House of Parliament, in reply to a question put to him, denounced one of these Bills that had been sent to the Select Committee as communistic and as intended to confiscate property. He (Mr. FitzGerald) had always been an advocate of the tenant interest, but he unhesitatingly stated that those Bills which came from the Lords, though they contained much that was unobjectionable, would not have been satisfactory, and that the passing of the two Bills alone, now before the House, would have been the very means of producing agitation. He lamented that a whole evening was likely to be taken up in discussing a mere personal grievance of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier). The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) had said that the passing of the Bill would have ruined certain gentlemen, and destroyed their political capital; but, so far from anything of the kind taking place, he (Mr. FitzGerald) believed it would have increased agitation. They had all considered this question together, and there appeared to be concurrence of opinion on it in all parts of the House, amongst those who represented Liberal constituencies in Ireland. They made an appeal to the right hon. the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the Bills should not be pressed forward in their present shape until the Compensation Bill; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Napier) now complained that a personal grievance had been inflicted upon him because at their united request that course was adopted. He (Mr. FitzGerald) recollected that when the right hon. Gentleman introduced these Bills, he said that the measure that was called his Compensation Bill honestly carried out the intentions of the Devon Commission. The right hon. Gentleman was ready to use the word honesty on all occasions, and no person doubted him; but he (Mr. FitzGerald) would wish that the word was less frequently used. The Bill carrying out the recommendations of the Devon Commission was abandoned, and now they were told by the right hon. Gentleman that the other measures would be satisfactory to the tenants. The other measures, without the Compensation Bill, would not be satisfactory, and for that reason, and that reason only, they had pressed upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to withdraw those Bills. At twenty minutes to four o'clock on Tuesday he consented to withdraw them, and that was really the only cause of complaint which the right hon. Gentleman had against the representative of the Irish Government in that House.

Mr. LUCAS said, he certainly did not expect or wish to take any part in the very pretty quarrel that had arisen between the right hon. Gentleman on the one bench and the right hon. Gentleman on the other. He had nothing to do with their refinements or quarrels, provided they confined them to themselves, but they had both gone out of their way to attack others who were not mixed up with the dispute. The right hon. Gentleman who made the first statement, and the hon. and learned Gentleman near him, and the right hon. Baronet, all spoke of a party connected with the discussion of this question in Ireland as making use of the grievances of the tenants for the purpose of keeping up political agitation, without having the smallest notion of procuring a redress of the grievances of the tenants. The right hon. Gentleman on that side of the House went beyond the language of the right hon. Baronet opposite, and said they were obstructing the course of legislation on the subject, and that some proceedings should be taken to put down the course they had pursued. He (Mr. Lucas) was astonished to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin use that language. The right hon. Gentleman had forgotten what had taken place, or he never could have uttered the words that fell from his lips. They had had only one discussion on the subject in that House during the present Session. Last Session the subject underwent long and mature consideration, and at the close of the Session he (Mr. Lucas) received in the lobby the thanks of the right hon. Gentleman for the facilities which he (Mr. Lucas) had afforded for the settlement of this business. He (Mr. Lucas) had also received the same thanks from the right hon. Gentleman publicly in his place, and had received likewise the thanks of the present Solicitor General for Ireland in the other "lobby." Where, then, was the obstruction on his part? He had not opened his mouth during the present Session on the subject, and they had had but one discussion upon it, which accidentally took place on the Motion to report progress, after having gone into Committee. But because the right hon. Gentleman, and the hon. and learned Gentleman near him, could not get their views adopted, they had the astonishing presumption to charge a large body of men in that House with being obstructionists, and said they ought to be put down by the power of the Government and of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) had made also the offensive imputation, that if the measure was passed, their political capital would be gone, and they would be ruined. But he (Mr. Lucas) would tell him that, so long as he (Mr. Whiteside) remained in that House, with his bigotry and fanaticism, and with the unjust spirit that animated all his proceedings when the religion of millions of his fellow-subjects were concerned—if they had not political capital in themselves—they could never be in want of that which the hon. and learned Gentleman's bigotry and fanaticism would supply. Thanks to the hon. and learned Gentleman's genius for statesmanship, they were not in want of employment, because he and his friends had provided it for them during the present Session. It was not on the land question they were obliged to occupy the attention of the House, but in resisting that most unjust aggression which the hon. and learned Gentleman and his friends had made upon their religion, and which, in spite of his threats, they should always resist with the same firmness and determination as they had displayed in the present Session. He (Mr. Lucas) might have mistaken the right hon. Baronet's meaning when he spoke of those who were making use of this question not to procure redress for a great grievance, but to keep up political agitation. The right hon. Baronet apparently alluded to Members in that House. He (Mr. Lucas) had received, as he already said, the thanks of the Solicitor General for Ireland for his efforts during the last Session to promote the settlement of the question; and when the hon. and learned Member for Eunis (Mr. J. D.

Mr. Lucas

FitzGerald) said there was no Gentleman sitting at his side of the House to whom the taunts that were thrown out could apply—when the hon. and learned Member said there was no Member of the Tenant League sitting on the Treasury side of the House—and that consequently all the imputations that came from both sides of the table were to be lavishly distributed amongst the Members acting with him. (Mr. Lucas), he (Mr. Lucas) begged to tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that there was one Member from Ireland sitting, not on his (Mr. Lucas's) side of the House, but sitting on the Treasury side above the gangway, in receipt of a State salary as a Member of the Government, and one of the law advisers of the Crown, who was for a long time a member of the council of the League—whose name was on the back of Sharman Crawford's Bill—who publicly professed in repeated speeches throughout the course of a year or eighteen months that he would never accept office, "So help him God," in any Government that would not make that Bill a Cabinet question, and who, having made his political capital out of that agitation, had recanted his professions, had swallowed his oaths, and who ought to have been present on that occasion, when a question of this kind was discussed and imputations of this kind were thrown out from the Treasury benches. That hon. and learned Gentleman now sat on the Treasury benches, and duly earned, and continued to earn, the wages of his extraordinary apostasy. Sitting as that hon. and learned Gentleman ordinarily did, in terms of familiar intercourse with the right hon. Baronet, and being his great helper on that and other questions, it would have been more decorous, and he (Mr. Lucas) would say more decent, had the right hon. Baronet refrained from throwing out those imputations which, at all events, could be proved to be true of no one but his own Colleague. So far as the people of Ireland were concerned, of whatever shade of opinion or class they might be, they would know that the Bills were abandoned, and that legislation on the subject for this Session was at an end. They were not interested in the past except so far as it gave them a light to know the future. They were all, of whatever opinion or class they might be, deeply interested in the future. He had listened with painful attention in the hope of learning from the Government what were their intentions for the future. He had not yet learned their intentions. They had a right to ask, at the end of two Sessions during which this question was carefully considered and discussed, what were the intentions of the Government for the future? Did they mean to take up this question next Session with the intention of making a final settlement of it? Did they intend to bring in merely the two Bills of the right hon. and learned Gentleman without the Tenants' Compensation Bill, the principles of which were sanctioned and affirmed by the House? He thought the last two hours and a half would have been very ill spent if no additional matter was introduced into the debate, and if they did not receive from the Government a statement that would assure the people of Ireland of what they might expect at the hands of the advisers of the Crown.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I do not mean to enter into the personal question, or to attempt to correct the misapprehension of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, or to explain the words which have been imputed to my right hon. Friend near me; but the questions which the hon. Gentleman asks as to the intentions of the Government with regard to this important subject, though it does not require any detailed answer, yet certainly I think deserves some notice. It has always appeared to me that this question was one of the utmost difficulty in the way of settlement; and I cannot but recur at present to the course I was obliged to take myself respecting it on a former occasion, and which I am sorry to find comes to be very nearly repeated three years after. My right hon. Friend (Sir William Somerville), when Chief Secretary for Ireland, was very sanguine with respect to the settlement of the landlord and tenant question in Ireland, and he introduced a Bill which was referred to a Select Committee. The Select Committee paid very great attention to the Bill, went through all the clauses of it, and amended it. When that Bill came out of the Select Committee my right hon. Friend was in hopes that he might be instrumental in settling a question which was not only a cause of great heartburning, but stood in the way of material improvement. But large deputations came over from Ireland—I saw some of them myself—and they stated that the remedies proposed were of so conflicting a nature that it would be useless for them as tenants to endeavour to take advantage of them, and they requested that the Bill might be abandoned. Upon examining the Bill I could not but see that there was great justice in their representations, and their observations led me certainly to take a very desponding view with regard to the settlement of this question by mere legislation; because I think in attempting to settle it by legislation you are between these two dangers: if you attempt to make your remedy exceedingly simple, you depart from the course of justice—you either impose upon the landlord or upon the tenant burdens which you have no right to charge upon him—you interfere with respect to contracts in a manner in which legislation ought not to interfere—you deprive a man who has property in land of the right of exercising the rights of property, or else you give to the tenant a very insufficient and delusory remedy. On the other hand, you may, as was stated by those deputations from tenants, make the process so difficult and so dilatory that they would not take any advantage from it. So that certainly I came to the conclusion, which I stated in this House, and which was the subject of so much attack, that it was useless to go on and endeavour to fix by legislation the precise mode of contract, which was only likely to be beneficial if it were carried into effect by good faith, confidence, and liberality on the side of both landlord and tenant. If you go on the presumption that the landlord will use all his powers as a landlord and all which the law gives him to oppress his tenant, and that, on the other hand, the tenant would endeavour as much as possible to cheat the landlord out of his rights of property—if you go on that supposition, you can never arrive at a satisfactory settlement of this question. These were my opinions; others, however, were more confident, and my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Young), who sits near me, was exceedingly confident as to the possibility of making a settlement of this kind; but, above all, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier), who has made his complaint to-night, was very sanguine about it, and gave himself very great pains and trouble concerning it. I have nothing to say but what I have always said, that he deserves the highest praise for the attention he has bestowed upon this very difficult question. When the right hon. Gentleman brought forward his measure, and when I heard his explanation of it, I confess—instead of thinking that he did not go far enough—that I heard some of his proposals with some of the trepidation which it appears my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor has expressed. I thought he was going rather too near to those social principles which are somewhat dangerous when introduced into Acts of Parliament. The measure, which was intended to do justice to all parties, was sent before a Select Committee, and that Select Committee adopted the proposals and stipulations with regard to the relations of landlord and tenant. The Bill then went to the House of Lords, where that part of it which was intended for the benefit of the tenant, and to give to the tenant certain rights that were not usually given to him by the law in this country, was strongly objected to by the landed proprietors in the House of Lords, and also by the great law Lords, the lights of that House, who seemed very unwilling to assent to that part of the Bill. They have this year passed a Bill which contains some provisions favourable to the tenants of Ireland, but which does not go to near the extent which the persons holding the opinions I have referred to wish to carry the law. I therefore think it is not unnatural that, when the Bill came down from the House of Lords and was found to be deprived of that portion of it which the noble Duke the Lord Privy Seal told me was calculated to excite discontent and dissatisfaction among those who had hitherto been favourably disposed to pass a legislative measure on the subject, though they could not concur in the extreme position which had been propounded in Ireland upon it, it should have created dissatisfaction among those who hold those extreme views; and here I beg leave to disclaim altogether those imputations which have been thrown upon those hon. Members who have been most extreme in their views upon this subject in opposition to myself. They are men who have evinced the most constant perseverance in urging the claims of the tenantry of Ireland. The most persevering and energetic of them all is a man whose integrity is not to be disputed by any man—I mean Mr. Sharman Crawford—who has come to London for some purpose, and who has expressed his great despondency about the Bill passing this year, but whose anxiety on the subject, and whose views also, I think, no human being can doubt for a moment. No doubt in every party, whatever their opinions, political or religious, may be, there are some who look only to their own selfish advantage—I dare say the Tenant League party have men of that kind among them—but as a party, as far as I have known them, I am willing to give them the same credit that I would give to any other party who feel persuaded that their views are consistent with justice, and that the adoption of them would be for the benefit of Ireland. But what is more natural, when a Bill comes down from the other House containing what is supposed to be a settlement of a much-disputed question, but which does not contain any of those provisions which certain parties think essential, that they should protest against it and should say, “If this is passed we shall be told that nothing more can be done by Parliament; we shall therefore make every opposition to this measure?” Though I do not agree in their views, still I think nothing is more natural or more consistent than that conduct. If we had plenty of time and not any other business before us, I think it very possible that one of these Bills might have been amended, and that the clauses might have been so altered as to admit of the Bill being sent up to the other House of Parliament, and of their agreeing to a measure which would have given satisfaction generally to the tenantry of the North of Ireland. The House of Lords might have embraced that proposition or have rejected it; but it is obvious that at the present period of the Session it would be impracticable to go through the immense number of Amendments which have been suggested. With those Amendments and the new clauses which would be proposed, it is obvious that, with the business still remaining to be done, the House would have to sit for two or three months longer in order to get at the end of such a question. I therefore come to the conclusion—unwillingly, I confess, for I should have been disposed to agree with my noble Friend in the other House of Parliament, that it would have been desirable to pass this Bill if the time had permitted—but I come to the conclusion that it is hopeless to attempt during the present Session to effect a settlement of this important question. Whether my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland is right in supposing that during six or eight months’ further deliberation the whole substance of these several Bills may be contained in one Bill, or may still be presented in separate Bills, it is impossible for me to say. If there is a disposition shown on the part of those who take an active interest in this question to the production of one legislative measure on the subject, I quite agree that whether the Bill which is called the Tenants' Compensation Bill be contained in the Landlord and Tenants' Bill, or be in a separate Bill, is a matter of immaterial importance. But I own, if we find that the question is still a subject of so much passion that no disposition exists to agree to a Bill to the extent of that which we have now before us—namely, the Bill which is called “the Landlord and Tenant Bill”—then it would be almost useless to attempt to enter upon a consideration of the subject. There is one thing which the Lord Chancellor is reported to have said, and which was quoted by the hon. and learned Gentleman—namely, that the best thing to be done upon this subject was beyond all question that which I think no one will dispute, and that which my noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) has always contended for—that you should endeavour to make your law as perfect as possible with regard to voluntary contracts; that the tenant on entering upon the land should have the means of knowing perfectly what he has covenanted to do, and what his rights are. When that contract is made, there should be a simple mode without delay or expense—which in itself is perfectly practicable, and is in fact contained in this Leasing Powers Bill—by which the tenant may enforce his rights. I must own that the Leasing Powers Bill appears to me to be a most excellent Bill, and one which I hope will enter into our legislation hereafter. The hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) has made use of some very hard words against the Government on this subject. I do not wish to refer to the history of the conduct of the Government to which he belonged with respect to this question, nor will I refer to the speculations that were made here with respect to the second reading of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Serjeant Shee), which was always opposed by us. I will not use any hard words; I think it much better not to enter into any rejoinder upon this subject, the difficulty of which is sufficient of itself to engage our attention, but it is enough to show that one party is as vulnerable as another on the subject. The subject being in itself a difficult one, there was some consolation to be derived from the statement made by the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny on Tuesday last, when he proposed the postponement of the Bills. I understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman stated, as one reason why it would not be necessary to settle this question at the present time, that there was a better state both of material prosperity and of feeling in Ireland, and that he did not think any angry contest could be created by postponing this question. Such a statement, when coming from one who has been always arguing for the immediate settlement of the question, is very satisfactory. I have seen a gentleman to-day, an old friend of mine, and a man who has much property in Ireland, and he entirely confirms the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He told me that he has never known a time when the landlords and tenants of Ireland were on better terms together, and that the state of Ireland was very greatly improved. I may add to this statement, that I have within a few days received a private letter from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in which he expresses his satisfaction, both at the state of peace and tranquillity which prevails in that country, and the general good feeling that exists among all classes. I therefore hope that there may come a time when these Bills may be considered with greater dispassionateness and deliberation than they have hitherto been. It is not altogether a work of legislation. Much depends on the conciliatory disposition of the parties between whom the contest at present prevails. I do hope that the extreme views of both parties will be modified. I hope the views of those who ask that the rights of tenants shall be carried beyond what is reasonable, and of those who are for the maintenance of the rights of property and of landlords in such a way as works inconvenience and hardship to tenants, may be modified, so that at last we may arrive, if not at a perfect mode of legislation, yet at least at an attempt at some very useful and happy enactment upon this difficult, long-pending, and important subject.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, that if the Government were sincere in their desire to settle this question, they had adopted a very curious and unsatisfactory mode of accomplishing that object. If they had been sincere, they would not have adopted the Landlord and Tenant Bill, which only made the law more stringent, and adopted it as a Government measure, only with the view of abandoning it. He believed that the declaration just made by the noble Lord would be a death-blow to the hopes of the tenantry of Ireland, who would remain in this country if there was hope of a fair settlement of this question, but who would now leave the country in increased numbers to swell the greatness and increase the prosperity of a foreign land. The fact was, the Government had not the courage to make a fair and honest Landlord and Tenant Bill a Cabinet question, and until they did so they would never carry a measure that would settle this question. He threw back with contempt on the right hon. Gentleman the taunts he had thrown out that they were making political capital out of the question; every man in Ireland was interested in the settlement of this question, and let it not be said that a man was not interested because he had not a large estate and a great number of tenants. He wished to God the Government had had the power and the candour to have carried, at the commencement of the Session, some satisfactory measure which would have stopped the bleeding wounds of Ireland, and stayed the tide of emigration which was now desolating her shores. With regard to the obstruction which it was said he and his Friends threw in the way of the Bill last year, he would say that some of the Irish Members abstained from discussing the Leasing Powers Bill last Session, because the Irish Solicitor General warned them that a long discussion of the measure might imperil that Bill. It now appeared, from the speech of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, that there was no hope of the Irish tenantry obtaining justice from the Government with respect to the improvements they might effect upon their lands. The Government, after all their promises, now showed that they had only been trifling with the Irish tenants. A meeting of Irish Members of Parliament took place in Dublin some time ago, at which fifteen of them resolved that they would support no Government which would not make a Bill containing the principles laid down by Mr. Sharman Crawford a Cabinet question. But the present Government had not made, nor had they promised to make, a Bill of that sort a Cabinet question. In compliance with that resolution some of the Irish Members now sat on the Opposition side of the House; and he did not think that their speeches or votes were open to the imputations of the hon. and learned Member for Ennis.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he had never taunted the fifteen Irish Members alluded to with respect to their speeches or votes in that House. [MR. MAGUIRE: You did so three times.] As for the hon. Member for Dungarvon (Mr. Maguire,) he had distinctly congratulated him on the distinguished company which he kept in that House. He had said that that hon. Member went into the same lobby with Mr. Disraeli, against the proposition that the Catholic juveniles of London who would come under the operation of the Middlesex Reformatory Schools Bill should be instructed on Sundays by Catholic priests. He had also said that the hon. Member for Dungarvon was to be found in company with Mr. Whiteside, who had the hardihood to assert in that House that a portion of the Irish Members were keeping up agitation in Ireland for their own purposes. He (Mr. FitzGerald) was present at the meeting of forty-one Irish Members alluded to by the hon. Member for Dungarvon, but he had the good sense not to concur in the resolution of fifteen of them, who pledged themselves to oppose every Government that would not adopt Mr. Sharman Crawford's views on the landlord and tenant question.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART rose, to express his regret at the speech just delivered by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, and at the refusal of the Government to secure to the tenantry of Ireland a measure that would secure to them compensation for any improvements that they might effect on their farms. It would be in the recollection of some hon. Members, that in the year 1845 Sir Robert Peel said, he could hold out terms of bold defiance to the American Government on the Oregon question, because he had just sent a message of peace to Ireland in the shape of the Maynooth College Act. And was there less reason for sending a message of peace now to Ireland when we were engaged in a war with a man who ruled the sixth part of the habitable globe, and who was defended by granite fortifications and tempestuous seas? It was true that Ireland was at present perfectly quiet. She was never more free from sedition or agrarian outrage; but he warned the Government that the people of Ireland had discovered a far more effectual and dangerous way of embarrassing them than by sedition or outrage—namely, by availing themselves of the enlarged constituency, which gave them a greater means of acting on their representatives than they had before possessed. By that agency the Irish tenantry could put the screw upon their representatives in that House, and compel them to embarrass the proceedings of any Government that would not do justice to Ireland. He would ask, were not the people of Ireland justified in the view they had taken of this question, when four millions of tenants in Ireland were deprived of those securities which were possessed by almost every tenant in every other part of Europe, and which were absolutely necessary to the due development of industry? Did the Government think that the cottier tenants of Ireland would quietly submit to be taxed for the keeping up of expensive armaments to carry on distant wars, in which they had no personal interest, if the Government did not do everything in their power to secure to them the enjoyment of those rights which were enjoyed by almost every tenant in continental Europe, and to which they were fairly entitled? What interest could the Irish tenantry take in our national glory as long as they were denied their honest rights? The noble Lord in 1846 turned out the most eminently practical and successful Ministry of modern times, because they did not bring forward measures of conciliation for Ireland; and he asked, did not the conduct of the present Government justify the people of Ireland and their representatives in pursuing what was termed an obstructive course? Was it nothing that the continued denial of these rights was driving thousands of the Irish tenants to America, upon whose shores they landed with feelings of bitter indignation against the English Government, whose injustice compelled them to seek new homes. Was it not most impolitic in the Government to do anything which could have the effect of raising up a foreign Power with feelings of hostility against England?—and that they were most assuredly doing by driving away their fellow-subjects to America, where they would become England's bitter enemies. Our relations, even at this moment, with America, were not of so pacific a character that we could afford to lose our Irish fellow-subjects, with the strong probability of their becoming our American enemies. He earnestly entreated the Government, as they valued their future prospects in these arduous times, to show themselves willing and anxious to do equal justice to every section of their fellow-subjects in the United Kingdom.

SIR ARTHUR BROOKE did not wish to deprive tenants of any privileges which the legislation of that House might justly confer upon them, but he believed that no Bill with reference to this question could be proposed which would not be a direct infringement of the rights of property. The tenants of the North of Ireland would suffer materially if any of the Landlord and Tenant Bills that had been proposed in either House of Parliament should pass, because they already enjoy greater privileges than any contained in those Bills. If a Bill were passed, the northern landlords would abandon their present system, and give their tenants no more rights than those specified in such Bills, and the consequence would be that many tenants would be subjected to great sacrifices. He believed the Chief Secretary for Ireland had misunderstood the remarks of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier), who complained not so much of the withdrawal of the two Bills which he had prepared, as of the want of courtesy manifested towards him in not communicating with him upon the subject. He (Sir A. Brooke) hoped that the Tenant Leaguers would abstain from agitating Ireland on this question during the next Parliamentary recess. The Irish people were now in a better condition than they had been for some years. All parts of Ireland were in a satisfied state, and he hoped that no inflammatory harangue would be addressed to them on this question by those gentlemen who had heretofore conducted the affairs of the Tenant League.

MR. POTTER said, he believed it was true that considerable sums of money were laid out in the North of Ireland on the land; but in the south, which was in a very different condition, both politically and otherwise, the tenants had not dared to lay out their money on the land; and the event showed they had reasoned correctly, for at one period a meeting—not an open, if not exactly a secret one—had been held at Dublin, at which the landlords resolved to grant no more leases to the tenantry. While this state of things lasted, there would be no development of industry. He appealed to the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary, whether it was not the fact that millions of money were now lying unemployed in the Irish banks, simply because the tenants were afraid to invest it in the improvement of their land. Under these circumstances he regretted that the noble Lord had held out no hope of some measure for the protection of the tenants.

Mr. DISRAELI: Sir, I cannot allow this conversation to cease without making one or two observations with reference to my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Napier). I observed with great regret that some doubt has been attempted to be thrown upon the sincerity of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin in undertaking the consideration and conduct of this question in Parliament. I can easily understand that to a gentleman of such great susceptibility and such high sense of honour as my right hon. Friend such an imputation must be extremely painful; and being perfectly well acquainted with the conduct of my right hon. Friend in this matter from first to last, and knowing how single-minded it has been in every respect, I think I should not be doing my duty if I did not express my opinion upon this subject. Sir, long before my right hon. Friend introduced this question to the notice of Parliament—nay, long before he even imagined that he should have the opportunity of introducing it in a responsible position—he conferred with me in the most confidential manner on the subject, and intimated to me that it was a question which a public man, who aspired to take any great part in the conduct of the affairs of the country, could not safely neglect or evade. He placed under my notice the labours of Mr. Fergusson, who has been so often referred to to-night, and his own part in those labours, and I am therefore able to speak with some confidence and some authority of the sentiments which influenced my right hon. Friend in dealing with this question. Long after that period accident brought both my right hon. Friend and myself into a position in which our sincerity could be tested on this subject; and it was then that my right hon. Friend sketched those measures which with great elaboration and completeness he afterwards introduced before the House; and I am bound to say that, without having regard to minute details, which under our happy Constitution are always considered and settled by the criticism of the two Houses of Parliament, I myself gave my complete adherence to the general views which my right hon. Friend entertained upon the subject of the tenure of land in Ireland. It was my opinion that it was a question which those who aspired to govern the United Kingdom ought to meet; that it was a question that should be met in the general spirit and scope of the plan which had been sketched out by my right hon. Friend; and I was perfectly prepared to support him in the measures which he proposed for the consideration of Parliament. We have been told to-night that those were measures that it was impossible could be passed through the two Houses of Parliament. Well, Sir, I am not at all of opinion, after they had been subjected to the critical examination of Parliament, and after they had been subsequently submitted to the mature consideration of a powerful Government—I am not at all of opinion that they were measures which would not have been passed, and passed in a manner which, I think, would have contributed to the happiness and well-being of Ireland, and have proved satisfactory to all moderate men of all parties, whether of the landlord or of the tenant class. The Lord President has told us to-night, adverting to the measure respecting tenants' compensation which was introduced by my right hon. Friend—and he sneered at it while he did so—that it contained a communistic sentiment. In my opinion, it did not contain, and had no tendency to, any legislation of that character. There certainly were bold, but wise provisions contained in the measure of my right hon. Friend; but they were restricted with such prescience and sagacity, so prudently and judiciously limited, that the application of those provisions would have been, in my mind, for the advantage of that portion of the United Kingdom. I cannot say the same for the Tenants' Compensation Bill which was produced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant under the authority of the President of the Council. That was a measure, indeed, which did not include any of those restrictions or prudent limitations recommended by my right hon. Friend—that was a measure, in my mind, which had a communistic tendency—that was a measure, in my opinion, which was open to the great objections which the Lord President urged, although he unfortunately forgot that the object of his criticism should not have been the measure of my right hon. Friend, but rather the measure of the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant. Well, Sir, it is impossible for us to consider the peculiar subject which is under our consideration to-night without taking a large and general view; we cannot enter now into minute details upon such a subject as the tenure of land in Ireland. The Lord President to-night has told us that the reason why he does not support the two measures which have been brought before our consideration is, that the season is too late, in his opinion, to venture to ask Parliament to go into their consideration. Well, Sir, I am ready to admit that that is a legitimate reason to be offered by a Minister, and especially by a Minister who leads the House of Commons. Whatever may be the causes of the delay, if a Minister finds that at so advanced a period of the Session as the middle of July, an important question is about to be introduced to Parliament, and that there is little prospect of a satisfactory consideration of it—I say that that plea for procrastination is, primâ facie, a valid plea. But, before I enter into a discussion as to whether it is a valid plea in this case, let me remind the Committee that it is a plea totally inconsistent with that which was offered by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant to-night. The noble Lord tells us that this is an important question, that it is a question of great magnitude, but that we are so advanced in the Session that it is impossible to do justice to it. But what says the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant? In point blank contradiction to the Lord President he tells us that this question may be one of great importance and of great magnitude, but that it is brought before us in such a form that upon no condition whatever will the Ministry consent to its consideration. [Sir J. YOUNG: I never said that.] You may not have said it in those very words, but I will ask the Committee, was not that the meaning of the statement of the Chief Secretary? If that were not his meaning, the right hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of telling us what his meaning was; but it is very unfortunate that we should have discussed this question until this hour, and yet not have arrived at what the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman is. I understood the meaning of the noble Lord to be this—it was offered to us with plainness and straightforwardness, and I am sure that I have no desire in any way to misrepresent him—that this was an important question, but that at this advanced period of the Session he could not ask the House of Commons to consider it with any prospect of it being fairly discussed or satisfactorily concluded. What says the Chief Secretary? I understood the Chief Secretary—and of course I am subject to his correction if I mis-state him—I understood him to say, that whether it be February or July, you are asking the House to legislate upon this important subject upon conditions which he considered at all periods to be unacceptable—that you have declined to legislate upon a most important and indispensable portion of the subject, and therefore he cannot agree with you. The Committee can correct me in a moment if I am mis-stating the right hon. Gentleman, and they can decide in a moment whether the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is consistent with that of the Lord President. Sir, I will not dwell upon this flagrant and glaring inconsistency further, though really, so far as the conduct of the business of this House is concerned, the validity of the noble Lord's plea depends upon other circumstances. But I cannot adopt from the Lord President even his undisputed statement. I agree with him to this extent—that if the Session be so far advanced, as undoubtedly it is, it may be inconvenient to enter into a discussion of one of the most important propositions that ever was submitted to the consideration of a British House of Commons; but why have six months been wasted? What have we been doing these six months that we could not consider and attempt to settle a question, not now introduced for the first time, but years ago, to the consideration of Parliament—a question which for a long series of years has been a subject for the consideration and study of statesmen—which, two years ago, was formally introduced to the consideration of Parliament—which was submitted last year to the consideration of the House of Lords—and which, by special arrangement, in order that no time might be lost, has been, with all the fruits of the mature deliberation of the other House of Parliament, sent back to us this year? One would have thought, considering the gravity and all importance of the subject, considering the period of time that it has occupied the attention of Parliament, considering the special circumstances under which, after having been introduced to the notice of Parliament, it was submitted to the mature examination and settlement of the House of Lords last year—one would have thought after all this, that the House of Commons this year having sat six months, the Government would have been able to have offered some solution of the question. What have they been doing, I want to know? What have Her Majesty's Ministers been doing the last six months that we have not had this question fairly considered and ably arranged? I want to know what is the catalogue of their legislative exploits which may be an excuse for the period of time which has been thus employed or thus wasted? I want to know, if they have been at war, what conquests they have achieved? I want to know, if they have been at peace, what beneficial arrangements—what advantageous legislation—they have accomplished? Have they reformed Parliament? Have they revised Parliamentary oaths? Have they educated the country? Have they even educated Scotland? What corrupt constituencies have they punished? What have they done which may be a valid excuse for not having dealt with this all-important measure? I should have thought that, instead of moving to report progress, it would have been more satisfactory to the country, and more satisfactory to the feelings of any Minister who pretends to lead the House of Commons, if he had given some reason why six months should have elapsed in which they, having done nothing, should not have done this. Report the progress of these two Bills! Why, Sir, it's too derisive a proposition to be made. Report the progress of the Ministry! Tell us what they have done. Make a Motion to that effect. Report the progress of Her Majesty's Government. Come forward to the table and tell us what Her Majesty's Ministers have done. And that would be a reporting of progress far more edifying and satisfactory, I think, than the Motion which has been made by the Lord President this evening. Well, Sir, if the noble Lord and his compeers have not succeeded yet in dealing with this difficult question—at any rate, vast and difficult as it is, the late Government attempted to deal with it with some efficiency and with all sincerity—what is the prospect which the noble Lord holds out of the future legislation of his Government—if it be a Government—upon this subject? A few nights ago a distinguished Member of the Treasury bench spoke of the conduct of the Gentlemen upon this side of the House—at least, right or wrong, not inconsiderable in number as a party connection, and more important still, in my opinion, for the principles which they profess—he spoke of them as “a party, if they be a party.” That was the courteous comment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Well, then, I think if we are spoken of as “a party, if we be a party,” that I may speak of the noble Lord and his Friends as “a Government, if they be a Government.” But, conducting our debates in a spirit thus mutually provisional, I would ask the noble Lord, who tells you he can do nothing at present, whether he will answer the question of an hon. Gentleman who addressed him from the other benches, and who asked what are the intentions of his Government with respect to the tenure of land in Ireland for the future? I think that that was a very fair Parliamentary question. How it was met I leave the Committee to decide. The noble Lord says that it's a difficult question, and therefore we are not to deal with it. My idea, Sir, of a Government is, that it is a body of men who ought to deal with difficult questions. I know that the Lord President, for a number of years, has, somehow or other, contrived to govern this country—personally speaking, I admit, with admirable ability—for he is a ripe scholar, an adroit debater, in my opinion no common orator—still I think that the secret skill of his administration has always been that he has evaded questions that are difficult. But I do not think that that is a satisfactory answer to the Gentleman who addressed that query. The question may be difficult. In my opinion it is very difficult; but I think that it is the duty of the noble Lord and his Friends—especially when I remember the public expression of their sentiments upon the subject of the tenure of land in Ireland in 1846—I think, I say, that it becomes the noble Lord to be something better than a critic upon his opponents on this subject, and that he ought to do something upon the question of the tenure of land in Ireland beyond reading to us passages from private letters from Lord Lieutenants. Why, the noble Lord has never yet had a difficulty upon Irish politics which he has not attempted to answer by reading a passage from a private letter from a Lord Lieutenant. But, says the noble Lord, "I could retaliate upon this subject. I could remind you what occurred when you had to deal with this question. I could remind you of your consenting to the second reading of the Bill of the learned Serjeant, and of the subsequent speeches which were made condemnatory of that measure in the House of Lords by the Earl of Derby." Sir, if the noble Lord thinks that that is a retaliation he is perfectly welcome to make use of it; but knowing that the noble Lord is one of the most adroit debaters in this House, and that if he has a weakness, it is that he always overstates his own case, and always misstates his opponent's, I am quite sure that the noble Lord could have made a great deal of that point if he had not known that it was utterly worthless and untenable. True it is we did consent to the second reading of the Bill of the learned Serjeant the Member for Kilkenny (Serjeant Shee); but did we agree to the second reading of that Bill because we in any way approved of it? On the contrary, we expressed our disapprobation of it. But when there was a variety of Bills in this House upon the subject of the tenure of land in Ireland which were about to be referred to a Select Committee, we thought that it would be most unfair, and not only most unfair, but that it would justly excite great odium and suspicion in Ireland, if we said, "This Bill shall be shut out from the tribunal, and shall not be submitted to that critical, and searching, and impartial examination which the other Bills upon this subject are to be submitted to." We acted in that instance quite in deference to the highest Parliamentary authorities and precedents; and I believe that nothing would have been more unjustifiable, nothing more unjust, nothing more calculated to provoke suspicion in Ireland, than if we had said, "All these Bills upon the subject of the tenure of land in Ireland shall be submitted to the Select Committee, but we will specially prevent one particular Bill being submitted to the same test and tribunal, because we disapprove of the general principles upon which it is founded." It was in complete consistency with our view on this matter that the Earl of Derby, almost at the same time, in the House of Lords, utterly condemned the principle of that measure. In so doing, allow me to say, he took a course which, if he had only considered what some statesmen consider —influence in this House and the power of commanding votes—he certainly would not have pursued. He took that course in the very teeth of menace, and, because he would not be misunderstood, with the entire consent of his Colleagues; and whatever may be the consequences of that course, I, for one, have never for a moment regretted it. Sir, one of the supporters of the Government who have spoken upon this subject has described the learned Serjeant the Member for Kilkenny as a supporter of the Opposition, or rather he has repudiated the claim of the Government to the support of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The Chief Secretary has described the learned Serjeant as not one of those Gentlemen who honour the Government with their support. Well, Sir, I confess, especially at this advanced period of the Session, that I will not enter into the inquiry of who are the Gentlemen who honour the present Government with their support. That is one of those questions which might lead not only to debate, but even to an adjourned debate. I hardly know any question of the present day which might be susceptible of such variety of treatment and of such interminable discussion. Whether, after the longest discussion, it could satisfactorily be proved to the country that there are any Gentlemen who extend to Her Majesty's Government that unbounded confidence which, of course, they may desire, we need not now settle, and I shall leave it as one of those vexed controversies which agitate and perhaps amuse the political world. I want, upon the present occasion that the House and the country—as I think is due to my right hon. Friend, who has acted throughout this business in a manner so honourable, so honest, and, as I know, so single-minded, taking up this question before he ever anticipated being in a responsible position, and finding himself in a responsible position, pressing it upon the attention of the Cabinet with all the energy of which an able man is capable—I want that the House and the country, in deference to him, should clearly understand what we are talking about this evening, and that the noble Lord shall not rise in a thin House with no one present, and think that he is to stifle the expression of Parliamentary opinion by moving that you, Sir, should report progress. Why, Sir, I am in the habit frequently of sitting opposite the noble Lord, and taking an humble part in the conduct of the business of this House; I am constantly in the habit of witnessing Motions to report progress which the noble Lord generally most energetically or plaintively opposes; and, in deference to the noble Lord's feelings, I very often exercise the slight influence which I have—the result of kindly feeling, and not of authority—in preventing those Motions for reporting progress. What, therefore, was my astonishment when the Lord President, having fixed this evening with solemn notice for this discussion, moved that you report progress, after hearing from a distinguished Member of the late Irish Government his statement upon this important subject—the most important subject connected with the Government of Ireland—a statement which I am sure made, and which I was witness of having made, a deep impression upon the Committee, followed by a statement of a very different character, and, as I believe, upon the part of the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, producing a very different effect. I am, of course, unwilling to speak with any personal allusion to the statement of the Chief Secretary. It was made at the twilight hour, which, according to Dante, “softens the heart,” and may perhaps soften the brain; but certainly, that any man filling a responsible position, and a position of such extreme responsibility as the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, should suppose that those muttered sentences upon such a subject could carry any conviction to a Committee of the House of Commons, or any satisfaction to the country upon this vital question, appears to me to exceed the most sanguine estimate of Ministerial audacity. But, Sir, I say that it is to me most surprising that the Lord President himself, having fixed in the most formal manner the occasion for hearing the statement of the late Attorney General for Ireland, and having listened to the rejoinder of the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, should have got up and said that in the state of the affair there was but one course to take, and, under the circumstances, to move that you report progress—that appears to me to have been a most singular, unauthorised, and indefensible course. Why, Sir, what was the motive of my right hon. Friend in asking permission of the House to make that statement? My right hon. Friend, acting from that impulse of personal feeling which is always respected by Gentlemen in this House, upon whatever side, thought that his honour was impugned, and that the public interest was affected by the course which the Government had chosen to take upon this all-important question. Why, Sir, the sense of honour and self-respect is, after all, the most powerful stimulus that a man has in public life. We all agree in that. But if, in addition to supposing that his honour is wounded by the conduct of the Government in this House, a public man believes, at the same time, that the public service has been grievously injured, then I say that he is fully authorised to make such an appeal as was made by my right hon. Friend to the noble Lord. But what does he make that appeal for? Does a man make that appeal in order that he may get up and merely state his case, and receive a common-place formal and official answer in reply? On the contrary, it is that he may elicit the opinion of this House on the main question; it is that he wishes to ask Gentlemen among whom he lives, and whose opinions—whatever be their political party—he respects, whether they believe that, on a considerable question of his public life he has acquitted himself in an unworthy manner, or whether they believe that the Government of the country has trifled with him in an unjustifiable mode. Is that to be answered by the Lord President getting up and moving that you, Sir, shall report progress? Why, Sir, he might have left that to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford. That would have been consistent conduct on the part of the Government—that would have been in admirable taste—that would have achieved and accomplished in the happiest manner, that which the noble Lord has himself condescended to attempt. I have not, Sir, seen of late in this House that extreme readiness to pass without sympathy or respect over the feelings of eminent Members, who think themselves aggrieved by the conduct of this House or by the Ministry, or by the public circumstances of the day. I have not seen of late any unwillingness on the part of the House to pass by unnoticed, or without giving fair opportunity of explanation, without a decent expression of sympathy, or of opinion of a contrary character if necessary, the conduct or policy of public men when they have appealed to this House. Why, Sir, we had a very important measure—a measure, perhaps, quite as important as the question of the tenure of land in Ireland—long under the consideration of this House and of the country. It was a measure which had certainly excited the sympathies of some, and the alarm and susceptibilities of others, throughout the nation—it was one which might have affected the organisation of political parties—it was in every respect a question of great public interest, and a Member of this House, of great eminence, was connected with that question. The country expected a measure upon that question, as it expects a measure upon the tenure of land in Ireland. Upon the conduct of the eminent man whose name was connected with that measure, depended much more than depends on the labours of my right hon. Friend. Upon the decision of the House on that question depended the fate of parties, and, perhaps, the destinies of Administrations. Well, that was discovered to be a question at the last moment involving difficulties; it was supposed for a long time that it was one which would be easily settled—so easily settled that the Government was formed with the avowed purpose of settling it; but it was discovered to be a very difficult question. Well, Sir, the individual connected with that question, when the hour arrived which could no longer be postponed, and he felt that the measure could not be carried—when he felt, as an honourable man, that the Ministry of which he was a Member might, if that measure were not carried, be subjected to vile imputations—came forward, stated the motives that had influenced his public conduct—placed himself fairly before the country, interested in the character of so eminent an individual, and asked for the verdict of the House. Did anybody get up then, when the Reform Bill was abandoned and say, “The best thing we can do is to move the previous question, and ask Mr. Bouverie to report progress?” On the contrary, the House felt that the individual who appealed to them was justified in appealing to them; and not only justified in appealing to them, but that it was his duty as a man, as a public man, and as a statesman, to enter into the details of the motives that had influenced him, and of the circumstances which had prevented the legislation which he believed to be all-important;

and we respected the occasion and the individual. I ask for my right hon. Friend the same treatment, and that the conduct of those who have endeavoured to suppress opinion on this subject, who have endeavoured to place in an insignificant position a most able and estimable man, who in high office endeavoured to fulfil his duty to his Sovereign and his country, shall not be sanctioned or tolerated. My right hon. Friend has, perhaps, too plaintively touched upon the injury to his own private feelings in this matter; perhaps he has dilated a little too much upon the abuse, the odium, and the obloquy to which the fulfilment of his duty has subjected him in his attempt to do that which he thought was politic. Sir, if there be such weakness upon the part of my right hon. Friend, such expressions, in my opinion, ought to increase the feeling in his favour of the House generally; and, for my part, I only respect still more the public man who will manfully and sincerely confess that he is sensible to the power of an unjust attack. I think, however, it would be a wise thing for those who embark in the strifes and struggles of political existence either to be less sensitive, or to conceal their susceptibilities. When my right hon. Friend has been abused as much as some of those who were some time since his Colleagues, we shall hear far less of his complaints to the House than we have to-night. But there is one point in the appeal of my right hon. Friend, on which, from a sense of candour and of justice to Her Majesty’s Ministers, I feel it right to express my opinion—that he has been seduced into an excess of sensibility. My right hon. Friend complains of a want of fairness towards him on the part of the Government; they behaved, if we may trust, as almost every one must trust, the expression of his opinion—they behaved with some degree of perfidy. He tells you—and it is a very simple story—that these Bills were submitted to the consideration of the House of Lords; that a Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to examine them; that some of the Members of that Committee were Members of Her Majesty’s Government; that the Chairman of that Committee was the Lord Privy Seal; that they examined into the question, and that it was their unanimous opinion that of the three Bills—the one entitled the Tenants’ Compensation Bill should not for a moment be encouraged—that it should be thrown aside; that, in deference to the determination of that Committee, another of Her Majesty's Ministers—a Secretary of State—came forward in the House of Lords and adopted two of the Bills as Government measures, and these two were the Bills which had, to a great extent, been matured by the labours of my right hon. Friend; that subsequently, and in due course, these two Bills were brought back to this House; and that after the Committee of the House of Lords, with Members of the Government serving on it, with a great officer of State for the Chairman, had availed themselves, through a prolonged and protracted investigation, of the knowledge, energies, and unwearied assiduity of my right hon. Friend, and had, by their organ in the House of Lords, accepted two of these measures, and had discarded the third as impolitic and incurable, they then sent them down to the House of Commons; that in that House a distinguished, but inferior Member of the Government—the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant—rose in his place, after all this protracted labour and investigation, and senatorial approbation of those measures, and announced that, in consequence of the third Bill having been rejected, the two others approved and adopted by Her Majesty's Ministers in the House of Lords could not be recommended for the sanction of the House of Commons. My right hon. Friend seems to have been touched to the quick by this conduct; it was but natural that he should be so, interested as he was in the subject—having given—and this I beg the Committee to recollect—long hours, and almost years, of study and painful investigation to his subject—having, in office and out of it, devoted thought and heart to its solution—after having placed himself in painful collision with Members of his own party, both in this and in his own country—after having received the confidence of the Lord Privy Seal—after having received the approbation of a Secretary of State, and the unanimous sanction of a Committee of the House of Lords—after having seen his measures passed by that House—he is thrown over scarcely with common respect by the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant. And I think the Committee will sympathise with this distinguished man—the late Attorney General for Ireland—in the disappointment

he has expressed. But although I feel that the expression of his opinion was justified, I admit that it was too extreme. My right hon. Friend quite forgets that, however the Government may have behaved towards him, they have only followed the rule which, with admirable impartiality, they have always extended to themselves. He must remember that if they have treated him faithlessly, it is much the same way—so far as we can learn, not only from private report, which is not always right, but from public demonstration, which must ever influence us all—it is, I say, much the same way in which they have conducted themselves towards each other. I think that my right hon. Friend was overcome by a surplussage of sensibility when he complained of the perfidious conduct of the Government towards him, being only a simple Member of the Opposition; for I cannot understand that the process and treatment by which the Reform Bill was postponed differs much from those who have been employed in the settlement of the tenure of land in Ireland. I think my right hon. Friend ought to take that into consideration, and if, before he made this appeal to the Committee—which I candidly admit he made without consulting me—if he had asked the opinion of some of his friends, who regard his honour, and take as much interest in his career as those whom he did consult—if he had asked me—and he is generally kind enough to consult me on the course he pursues—I should have said, “I most earnestly recommend you not to take the course you propose; for, however reasonable such a course may seem to your admirable simplicity of nature, yet I believe it is best that you should forget the treatment you have received, though I can believe that in your case the sense of outrage is infinitely increased by the deep and profound conviction I know you entertain that these measures are admirably calculated to benefit your country.” If the case had been thus put to my right hon. Friend, and it had been told him that, in order to conduct the affairs of the country in a Government of such singular material as the present, these little misconceptions must necessarily and perpetually occur—that they are obliged, even among themselves, to make each other withdraw Bills after they have given the most solemn pledges that they would introduce them—and that their administration of the affairs of the country cannot be carried on without habitual perfidy—of course I mean confined to themselves, and not as regards the public, with whom they always accomplish their promises—if all this had been stated to my right hon. Friend before he made this appeal, he would not have done so. He must have felt that appeals of this character to the country at this moment are extremely inconvenient. We are involved in circumstances of great difficulty; this is a great national emergency, and it is of the utmost importance that we should persuade all Europe that we have a powerful Government, supported by a unanimous Parliament; therefore I should have said that if, instead of bringing this appeal forward, my right hon. Friend had, as by the Standing Orders he had the power to do, moved that no strangers should be admitted for the remainder of the Session, so that no report of our proceedings should transpire under any circumstances, I think such a course would have tended to strengthen the Ministry and to consolidate a Government, on whom depends, as at present, so perilous a responsibility. Therefore, I think that my right hon. Friend has, to a certain degree, erred in that particular. But still, if, from these feelings, which will always animate gentlemen, which will make them not stop to speculate upon what is prudent, but upon what is due to their honour and to their public character, my right hon. Friend has thought this appeal necessary, I do believe the House of Commons will sympathise with that appeal so made to them, and that it will not hesitate—not, perhaps, by a formal vote, but at least by that expression of feeling which cannot be misunderstood—to show to my right hon. Friend and to the country, that, whatever may be their opinions upon the main question, they are sensible that, as a public man, he has earnestly endeavoured to do his duty, and that he does not deserve to be treated as he has been treated by Her Majesty's Ministers this evening.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The question, Sir, as I at first submitted to the House, is a very simple one. I had appointed an important Bill as one of the first Orders of the Day. A right hon. Gentleman, whom everybody respects, thought himself aggrieved by the conduct of the Government upon another subject, and wished to give a personal explanation. I said, if he wished to make any personal explanation, or to bring any charge against the Government, I would postpone other business, however important, in order that he might have that opportunity. The right hon. Gentleman was fully heard; my right hon. Friend near me (Sir J. Young) offered his explanation; and I then thought that, as I had given way to the right hon. Gentleman, sacrificing the progress of an important Bill, the House would consent then to proceed to the proper business of the evening. Some hon. Gentlemen, however, who take a deep interest in this question, spoke upon it, and protracted the debate; but the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has taken another course—he has taken the course of making a party attack upon the Members of the Government with reference not merely to this Bill, but with reference to their general conduct—he has taken the opportunity of referring to a measure, or rather to the course taken with regard to a certain measure, to which he was a party when he was in office, and to which I, not wishing to rouse angry feeling in debate, very likely should not have adverted. However, the right hon. Gentleman has called attention to that subject, and I feel myself obliged to call attention to that subject too, in order that the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman may be valued at what it is worth. Mr. Sharman Crawford, when a Member of this House, was in the habit of proposing to introduce a Bill which the Members of my Administration thought contained principles which ought not to be countenanced by the House. We always fairly declared our sentiments on the subject, and either on the proposal to introduce such Bills, or on the second reading, stated our objections fairly. The right hon. Gentleman, when a Member of the Government, thought fit to pursue a different course. There were other Bills introduced by the Attorney General of that Government—the Attorney General for Ireland—and he (Mr. Disraeli) consented that an hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Serjeant Shee) should have leave to introduce his Bill on the same subject. The learned Serjeant and those who supported him were evidently surprised at the concession, but at the same time greatly gratified, as they took it for granted that the Select Committee was fairly to consider that Bill, that its provisions were to be fairly before them, and that the Committee were to consider whether they were just to the landlord and fair to the tenant.

But, after having made that concession, which so greatly pleased the Gentlemen interested in that Bill, the Earl of Derby, then the head of that Government—not, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman, to satisfy his own views and at the risk of losing support—made a declaration of an opposite character. The fact was, that great alarm was excited in the other House of Parliament. The supporters of the Earl of Derby's Administration there felt that property was in danger by the introduction of that Bill and its second reading. One noble Lord asked a question upon the subject. It was then that the Earl of Derby was understood to have declared that he utterly disapproved the principles of that Bill, that it was not intended seriously to consider them, and that he for one never would sanction the principles contained in that Bill. Why, what did all this amount to? Deception, in the first place, towards those who had proposed the Bill. They were allured by the notion that their Bill was to be fairly considered; and then, after they had obtained that concession, they were told that it was mere deception, that that Bill had been sent to a Select Committee, without any intention of fairly considering its provisions, but had been simply sent there for the purpose of being rejected. I must say I think a more disreputable and more discreditable course on the part of a Government never was pursued than that of allowing a Bill to be read a second time in this House, referring it to a Select Committee, as if it was to be fairly, deliberately gone into, and then assuring the other House of Parliament that it was not to be fairly considered, and that there was no intention whatever of paying the least regard to its provisions, but that the chief of the Government pledged himself to the rejection of all its provisions. Such was the conduct which the right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to bring under the notice of this House; and, when I purposely avoided laying any stress upon that conduct, he brings it forward in such a way as to make it absolutely necessary to call to the recollection of the House what that conduct really was. If he thought that that Bill was a fair Bill—that it contained provisions which deserved the attention of this House—it should have been fairly considered in Committee. If, on the contrary, he thought that it contained provisions dangerous to property, the declaration that such was the opinion of the Government should have been made when it was proposed for the second reading. But this was not done, and an attempt was made to gain the favour of those who had always supported the principle of that Bill; but when the Government of Lord Derby found that this conduct had excited the alarm of a numerous body of the Members of the upper House of Parliament, they took a totally opposite view. Such was the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman, when in possession of power. He has found great fault with the conduct of Her Majesty's Government during the present Session. But, Sir, it is to be considered that, with regard to the party which the right hon. Gentleman leads, he is in a very peculiar position, and that position very often induces him to pursue a line of conduct which, if his position were not so peculiar, would not, perhaps, be the line of conduct he would pursue. He is the leader of a party who have attached much importance, as regards their credit or their character, to the traditions which belong to that party, and to the maintenance of certain principles to which—whether they are sound principles or not for the Government of the country is not now in question—they are deeply attached. It consequently follows that when any great question comes before the House in which the principle of conservatism or progress is clearly at issue, when any of those questions upon which that party have been always afraid of innovation are at issue, then they are ready to follow the right hon. Gentleman; but if the questions involved nothing of this, or they were questions in which it appeared to them the honour of the country is involved, or if in following up their principles it led to a support of Her Majesty's Government, then that party—whether the right hon. Gentleman will lead them or not—give their fair and hearty support to the Government accordingly. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, finds himself disabled from that course which a leader of Opposition, disapproving of a Government, would naturally pursue—namely, upon some question or other bringing to an issue the conduct of the Government, and whether or not it deserves the support of the House of Commons. He finds himself unable to bring that question to an issue, and the support he would have upon many of these questions would be such as to strengthen the Government which he wishes to overthrow. There is another course, however, which the right hon. Gentleman finds it in his power to take, and that is to lie in wait for Motions which are made by independent Members; and, whatever the colour of those Motions may be, provided there is no great principle involved in them—no immediately disastrous consequences to ensue from the adoption of those Motions—then the right hon. Gentleman has influence with his party—then Gentlemen who have not much attended to the question are ready to follow his lead, and he pursues upon these questions one undeviating course, which is, whatever the question may be, to endeavour to put the Government into a minority, and then take his chance of saying that their measures have failed and that Motions which they opposed have been adopted. I have now stated the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman with respect to a measure of much interest when he was in office, and I have stated what has been his frequent conduct since. It is certainly a conduct which is somewhat new to me. [Derisive cheering from the Opposition.] Yes, it certainly is new to me; because, Sir, I have been a Member of a Government which has been opposed by such leaders as Sir Robert Peel and others who preceded him in the lead of the Conservative party. Such leaders, when they found that their opinions induced them to oppose the Government, openly and fairly opposed it, but they never thought of coming down to this House merely to take up any Motion which might be under discussion. If they thought it was a question which did not tend to the transaction of public business, they considered it their duty either to abstain from opposition or give their support to the Government. The right hon. Gentleman, however, thinks that no such duty is incumbent upon him. He seems to consider that Motions in which the character and the institutions of the country are involved constitute a game in which it is perfectly competent to him to embarrass the Government when he can, to utter his sarcasms, to come down with his taunts, and not to consider what important consequences may follow. If the right hon. Gentleman can find that his party will go with him upon a great question—such as I do not say a vote of want of confidence, but any question involving a principle upon which a Government must stand or fall—let him take that course and act as his predecessors have done. But, if there is a question upon which he and his party really are not bound by any principle of theirs to oppose the Government, if, on the contrary, it is a question in furtherance of their principles, let them act with that regard to character and to integrity of conduct which have distinguished their party in former times. I believe that this is one of the causes which has made the conduct of the business of this House what it has been during the later part of the period in which the right hon. Gentleman has been leader of the Opposition. I am not going now to refer to these various questions to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded. Each in its turn was, no doubt, of importance. The Reform Bill, to which he has adverted, I certainly postponed with the greatest reluctance; but I postponed it with the agreement of the majority of hon. Members on this side of the House, and in accordance, I believe, with the general feeling of the country at large. I am not now shaken in my view of the importance of that measure, nor, if I felt myself pledged to yield and to withdraw the Bill, was it at the suggestion of my Colleagues—because I myself, having charge of the measure, was obliged to propose to the Cabinet that I should take the course I did. But I did so, finding it impossible to stand against that general impression which prevailed not only in this House, but throughout the country, that it was not expedient to proceed with it. Sir, I have not on that account at all changed my opinion with regard to the importance of that question, and I feel great confidence that the time will come when those defects which remain in the first Reform Bill will come under the consideration of the House, and when amendments of those defects will be effected. I have only further to say, that, with regard to the right hon. Gentleman who began this discussion, nothing was further from my intention, in moving that the Chairman should report progress, than at all to disparage the speech that he made or the conduct that he has pursued. I cannot conceive that he thought that during the present evening we could make much progress with regard to these Bills. What has happened to these Bills is what has happened frequently, and almost every Session, under various Governments, when in the middle of July it has been found impossible to go into various complicated questions, and to obtain a solution of that which has always been difficult. I therefore do not see that there is any advantage in attempting to pursue these Bills any further. I have already spoken with regard to the merits of the landlord and tenant question in Ireland. I did not say, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, that it was the duty of the Government to leave this question without a solution. What I did say was, and what I believe is, that the most useful measure that could be provided would be a measure giving power and force to voluntary contracts, and a simple remedy for the breach of those contracts. One of the measures of the right hon. Gentleman certainly does contain provision for that purpose, and I trust that before long it will become law. Whether it may be possible to go further than that, and to make compulsory arrangements between landlord and tenant, is a matter upon which I have very great doubts, not merely because it is a difficult matter for legislation, but because I doubt whether legislation upon that subject can be so minute as to act at the same time with efficacy and with justice.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that though by no means inclined implicitly to follow the Government upon all matters in reference to Ireland, yet he would readily acknowledge that the course pursued by them on the present occasion met his approval. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had introduced these Bills, which were referred to a Select Committee, when the fate of the late Government was on the balance, and astonished the House by declaring in favour of tenant compensation. One of these Bills, however, was, in his (Mr. V. Scully's) opinion, a mere landlords' Bill, which he could never consent to pass as an isolated measure. The whole of the Bills went to a Select Committee, notwithstanding his (Mr. V. Scully's) protest. Lord Derby's Government was then in the balance, and he (Mr. V. Scully) believed there was a bonâ fide intention on their part, therefore, to pass these Bills. The Tenants' Compensation Bill, however, as introduced by the right hon. Gentleman, was an utter delusion. He (Mr. V. Scully) should have been much better pleased if the noble Lord had given some exposition of the intentions of the Government on the subject of these Bills next Session. His reasons for believing the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Young) was sincere in his course with regard to these Bills was, that he had sent them bonâ fide to a Select Committee, and that he had manifested a determination to go on with the Tenants' Compensation Bill, but he had reluctantly postponed it at the request of the hon. Member for Kerry. On the 20th of June the Bill was brought forward, and opposed by the worst enemies of Ireland, the Tenant-League representatives in that House, now leagued with hon. Gentlemen opposite. The result of the opposition of the hon. Member for Meath was that the Landlord and Tenant Bill was proceeded with, and it was not until the 21st of July that the Tenants' Compensation Bill could be brought forward, in consequence of the opposition of those hon. Members. The Secretary for Ireland could not do more for any Bills. It was quite impossible that these Bills could pass in August when they went to the House of Lords. They were, therefore, thrown over; and at the opening of the Session, they, in conjunction with other Bills on the subject—seven in all—were referred to a Select Committee of twenty-two Members, most of them in opposition to the Government, or belonging to the Conservative party. This Committee accordingly rejected the Tenants' Compensation Bill, which the hon. Member for Dungarvon had designated as a libellous mass, and which the right hon. Member for Bucks had denounced as impolitic and unendurable. He (Mr. V. Scully) did not concur with the right hon. Gentleman, and he thought it would be more satisfactory if the right hon. Gentleman had indicated what he would do on the subject when he came into office—an event, of course, looked upon by him as “looming in the future.” The Bills coming from the House of Lords were not printed for the House of Commons and delivered until the 9th of June. On the 12th June they were read a second time, at the instance of the right hon. Baronet, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman was absent for some considerable time after, and it was not until the 29th June it became his convenience to come to London. At a late hour of the night of the 29th June the right hon. Gentleman expressed a wish to commit the Bill pro formâ, for the purpose of proposing certain Amendments, and then he adjourned the debate. On that occasion the noble Lord said, the usual courtesy was, to afford the right hon. Member an opportunity of putting the Bill into shape; proving that the Bill was the Bill of the right hon. Member, and not of the Government. On the 11th July the Bill stood on the paper with no less than six closely printed pages of Amendments, containing as many as a dozen new clauses. There were four pages of Amendments by the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny, and three by another hon. Member. These were to be considered, with 140 clauses of the Bill, and the Tenants' Compensation Bill also. Any man of common sense would see that there was no practical chance of going on with any of these Bills, except the present one, the Landlord and Tenant Bill. The only safe course, therefore, to pursue on the part of the Government was to throw over the Bills altogether; and the only course open to the Liberal Members of that House was to support them. He hoped the noble Lord would consult with those men who were able to give him honest advice as regarded these measures in the future on one side of the House and on the other—such as the hon. Member for Fermanagh, who had a deep interest in the question, and not those men of extreme opinions, who called themselves the leaders on the question, and had no weight in the country. He trusted the noble Lord would not be deterred by anything which he advanced that evening from endeavouring to settle this question. With regard to the attack of the hon. Member for Meath on the Solicitor General for Ireland, who had been compelled to leave London for Ireland that morning on private business, he (Mr. V. Scully) was sure the language indulged in would not have been used had that hon. and learned Gentleman been present.

MR. MAGUIRE said, with regard to the taunt of the hon. Member (Mr. V. Scully), that the hon. Member for Meath would not have used such language in the presence of the Solicitor General for Ireland, he would refer the hon. Member to the Committee upstairs, where the hon. Member for Meath met the Solicitor General face to face, and there made his accusations. He (Mr. Maguire) was present at a meeting in Ireland when the hon. and learned Gentleman himself took a resolution into his hands, making it more stringent, for the purpose of binding independent Irish Members to resist any Bill on the subject of landlord and tenant which did not embrace the principle of Mr. Sharman Crawford's Bills. The hon. Member for Meath had not obstructed the Tenants' Compensation Bill, but simply wished its postponement until the Landlord and Tenant Bill, an equally important measure, had been considered by the country. The charge of the hon. and learned Member for Cork (Mr. V. Scully) was merely intended to cover the retreat of the Government, whom he (Mr. Maguire) contended should either declare their intentions on this subject or resign their posts. To justify the Tenant League from the aspersions of the hon. and learned Member for Cork would be attaching too much importance to them.

MR. DISRAELI: I do not wish to enter into any personal controversy with the noble Lord; but there is one observation which he made, which, as it concerns the general business of the House, I cannot allow to pass unnoticed. The noble Lord has made some comments on the relation which exists on this side of the House between the Members of the Conservative party and those who have the office of directing their general conduct. It seems to him that they have no confidence in their leaders, and that their leaders have no confidence in them; but, nevertheless, he admits that they are always putting Government into a minority. That is extremely unfortunate for the Government; I admit that that is a very inconvenient result to arise from the anomalous circumstances to which the noble Lord has referred. But I wish to disabuse him of the impression which he seems to have imbibed, that my principal business is to study how we can put the noble Lord in a minority. On the contrary, I can assure him that if he occupied my position under similar conditions, and under the circumstances which now prevail in the political world, he would find that the principal business and duty of the leader of Opposition is to study, if possible, how the Government should not be put in a minority. The noble Lord has made a very strange comment upon this remarkable state of affairs. He says he does not expect that I should propose a vote of want of confidence in the Government. I think he was quite right in that remark, because that is a Motion which ought only to be made under very extraordinary circumstances; and I may say, in passing, that, although quite a constitutional proposition under those circumstances, it is indirectly somewhat interfering with the prerogative of the Crown. The noble Lord says, "I do not expect you to propose a vote of want of confidence in the Government, but you ought to ask the opinion of the House on some great question; and if on that great question the opinion of the House is adverse to that of the Government, Ministers would draw the necessary deduction." But as the noble Lord admits that it is not my province, and that it is not incumbent upon me to propose a vote of want of confidence in the Government, I wish he would have the kindness to inform the House what is the great question which he wishes to be brought forward, and upon which he wishes to obtain the opinion of the House of Commons. Is it a question which concerns the distribution of political power—such as a Reform Bill? or is it a system of National Education? Surely these are great subjects; and, although there are not many subjects of that importance which can be quoted as having been brought before our consideration this year, there have been some other subjects of first-rate Parliamentary importance, the result of having submitted which to the notice of the House has generally been to place the Government in minorities—in considerable minorities—some twelve, fourteen, or sixteen or eighteen times during this Session. I do not say that that is any reason for the noble Lord to take the course which he contemplates as possible under other circumstances and with other persons; but, when he says, "I do not want you to bring forward a vote of want of confidence in the Government, but I wish the opinion of the House to be tested by a decision on some great question," he is bound to tell us, after the experience of the Session, what is the character of the great question which he wants the decision of the House to be asked upon. The noble Lord is laying down a principle applicable to our meetings every day. The noble Lord, disquieted by the phenomena which he observes around, gives vent to his feelings by saying that he is opposed by a body of Gentlemen who have no confidence in their leaders, and whose leaders had no confidence in them. That is fortunate for the Government. It seems to me that, if the contrary were the case—if they were opposed to a party who had confidence in their leader, and whose leader had confidence in them, bad as is the present state of things, the Government would not last out the evening. The noble Lord is fortunate in having that peculiar combination which has, however, produced such disastrous results to the Government. But as the noble Lord has brought forward votes of confidence and votes of want of confidence in a Government, and as he is a constitutional scholar, and on great occasions is accustomed to read the House lectures on constitutional questions, I need not remind the House that generally before the reformed Parliament, which he wishes to reform again, and since the reformed Parliament, whenever any Government has found itself in extreme difficulty—not perhaps in as frequent minorities as the present Government, for in that respect its fortune is peculiar and unprecedented—but whenever any Government has been in frequent and embarrassing minorities, the conduct of the Government has not been to get up in that pettish spirit of which we have had so many instances during the present Session from almost every Member of the Cabinet in the House of Commons, and to taunt us with not bringing forward a Motion or vote of want of confidence in the Government—which I must, in justice, say the noble Lord has never sanctioned, but has in a direct manner disapproved of. But what has been the conduct of the Government in old days? What has been the conduct of the Governments of which the noble Lord during the last twenty years has been, more or less, so distinguished a Member? Why, they have always felt that nothing can be more embarrassing, nothing more inconvenient, nothing more injurious to the Parliamentary constitution of England, than that power should be possessed by men who apparently cannot pass measures and do not possess the confidence of the House of Commons. What, then, have Ministers done? Why, like men of spirit, men who had confidence in their cause and in their standing in the country, who were not squabbling among themselves, and giving up measures like some Administrations of which I have heard—they have gone to some eminent man on their side—such as Lord Ebrington, now Earl Fortescue—and said, "This is intolerable—this is painful—this system of constant minorities—it is painful to us as men of honour; it is much more than that—it is injurious to the Parliamentary constitution of the country—and we call upon you as one of our most distinguished supporters to come forward and test the opinion of the House of Commons, and propose a vote of confidence in the Administration which you uphold and support." Why, Sir, in old days what did the noble Lord do when he was in minorities? He did not get up and make a few observations like those which he has made to-night—for I cannot call it a speech—he did not get up and ask the Chairman to report progress when the conduct of the Government was called in question. No, he went to Lord Ebrington or some other of his supporters, and said, "We will have the question settled at once—it is not for the advantage of the country that this state of things should continue, and we ask you to give a notice in order that we may have the opinion of the House of Commons tested, for we will not be a Government on sufferance?" And that is the course which the noble Lord ought to pursue if he means to have the confidence of the House of Commons proved in the present Government. I would advise him first certainly to consult the Secretary to the Treasury as to whether he has a majority or not. Of course that is a friendly intimation, and he will follow his own discretion. Now, although hon. Gentlemen on these benches do not wish to disturb the present Administration, they consider they have the right of exercising the privilege of opposing measures of which they do not approve. I have said before that I, for one, would never be a Member of an Administration that existed on sufferance. It is not that I depreciate the great sacrifices which right hon. Gentlemen and noble Lords make in the fulfilment of their duty. I think we ought to be very grateful to them for being Members of an Administration on sufferance. I ascribe it entirely to patriotism. What they gave up publicly or privately it is impossible for us to estimate, but I have no doubt we ought all to feel grateful to noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen who endure such multiplied and such continuous mortification. But when we are willing to give the noble Lord credit for patriotism and for no lower feeling, and he and his friends get up and tell us that the confidence of Parliament ought to be tested, I tell him that those who ought to test the confidence of Parliament are Her Majesty's Ministers, and I call upon the noble Lord to do that which he and his predecessors have done before—to ask some of their principal supporters to introduce that question to the House. The noble Lord says that he meets with an opposition which is carried on in a spirit to which he has been unaccustomed. I think that was a most unauthorised observation on the part of the noble Lord. The noble Lord says that Sir Robert Peel did not do this, and that other leaders of Opposition did not do that. I know pretty well the career of Sir Robert Peel in opposition, having sat on the same benches with him for many years, and having read the history of his political career when I was not a Member of Parliament; and I ask the noble Lord to adduce any period when Sir Robert Peel conducted an opposition, when he had to encounter a Ministry which, on the average, was in a minority twice a week? Why, the Opposition is now carried on by other parties. With the exception of the divisions on the University Bill—some of those divisions having been originated by Gentlemen who are habitual, if not avowed, supporters of the Government—every division on which the Government have been placed in a minority have originated with those who formerly sat on their own benches. I, therefore, protest against the opinion which the noble Lord has stated. If he wishes the confidence of the House in the Government to be tested, he is bound to ask one of his supporters to originate a Motion for that purpose. I do not want the opinion of the House of Commons to be tested, or else I would ask the House to express an opinion on the subject. I do not wish to disturb the Government. I admire their powers of sufferance. I am willing, as one of a grateful community, to do justice to their patriotism. Sir, when the Coalition Government was formed, I was asked how long it would last, and I ventured to reply, "Until every Member of it is, as a public character, irretrievably injured."

House resumed; Committee report progress.

STAMP ACTS.

House in Committee; Mr. BOUVERIE in the Chair.

On the first Resolution, increasing the stamp duties on leases,

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to have some explanation of the objects of the proposed changes in the stamp duties. What was the kind of property that the Government intended to affect, and what was the amount of additional revenue which they expected to gain? At present leases were subject to a low stamp duty, and conveyances in fee to a high duty, and he understood that one object of the proposed changes was to equalise these duties. He thought, however, that this should be done by lowering the duties on conveyances in fee rather than by augmenting those on lease; for the result of the latter plan, which was that embodied in the schedule annexed to this Resolution, would be that a heavy duty would be imposed upon that description of property which was the least fitting subject of taxation—the small plots of land sold on building leases.

MR. HADFIELD said, he objected particularly to the proposed schedules of duties on leases, which would injuriously affect a large community in the manufacturing districts—the members of building societies. The schedules of the present Bill were equally absurd and blundering with those of the Stamp Amendment Act of last year. For instance, the duty on a lease of 100 years was to be 3 per cent, and on a lease of 1,000 years was to be 6 per cent, although the value of each was practically the same. Last year the Stamp Duties Bill was so blundered that it was necessary to bring in a Bill to amend it as to counter-parts of conveyances, and another Amendment Bill as to progressive duties. He pressed it upon the Committee whether it was right, after the Chancellor of the Exchequer had abandoned the excessive duties on this class of conveyances, to reimpose such duties? It was unjust to tax long leases heavily in order to relieve chief rents in fee. He should propose an Amendment in conformity with the determination taken on a former occasion, and should divide the Committee against the Resolution.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words “if the term shall not exceed 100 years.”

MR. J. WILSON said, at present the same stamp was applicable to every lease for whatever period it was granted, so that a lease for three years paid the same amount as a lease for 999 years. The stamp upon a lease was equivalent to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent upon the rent. Upon a conveyance it was equivalent to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent upon the value; and, taking the value at twenty-five years' rent, its relation to the stamp upon the lease would be as 25 to 1. It would be $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in one case against $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in the other. There were two kinds of conveyance. One was for money paid down, the other was for a perpetual annuity. These last were very common in the neighbourhood to which the hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Hadfield) belonged. They were taken for the purposes of building; a perpetual rent-charge was reserved; but they were as much conveyances in fee as if the whole purchase money had been paid at once. The hon. Gentleman complained that, although he could take a lease for 999 years, and be taxed only at the rate chargeable upon other leases, he could not take a conveyance in fee to be paid for by an annuity at the same rate. His object, therefore, was to reduce the stamp upon conveyances where the consideration was an annuity, but not where it was a sum of money. The Government made this proposal entirely with a view of meeting an apparent discrepancy in that part of the country to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, but without having any wish or disposition to press it on the Committee. It appeared to them, however, that there was a great difference between a mere occupation lease, which was granted for the purpose of business, and a lease for 999 years, which to all intents and purposes might be called a conveyance in fee, since the reversion was worth nothing. They proposed, therefore, that leases for any period not exceeding thirty-five years should pay the same stamp duty as at present; where the term was more than thirty-five, and less than 100 years, it was proposed to charge 3s. per cent, and where it exceeded 100 years 6s. per cent. The hon. Gentleman wished to adopt the lower part of this scale, and to reject the higher; and having done that, he wished to put conveyances in fee for chief rents upon the same term as leases. The tenure, however, was the same as if the money were paid down; there was the same freehold, the same right of property, and what would the purchaser for money say, if the purchaser for an annuity were placed, in relation to taxation, upon so very different a footing? He believed that the effect of the change upon the revenue would be very slight, but there was more likely to be a trifling loss than any gain.

Sir H. Willoughby

The Committee divided:—Ayes 120; Noes 36: Majority 84.

Original Question put, and agreed to.
 Remaining Resolutions agreed to.
 House resumed.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE, &c.
 BILL.

Order for Committee read; House in Committee.

The clauses having been agreed to,

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he wished to propose a clause of which he had given notice. Under the provision of the Act the Commercial Road was the only one liable to be rated to the poor rate, and that liability having been confirmed by a recent decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, an application had been made to the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the subject, who, however, expressed an opinion that the matter should be dealt with by private Bill; but he (Sir W. Jolliffe) conceived that the only proper way to remedy the grievance complained of was to bring the road under the operation of the General Turnpike Act, and therefore he now asked the Committee to agree to the insertion of the present clause.

MR. WRIGHTSON said, he should support the introduction of the clause, which he believed would have a very useful tendency.

MR. FITZROY said, he must oppose the clause on the grounds that the Committee ought not to decide upon a question of this kind upon a mere ex parte statement, and without hearing the other side.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE consented to withdraw the clause for the present, but would propose it again on the third reading.

Order for Third Reading read.

Bill read 3^d.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he wished to ask whether the Bill was intended to apply to the whole of the kingdom, including the county of Middlesex, as he was anxious that the inhabitants of that county should have the advantage which would be conferred by the measure? He also desired to know whether there would be any objection to insert words empowering the Home Secretary, if he thought fit, to remove juvenile offenders from one reformatory school to another?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, in reply to the last question, said, that it would be no use to insert the words suggested by the noble Lord, as the power of the Home Secretary to remove juvenile offenders was undoubted. The Bill was intended to apply to the whole of the kingdom.

MR. J. O'CONNELL then proposed a clause, providing that the clergy of all denominations should have access to the juvenile offenders during the week, subject to such regulations as the authorities might make, and should be at liberty to perform divine service on Sundays.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must oppose the clause as unnecessary, and as one which, if insisted upon, would cause the Bill to be lost. It was very similar to a clause which was recently expunged from a Bill in the other House.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 23; Noes 69: Majority 46.

Bill passed.

THE GENERAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY* said, that in moving for Returns relating to the Board of Health, he would take the opportunity of replying to certain attacks recently made on the conduct of that Board. It would be irregular on his part to refer more particularly to these attacks; but, for the purpose of making his defence, he must assume that charges had been made against the Board somewhere—no matter where—and by a certain eminent statesman whom he needed not to name. The nature of those charges he thought sufficiently showed that the party who made them must be extremely ignorant or extremely malignant; but when a public board was charged, however undeservedly, with a complete perversion of its duties and functions, he thought it was desirable that it should be defended; more especially when it was a Board of such importance, and engaged in such matters, that no one could deny, if it were well administered, that it must be of the most essential service to the material and physical—and, he might almost add, the moral—well-being of the people. In the speech to which he was referring, there was a distinct assertion that the Board of Health had, by its misconduct, completely checked the progress of sanitary measures in this country, and that it had, by its despotic and overbearing behaviour, disgusted the whole country, and had thus been the cause of the non-progress of those great and beneficial measures so largely required by the physical condition of our people. The first statement was this—“Sanitary measures were introduced, not from the free will of the towns, but forced on them by the despotic interference of the Board of Health.” Now, to that statement he gave the very flattest possible contradiction, and he would show by facts how entirely unfounded it was. The Act had been applied in 182 places; in 168 of these it was applied upon petition from the ratepayers, according to law; in fourteen it was applied after representations from town councils or vestries, based on the excess of mortality, and, though the Act gave the Board power to proceed by virtue of its own authority in towns where the mortality exceeded twenty-three in 1,000, yet in no one instance had that been done, except upon the representation of the town council, or of the public assembled together. Therefore, in no single case had the Act been applied, except upon the desire of the governing body, or of the inhabitants of the place itself, assembled together in some form of public meeting. Since, however, these attacks had appeared, the Board had received many letters, expressive of strong condemnation of them and of the readiness of the writers to refute them from their own experience. For instance, a letter had been received from Lancaster, from which the following was an extract—

“I have been amused with the rabid attack made upon the Board of Health by Lord Seymour and Sir B. Hall. There is a great prejudice, arising, as it does, from ignorance; but sanitary improvement is too important, and the Board of Health have done too much to promote it, to be put down by such wholesale accusations. Speaking for Lancaster, I know we have much reason to be grateful for the ready advice and assistance we have always received from the Board on all occasions.”

He might also quote similar accounts from York, Rugby, Tottenham, and many other places. A letter had been received from the engineer of the local board of health at Preston, where public works were being carried on to a great extent, from which the following was an extract—

“So far as this local board is concerned, I am prepared to give the strongest contradiction to such outcry. The whole of the business of this board with the general Board has, until lately, been carried on by me, and I can fairly state that in all our transactions with them there has not been any attempt at unnecessary interference. The general Board have acted in a fair spirit towards me, and have cordially co-operated in all matters having the sanitary improvement of the borough for its object. I am also glad to say that in the great scheme of sewerage which I had the honour of preparing for this borough, not one single objection has been taken to it by the general Board. On the contrary, it has had their ready assent, and I am progressing with the works in the most satisfactory manner.”

So much for that statement, but next came one rather more important, because it involved a serious charge against the Board, as being determined to thwart the views of the President of the Board, and, in fact, to act in defiance of the Government. But to that statement, also, he gave as flat a contradiction as he had given to the other, and in like manner he would show that it was totally unfounded. These were the words of the charge, and here he must premise that it was made by one who had once held the office of Chief Commissioner of the Board of Works—

“When he was himself at the Board of Works, and after communicating with the other Members of the Government, he had made a communication to the Board of Health as to the course he thought they should adopt; he was told that his proposition was not seconded, that the members of the Board knew nothing of what the Government might wish; they only knew that the proposal was not seconded. Was that the way in which public business was to be conducted?”

Certainly not, he answered; it never was so conducted. He most distinctly and most emphatically denied on his word of honour, that the term “second” or “seconded,” had ever been used on that day or in that discussion, or, indeed, at any one time to his belief, whenever that noble Lord (Lord Seymour) was present. In this he could be borne out by his colleagues, and by the secretary of the Board, who was present. It did so happen, however, that upon the minutes in which the events of that day were recorded, the word “second” did appear, but they were drawn up by the secretary, who had assured him that he had made use of the term, because he was giving a description of what had occurred, but that it had never been made use of in the discussion, either in form or substance. He firmly believed that the thought never occurred to the noble Lord until he had read that word in the recorded minutes. The noble Lord had, in fact, revived a charge which he had made once before against the Board, that it was quite impossible for him to continue to attend at the Board because he was invariably thwarted and opposed by the other members of it. The noble Lord had assumed the other night, that his reason for not attending the meetings of the Board was, that he was perpetually thwarted there and could not carry his own views into effect; but he could assert most solemnly that, when he waited on the noble Lord, immediately on his assuming office, the noble Lord told him that he should never be able to attend to the meetings of the Board, because he should have so very much to do in his own office, and the noble Lord was also good enough to add a compliment, to the effect that he had no fear of anything going wrong, having sufficient confidence in his (the Earl of Shaftesbury's) discretion. Shortly after that, too, the noble Lord told him, that his rule of business was never to do anything that he was not absolutely compelled to do. Now, when the noble Lord had thus forewarned him of his intention not to attend the Board, it certainly was not unnaturally a great surprise to him to learn, that the noble Lord had said that he had stayed away, because of the opposition which he anticipated; but, on the first day that the noble Lord attended the Board, on the sixth day after he took office, no opposition was offered to him, for he merely took his seat; but, to show how completely he carried his pre-determination of non-attendance into effect, between his first appearance and his second, he allowed sixty-eight boards to elapse; and after his second appearance, he allowed five boards to elapse before he attended again, and then his stay was very short. Between his third and fourth appearance there were ten boards; but between his fourth and his fifth appearance he allowed no less than ninety-four boards to elapse, making, in 183 boards, five attendances. On this fifth attendance the noble Lord certainly did make a proposition, to which he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) ventured humbly to take exception, because the proposal was utterly impracticable, and even hazardous. He told the noble Lord so, and the matter was discussed, and it fell to the ground, simply because it was impracticable, and of that the best proof was, that afterwards, when the whole question was referred to the Treasury, they decided against it, and confirmed the reasons on which it had been opposed. He begged their Lordships would note the fact, that he had opposed the noble Lord's proposition, because, throughout all the famous speech to which he was referring, it was represented that his two colleagues, Dr. Southwood Smith and Mr. Chadwick, were the only parties present and the only parties who raised any opposition; but he believed the only opposition that ever was raised was on this day, the noble Lord's fifth attendance, and then the objection was raised by him (the Earl of Shaftesbury). At no one time, he believed, either before or after, was there any objection raised, either by him, or by either of his two colleagues. After his fifth attendance, on which this event took place, there was another interval, he believed, of ninety-seven boards, before the noble Lord attended again, and then forty-three more before he attended again for the seventh and last time. After that, before the noble Lord retired from office there were 118 boards which he never attended. And yet the noble Lord now stated that his reason for absenting himself from the Board was the opposition he met with, after he had previously stated to him (the Earl of Shaftesbury) and to others besides, whom he could produce in testimony, that he did not intend to be present because he was so occupied with the business of his own office, and even after he had used language to the same effect in a letter to him in January, 1851, in which he said—

"As it is not in my power to attend the meetings of the Board of Health without the neglect of my duties here, I have to request that you will furnish me with copies of all minutes," &c.

There was another charge also brought forward by the noble Lord, in which he insinuated that there had been tampering with the Board of Health; that there was an understanding existing between the Board of Health and the local boards, and that the inspector first of all brought in the Board, and then the Board brought in the inspector. To this charge he could give the most positive and emphatic contradiction, and at the same time he felt bound to say that, if the noble Lord really believed it was true, the subject ought to have been inquired into long since, and the charge ought to be brought forward now by those who had the means of preferring a public accusation. It was, in fact, nothing less than a charge of corruption against the Board of Health, and the noble Lord was bound by every obligation of honour, and as a gentleman, to substantiate it if he could. After having made these charges, the noble Lord concluded by saying—and it should be remembered that the noble Lord was speaking of his former colleagues—that the only way to bring the members of the Board of Health to reason was to stop their salary. He would ask their Lordships, or any body of gentlemen, whether this was becoming language to publicly make use of in reference to the conduct of persons who were absent, and who, therefore, could not defend themselves or answer the charges that were brought against them in the same public way that they were made? The noble Lord had, no doubt, to the advantage of the country, himself received a salary; but would he not have deeply resented the imputation, if any one had said of him that salary was his sole object, and the threatened removal of it the only way by which he could be urged to perform the duties that were imposed upon him? He felt bound to say, in reference to the two gentlemen who were the subject of attack, and with whom he had had the pleasure to act for four years, and to participate in all their measures, that he had never met with more diligent, zealous, and efficient men of business, and men who were more anxious to effect all the good they were able to do. He did know what the feelings of the noble Lord might be on the subject, but this he did know—that if his two friends, Mr. Chadwick and Dr. Smith, had said so dirty a thing against the noble Lord or any one else, they would, in their sober moments, most deeply have regretted having done so. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

“That there be laid before this House, Return of the Number and Description of Petitions from Local Boards of Health against the Continuance of the General Board of Health: And also, Return of the Number and Description of Petitions for the Application of the Public Health Act, and also of any Petitions or Memorials or other Forms of Applications for the Extension of the Jurisdiction of the General Board, or for the Exercise of increased Powers for the Protection of the Public Health.”

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that the noble Earl who had just spoken had very properly observed that the question at issue was the conduct of the Board of Health; and therefore, to a certain extent, the charges which had been made must materially affect the character of those who appointed the gentlemen who constituted that Board. He considered, however, that if the Board of Health had not succeeded in carrying into effect the great sanitary reforms which were anticipated by the public, their not having done so was no fault of the Board of Health, but of the Government, who had neglected to assist them in the way that ought to have been done. If the Board of Health had not been thwarted by the Government, or rather by those officers of the Government whose duty it was to watch over the Board of Health, and, if necessary, to control, but more generally to encourage their proceedings, the public would by this time have had good water, and that at a price so trivial as scarcely to be worth consideration. He was perfectly persuaded, also, that if the proposals of the Board of Health had not been opposed by those in power, the burial question would by this time have been settled, with infinite advantage to the population of the metropolis, and without injustice to the interests of individuals: but, no—the Board of Health were here impeded more than even on the former question, and a combination of the shareholders in different cemetery companies had sufficient influence with those in authority to prevent the Board of Health effecting the improvements which they contemplated and desired. As to the members who composed the Board of Health—Lord Shaftesbury, Mr. Edwin Chadwick, and Dr. Southwood Smith, and who had been personally attacked—their names had been connected with every project for the improvement of the condition of the poorer classes of this country. It was, of course, unnecessary to say one word in favour of the noble Earl, whose many acts of charity for the physical and moral improvement of the labouring classes were so well known; but, on the other two gentlemen, perhaps he might be allowed to make a few remarks. Mr. Chadwick he had known for thirty years, and he could say that a more efficient, active, diligent, and honest servant of the public never existed. This was sufficiently proved by his conduct as secretary to the Poor Law Commission. It was to his knowledge and exertions, and to those of Mr. Nichols, that we were mainly indebted for the amendment of the Poor Law. After faithfully discharging his duties as secretary to the Commission, Mr. Chadwick turned his attention to sanitary matters, on which he had displayed an extraordinary amount of knowledge. It was his (the Bishop of London's) opinion, that if the suggestions of Mr. Chadwick and Dr. Southwood Smith had been carried out, we should not now have had to dread, at least to the same extent, the return of the cholera. At the root of Mr. Chadwick's knowledge there was an amount of benevolent interest for the poor, which would prevent his sanctioning any measure which would inflict hardship on the poorest of his fellow-creatures. Dr. Southwood Smith had for many years been known to him (the Bishop of London) as a very benevolent man. Dr. Southwood Smith had laboured very much in the metropolis in visiting the sick poor, and had had extensive opportunities of becoming acquainted with the subject while physician to the Fever Hospital. He had applied the knowledge which he had thus acquired to sanitary improvements, and if there was one man more qualified than another to be a member of the Board of Health, it was Dr. Southwood Smith. No man was more fully actuated by the principles of true benevolence, or more likely to apply his knowledge to the carrying out of the great purposes for which the Board of Health was constituted. That Board had been placed in a position of the greatest difficulty from the want of proper encouragement on the part of those whose duty it was to render it every assistance. He was happy from his personal knowledge to be able, and he felt it his duty to rise and to bear testimony to the merits of both Mr. Chadwick and Dr. Southwood Smith; and he trusted the Government would uphold those gentlemen in the difficult position which they occupied, and that they would long continue to be, as they had hitherto been, worthy colleagues of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE said, that neither in generosity nor justice to the gentlemen whose names had been brought under the notice of their Lordships could he allow the discussion to close in total silence on his part. He had had the honour of being associated with his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Shaftesbury), and with Mr. Chadwick and Dr. Southwood Smith, in the first organised attempt to improve the public health of the country, and he could bear testimony to the difficulties which beset them in the prosecution of their arduous labours. Against his noble Friend no imputation whatever could be made—the estimate which the public had formed of his character and services ought to have shielded him from the attacks to which he had been subjected. In respect of Mr. Chadwick and Dr. Southwood Smith, the case was not so fortunate, inasmuch as those gentlemen had not the same opportunity as his noble Friend of making their defence as public as the attack. After what had passed he felt bound to say thus much, that he quite agreed with the right rev. Prelate in the opinion which he had expressed respecting the two measures of our time which seemed to him beyond any others to have affected the internal condition of the great body of the people—the amendment of the Poor Law and sanitary reform; and he sincerely believed that the most efficient agent in originating and in producing those two great fundamental measures, and in clearing away a host of obstacles which beset their early birth, was Mr. Chadwick; and to one or other of these measures he had ever since devoted his time, his health, and his strength. It might undoubtedly be true—to say nothing of the multiform actual hostilities which every large measure of amendment was sure to stir up and exasperate—it might be true that, on taking up any great question or idea with enthusiasm, a certain portion of positiveness and precipitation might be mixed up with it more than was desirable; but he trusted that our contemporaries would not refuse to those who had established great principles and introduced large measures, some portion of that gratitude and honour which were certain to be awarded to them by an intelligent posterity. In respect to Dr. Southwood Smith, he owned he felt still greater difficulty to account for the attack referred to; for that gentleman had always seemed to him to combine with very meritorious services the most unobtrusive and inoffensive spirit with which he had ever come in contact, and which alone ought to have disarmed all angry censure. His professional experience, which he had acquired during a practice of more than twenty years in the wards of the London Fever Hospital—acquired too at the risk of his own life, for he had been attacked by fever no less than three times—the experience which he had thus acquired had been brought to the aid of the public at large, to protect them from those dangers which had been proved to be as extensive as they were direful. His knowledge had been most valuable in the drawing up the Quarantine Reports, and during the prevalence of cholera he directed his attention peculiarly to premonitory symptoms and house-to-house visitation. These were some of the benefits which Dr. Southwood Smith had conferred on the public at large; and he would express a hope with regard to both his distinguished friends, that to whatever obloquy they might find themselves for a moment exposed, the consciousness of the good they had done, of the evil they had prevented, of the lives which, under God, they had been privileged to save, would be to them a sufficient consolation.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that his noble Friends who had already spoken had only done an act of strict justice in bearing their testimony to the merits of the individuals whom they had so ably defended. He well remembered the services—the invaluable services—of Mr. Edwin Chadwick, both with regard to the Poor Law Commission and the inquiry into the state of the poor and the Poor Law; and he could most distinctly state that to Mr. Nicholl and Mr. Chadwick were mainly due the success both of the inquiry and of the great measure which grew out of it. How far the country had benefited by their labours, he need only remind their Lordships by stating the simple fact of the difference in the poor law expenditure at the present time as compared with the year 1813 and the year 1834, when the Bill passed. When compared with the year 1813, regard being had to the relative population of the country at the two periods—the expenditure during the last year would, at the rate of 1813, have been 11,746,000*l.*, whereas it actually fell short of 5,000,000*l.*, being 4,939,000*l.* But that result of the change, easy for the purpose of comparison, was the least important, compared with the benefits which had been conferred on the poor, whose condition had been so greatly improved, and was likely to continue to improve.

NEW ZEALAND.

LORD LYTTTELTON* then rose to move for “certain papers relating to New Zealand;” and to call the attention of the House to the proceedings of the Governor of New Zealand in giving effect to the Act for granting a representative constitution to that Colony. The subject had already been discussed in the other House of Parliament, and as he considered the defence of the conduct of the Governor quite unsatisfactory, he felt bound, in deference to the wishes of many of the colonists, to bring the matter under the notice of their Lordships. He admitted that in many respects Sir George Grey had shown himself not only an able but a good and successful Governor. He had been so financially beyond all question. He had maintained peace, discipline, and order—and although there had been some exaggeration in this respect on the part of his admirers, he was willing to admit that he had dealt successfully with the native population. But he had shown himself unfitted for the introduction of a constitutional system for the English people, and it was much to be regretted that the inauguration of that system had been intrusted to his hands. The noble Duke was aware that there were many complaints against the Governor of New Zealand; but on the present occasion he proposed to confine his remarks to the proceedings of Sir George Grey under the Constitution Act of New Zealand, chiefly as to his mode of dealing with the waste lands of the Colony, and his delay in summoning the General Assembly. It had been said that it was not likely Sir George Grey could have mismanaged affairs under the Act, when he himself had framed and suggested it. That statement was inaccurate; but even if accurate it would not be relevant. It was not correct to say that the measure suggested by Sir George Grey was substantially in all respects the same as the Act which passed. Sir George Grey proposed that the Legislative Councils should be formed on the old model, and that one-third should be nominated by the Crown. He did not propose to give the colonists the control over their own land—he did not propose to give the colonists the power to vary their own constitution, nor to vary the sums paid under the civil list. He (Lord Lyttelton), however, did not dwell upon this, because, in any case, it would only show, assuming that mismanagement could be proved, inconsistency between the professions and the acts of the Governor. Now he had always felt that the late Government, whatever their other merits and demerits, was entitled to lasting gratitude from all persons interested in colonial affairs, for the Constitutional Act of New Zealand. Well, “corruptio optimi pessima ;” and the more welcome and the more suitable was that great gift to the colonists, the worse was the case that it should have been marred and embittered in the giving. He said “welcome and suitable," and he dwelt more on the latter than the former; for the question was, not what the colonists wished for, but what duties they ought to be required to perform. He did not doubt that the acts of Sir George Grey were acceptable to many persons in the Colony. They were acceptable not only to all the land sharks and speculators in the community, but to those who entertained a strong opinion as to the necessity of a reduction in the price of land, and who, provided they could obtain what they required, cared very little about the means employed for that purpose. The question for the consideration of their Lordships was, what were the intentions of Parliament on the subjects to which he was now directing their attention? He would first take the price of land. The distinguishing feature of the constitution of New Zealand was that Parliament conceded to the colonists the control over their waste lands; and considering the circumstances of the case, he admitted that to have been a wise and a just concession. The concession was made to the colonists themselves, in their own constitutional assembly. The complaint against Sir George Grey was, that upon that great concession being notified in the Colony, he took upon himself to exercise that great authority, given not to him, but to the colonists; that he issued, almost immediately, a proclamation on his own authority, making the most sweeping changes in the whole system of the price of waste land, lowering the price one-half in some cases, and three-fourths in other cases. He did not wish to dwell further on the detail, but to direct the attention of their Lordships to the principle. No doubt Sir George Grey might have done worse, for he might in strict law have followed the example of his predecessor, and brought down the price of land to a penny per acre. Now, what was the justification offered for Sir George Grey? There were two clauses in the Constitution Act of New Zealand bearing on this point. One of them gave power to the General Assembly to make laws for regulating the sale and disposal of waste lands, providing that, until the Assembly should otherwise enact, it should be lawful for Her Majesty to regulate such sale by instructions issued under the royal sign manual. The justification of the Governor was founded on a subsequent clause, which provided that it should be lawful for Her Majesty, by letters patent or signified through one of the principal Secretaries of State, to delegate to the Governor any of the powers reserved to Her Majesty respecting the regulation and sale of waste lands; and the case of the Governor, founded on the clause, was contained in the preamble of his proclamation, stating that such power had been "delegated to the Governor by instructions received from Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Colonies." Now, the question was whether these words were literally correct or not. So far as we were informed they were not even literally correct, for no such instructions were to be found. Certainly he was almost compelled to believe that such instructions had been issued, because he had been told so by the highest authority, and therefore he had moved for them; but he was bound to say that he suspected there was some confusion of memory on the subject, and that what was really referred to was a document which did appear, and which did not by any means bear out the conclusions founded upon it. Two despatches were written by Sir J. Pakington shortly after the passing of the Act, the first of them dated the 16th July, the second dated the 21st July, 1852. The latter despatch informed the Governor that he had the power to deal with the price of these lands, but stated that it was by virtue of the despatch of the 16th of July. Now, that despatch contained no such power. He found, too, from a statement in a colonial newspaper, that the civil secretary at Wellington stated that no such instructions had been received since 1850; and he presumed that no one would argue that either a general transmission of an Act providing for the conveyance of such a power, or an erroneous reference in a subsequent despatch, as if such a power had been given, would be enough for the purpose. Nevertheless, he would assume that such instructions had been given; but he denied that they could go beyond the powers of the Act itself, and he contended that it did not give the Governor the power of dealing with the price of waste lands. The first clause of the Act conferred an unreserved power on the Assembly to make laws for regulating the sale of waste lands, but the power which it conferred on the Crown was to regulate them by instructions under the royal sign manual, that is, according to the existing law; and the reduction of price was in direct contravention of the Act of 1851. It was not a simple delegation of power, but the powers were to be delegated or issued under the Royal sign manual. The instructions which he wished to see were the instructions so issued. There was a strong presumption that the powers were not so conferred, because in the papers on the table it would be found that Sir John Pakington did delegate the power of dealing with the land in Canterbury without any instructions under the sign manual. Next, if it was allowed that the Governor had an unlimited discretion to deal with the price of land, he contended that what he did was a gross abuse of that discretion. He could conceive the possibility of cases in which it might have been expedient to give the Governor an unlimited discretion in dealing with waste land. There might be cases of individual hardship and peculiar dealings with the natives which might make the use of such an authority desirable; but any such power ought to be exercised with the greatest jealousy and care, and only in exceptional cases, instead of universally. There were also grave faults of detail in the proclamation, such faults as that of throwing open, contrary to established rule, great masses of land without any survey, of placing an uniform price on land in settlements of most various circumstances—the necessary instability of an arrangement which must needs soon come to be reviewed and perhaps reversed by the Assembly, and the absence of any proper provision for priority of choice in the selection of land. He would now pass to another point, and state a fact which would startle those persons who took an interest in the subject. The view which he had taken was taken also in the Colony, and was submitted as a strict point of law to the Supreme Court. That Court twice over, after deliberate argument, decided that the proclamation was illegal, and a solemn injunction was issued by the Court declaring that illegality, and restraining all parties from acting on the proclamation; but the Governor took no more notice of that injunction than if it had been mere waste paper, and the Supreme Court an entire nullity. What would have been the course followed by the Court of Queen's Bench in this country under its present or still more its late head, if its injunction had been dealt with in such a manner? The persons disobeying it would have been committed. Assuredly there was no danger of any such proceeding being taken in New Zealand. From the system that had been pursued in our Colonies, they were in many of these respects some one hundred years behind this country. It was just 100 years since, in this country, the Crown had been put on that great reform in our constitutional system, the judicial independence of our tribunals. Such was not the case in any colony, and a judge was there liable to be suspended and his salary stopped by the executive authority. The answers which had been given to the charge were so strange as to be almost unintelligible. Some persons had even questioned the issuing of such an injunction; he could only say that the fact was quite notorious. It had also been said that the Governor was not aware of the existence of such an injunction. Such an excuse could in no case be admitted, for the Governor was bound to know of the proceedings of his own Supreme Court. But besides this, in the blue book it would be seen that the Governor himself sent home copies of letters, distinctly informing him that the injunction had been issued. Another defence set up was, that Chief Justice Martin had reviewed and reversed the decision; but that was both untrue and impossible, for he had no such power of reviewal nor reversal. Then, again, it was said that the Governor received information that the injunction was not to be prosecuted by its promoters; but that was a bitter mockery, for if so it was because the Court was too weak to act upon its authority. But it was beside the question, for the fact that the opinion of the Court had been pronounced was alone material. Assuming, next, that the Governor had acted perfectly right, that he felt it his duty to take into his own hands the power which was given as a permanent authority to the colonists, could there be a stronger argument for his calling into existence, at as early a period as possible, the General Assembly, on whom the power of dealing with land had been conferred? The Act arrived in the Colony on the 22nd of December, 1852. The Governor, who was intrusted with the power of carrying it into operation, left the Colony about the 6th of January, 1854, and the General Assembly met, or was to meet, on May 24th last. This delay was enormous and excessive, and could not possibly be justified. In answer to that charge, it was said that the Governor had used all possible expedition, and that it was not possible to call the Assembly together earlier. He did not desire to impute wilful misrepresentation to any one, but as to this alleged fact of a physical impossibility, he must say, credat Judæus. Such an excuse never could have been made in the Colony; neither the Governor nor any of his officials ever hinted at any such difficulty or impossibility; nor had any friend or opponent conjectured it. Addresses from the councils of Wellington and Nelson—one of them, at least, drawn in a spirit friendly to the Governor—said they could not conceive any reason for the delay. He had recently seen a colonist, just arrived from New Zealand, who told him such a plea was never set up in the Colony, and if it had it would utterly have been scouted; and lastly, he had the evidence of the Governor himself. He himself said, in December, 1852, and again in February, 1853, that the Assembly could meet on the 30th of September, 1853; but he made it impossible by his own acts. He took nearly the full time before he proclaimed the Act—he took the full time to the last minute before he caused the writs to be issued for the return of the Members to the Legislative Assembly—and he did not name any time at which the writs were to be returned. In his own former ordinance he had specified sixty days for the northern province, ninety days for the southern, as the utmost time needed for the return of the writs. The returning officers were his own servants, and he should have required the returns by a certain day. It was then said, that the Governor was unable to convene the General Assembly until the writs had been returned. But there was no such proviso in the Act. And the same ships that brought back the writs might have brought the Members also; so that the Assembly might have met as soon as the writs had been returned. It was said, further, that he could not issue the writs until he knew who the electors were to be. But why was it necessary that the electors should be known before the writs were issued, and their return in due course called for? It was said, also, that the Governor had so much to do under the Act that it was impossible for him to proceed with greater despatch than he had done. With respect to this, he must say that he did not think the friends of Sir G. Grey acted very wisely in calling attention to his proceedings under the ordinance for the establishment of provincial councils; for, although it was quite true that in some important respects the two Acts were very different, in many minor points they were precisely the same; and provisions had been made with respect to electoral districts, to the qualifications of electors, to polling places, and to other matters of detail, a year or two before the Governor was called upon to put this Act into operation. He had, therefore, nothing to do but to reprint what was ready to his hand. There were one or two consequences of this delay to which he would call the attention of the House. It had caused an entirely illegal appropriation during several months of the revenue of New Zealand. The Governor had said before that he saw no difficulty whatever in the General Assembly being called together by the 30th of September; and, accordingly, under the provisions of the old constitution, he had caused an appropriation ordinance to be passed, which expired upon that day. After that time, from the 30th of September until May, there was no legal authority in the Colony for the appropriation of the public money. It was said that that was an unfortunate dilemma—that it was the fault of the Act of Parliament, which only enabled the General Assembly to deal with the revenue raised by itself. But it was not the habit of the Parliament of England to leave important matters of that kind to the chances of an unfortunate dilemma, and if there was a difficulty in convening the General Assembly at the time which had been named for its meeting, there was at all events a power of calling the old council together, to which the power in such a case was distinctly continued in the Act. It was said that he acted in the spirit of the Act; but there was no difficulty in acting both in its spirit and its letter. The Governor appropriated two-thirds of the revenue to the provincial councils and one-third to general purposes; but that was according to his sole judgment, whereas it was a matter reserved for the General Assembly. The Act provided that the General Assembly should take whatever portion of the revenue it required, and should give the surplus to the provincial councils. By such proceedings as these the proceedings of Parliament had been set at naught. But let their Lordships observe the effect on the provincial councils. It had almost compelled them—at all events had strongly tempted them—to become participators in this illegal appropriation of the revenue of the Colony. Some of them had yielded to the temptation, while others, refusing to receive what the Governor had given, had been obliged to raise a revenue themselves within their own limits, contrary, no doubt, to the general intention of the Act of Parliament, but in the exercise of their general legislative powers; and in an inevitable choice of difficulties. It was a cruel addition to their ordinary duties to impose upon them a responsibility of this kind. But another effect of the delay was obviously to cripple these provincial assemblies in dealing with their own resources. Their Lordships were aware that in this Act, as in all similar Acts, several important matters were reserved to the General Assembly, and the provincial councils were forbidden to deal with them. Still, although they were forbidden to deal with them, they were matters of great importance as affecting the interests of the provinces, who naturally looked to the General Assembly to know to what extent they were to have power to deal with those subjects, or what the General Assembly would do for them. He need only enumerate some of the questions to which he was referring. They included, among other things, the regulation of the post office, the law of bankruptcy, the regulation of marriages, and, above all, the dealing with waste lands. Now, how could the provincial councils properly discharge the important functions which devolved upon them until they knew whether or how far they were to have power over their own resources—over the waste lands within their own limits? Yet the provincial councils had not known—and for aught he knew they did not know to this day—whether they were to have this power or no. So much for the Governor's proceedings with respect to the representative part of the General Assembly; but, besides that, he was called upon by Sir John Pakington to proceed without delay to the selection of the nominee part of that Assembly; and instead of obeying those instructions, he had not selected them at all. He believed the only answer upon this point was, that he had waited to see what Members would be elected; but this was no answer, for the proper course for the Governor to have pursued would have been to have at once selected those whom he thought most fitting to be nominated; and if they had subsequently been elected also, they must have done what was always done in the case of a double election in England, and have made their own choice as to the character in which they would serve. He had moved for a paper upon another subject, which was not of so great importance, but which still he was anxious to see. It concerned the leave of absence given to the Governor;

for he (Lord Lyttelton) would not believe, until he saw it, that it was ever intended he should leave the Colony, until the General Assembly had been called together, and he had seen the constitution in operation. In spite of all this, Sir George Grey had been rewarded and promoted; but, notwithstanding his reward and promotion, he could hardly think the noble Duke would defend him with respect to the conduct to which he had referred. It was a right principle to uphold and defend as far as possible the colonial Governors, but there were things which were more important still—the rights and interests of the colonists, obedience to Parliament, and respect for the law. He well knew the immeasurable insignificance in which such subjects appeared at home, and if these matters of which he had been speaking were matters which should properly be left to the colonists themselves, he should be very glad if the people of this country cared even less for them than they did. But when political franchises were given, as in the case of New Zealand, some time after a Colony had been established, they must needs be given definitely and exactly through the supreme executive authority in the Colony, acting in behalf of the Crown; and the matter was one which ought, above all others, to be carefully watched at home. He knew how hopeless it was that this should be the case now; but he thought it might be a satisfaction to the colonists of New Zealand that one voice at least in that place—and that voice one to which from circumstances they had perhaps some reason to look—should be raised against proceedings he really believed as arbitrary and indefensible as had ever been brought under the notice of Parliament. The noble Lord concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for Copies of any Instructions not already laid before Parliament from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand, with reference to the Regulation of the Price of Waste Lands during the Time previous to the first Meeting of the General Assembly of the Colony: And also, a Copy of the Letter from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand giving him leave of absence.”

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: My Lords, I most sincerely deplore the present state of this House; for I cannot but feel that not only is it difficult in addressing a House, with such an attendance as the present, to enter at that length into the answer to my noble Friend which I feel is due to the gentleman who has been attacked; but I regret it, also, because I do think that when the character of an eminent man, and one who has rendered great public service, is attacked, it would be desirable for his sake, and for the sake of the public, that a greater number of your Lordships should be present, and should hear both the attack and the defence. My Lords, my noble Friend began his statement by saying that he had many causes of complaint against Sir George Grey, but that he would confine himself to only two or three. Now, though undoubtedly it may seem inconsistent with what I have just said as to the state of the House, nevertheless, I cannot help deploring that my noble Friend did not mention in detail the whole of the causes of complaint which he feels to exist against the late Governor of New Zealand, because undoubtedly it is not altogether fair—I am sure my noble Friend did not intend to act unfairly—but it is not quite fair that, in attacking the character of a public servant, he should begin that attack by stating that there are many causes of complaint, and yet only enumerate a few of them;—for the public, being left in the dark as to what those other causes of complaint are, may be led to believe that they are of a very important and serious character; whereas I am myself inclined to think that my noble Friend has not brought them forward to-night because he has himself, by subsequent events, become convinced of the exceedingly trivial and insignificant character of those complaints, and feels that they are not worthy to be laid before your Lordships' House. I can only say I have attended carefully to those other causes of complaint as I have heard them, or as they have been laid before the other House of Parliament, and I came down here this evening fully prepared to meet every one of them if my noble Friend had brought them forward: at the same time, it would undoubtedly be unbecoming in me to enter upon any answer to attacks which have not been made here, and which, therefore, I am not called upon and should not be justified in entering on. But my noble Friend proceeded to concentrate his attack principally under two heads, branching collaterally into one or two matters of detail, to which I will call the attention of your Lordships by and by. These were—the conduct of the Governor in reducing the price of the waste lands, and the delay in bringing the constitution into operation. Now, my Lords, my noble Friend said that this great boon of a constitution to New Zealand had been impaired and embittered by the way in which it had been given by Sir George Grey. These are undoubtedly strong words, and I think they require more startling facts, even if these facts could be substantiated, than my noble Friend brought forward to justify them. But I hope I shall be able to show your Lordships that those statements of my noble Friend cannot be substantiated, and I will take, first, the price of the waste lands, as that was the first in order in my noble Friend's speech.

My noble Friend says that this reduction of the price of land by the Governor was at variance with his duty and with all sound principle, and that he thought he might just as well have reduced the price of land to one penny an acre, as was done by the gentleman whom he succeeded in the Government—[Lord LYTTELTON: I said as regarded the strict legality of the act.] My noble Friend says now as regards the strict legality of the act. I shall come to that question presently; but I certainly misunderstood him; for I thought he was referring to the policy as well as to the legality of the transaction. However, I will first take the legality of this proceeding; and I must remind my noble Friend, when he throws this great doubt on the legality of the conduct of the Governor, that he was one with a great number of other gentlemen who did me the honour of waiting upon me at the Colonial Office some time ago to remonstrate against this and other acts of Sir George Grey. At that time the despatches had not been received from New Zealand, and, therefore, I was not in possession of that full information on this subject which I possess now. My noble Friend stated upon that occasion, that the deputation which came with him to make that remonstrance had differed most widely upon all other subjects up to that moment—[Lord LYTTELTON: That shows how bad the case was.] My noble Friend says now, that shows how bad the case was, but I am not by any means sure of that. It is capable of two different constructions. It may mean that gentlemen who have been thwarted by the Governor, combining together to attack him, have agreed to sink their differences for the time for the purpose of promoting their own views, and of thwarting his. But my noble Friend said that this proceeding of the Governor in reference to the waste lands was an illegal act, both as contrary to the Constitutional Act, and as not being justified by the instructions which were given to the Governor by the Secretary of State. I at that time expressed extreme astonishment at this statement; but it was followed by another still more astonishing—that the deputation came with the authority of Sir John Pakington, who had been Secretary of State at the time when these proceedings had taken place, and who informed them that it had never been intended that any such act should be done by the Governor, and that no such instructions had been issued. I expressed astonishment at these statements, because there was an express clause in the Constitutional Act empowering the Secretary of State to give certain instructions to the Governor, and because I had seen, in my own office, a despatch from Sir John Pakington, giving to Sir George Grey the instructions which the Constitutional Act enabled him to give, for the purpose of carrying out this very power in reference to waste lands. My noble Friend says that at that time he made a mistake. Well, then, if my noble Friend made a mistake then, how is it that he comes down now, and, after admitting that it was a mistake, assures your Lordships that the Governor had no such powers granted him, and that he acted illegally? If he made a mistake then in telling me that no such powers had been granted, why does he repeat that statement now? [Lord LYTTELTON made an observation which was inaudible.] He stated then, that no such instructions had been given; he now states that there was no power given by the Act to issue them. My noble Friend may be a very good lawyer—but a lawyer drew this Bill; he was instructed so to draw it as to give such powers; he believed that he had given them; others, who have examined the Bill since, believe that it gives those powers; and with all respect for the opinion of my noble Friend, I am entitled to attach greater weight to the opinion of the lawyer who drew and of those lawyers who have since examined it, when they say that those powers are contained in it. This, at all events, I can positively say—that it was intended by the Government to give those powers, and that instructions, in accordance with those powers, were issued by Sir John Pakington. Well, so far as regards the legality of this transaction. Of course there remains another consideration. If it was legal, was it politic or wise? My noble Friend proceeded to say that even if the legality of the conduct of Sir George Grey could be substantiated, he considered this one of the grossest abuses of discretion which any Governor had ever exercised. Now, I must say, from what has passed this evening, and from what I have heard elsewhere, that I believe my noble Friend was entirely ignorant of the circumstances under which this power was exercised. At the time when the instructions reached the Colony there was a uniform price of 1*l.* per acre upon all lands. And Sir George Grey had to consider what would be the effect of leaving the price of waste lands to be dealt with by the General Assembly. The whole power over waste lands having been conferred upon the General Assembly by the Constitutional Act when they met, he had to consider what it might be necessary for him to do in order to guard against the inconveniences which might possibly arise out of the exercise of that power. If this had been a case in which the Governor had proceeded to act in reference to these lands before the General Assembly met, for the purpose of depriving that Assembly of the power and privilege of dealing with them, I should have thought—and I so stated to my noble Friend when he called upon me—that there had been an improper exercise of discretion. But such was not the case. How, then, did the matter really stand? With respect to land then in possession of the Crown, with which the Assembly would have had the right to deal, it was of a very limited character indeed. The powers of the Assembly, therefore, with respect to waste lands, would have been of a most minute description. But there was another class of lands, over which the natives held rights, pertaining to them, not as individuals, but as tribes, which would have been a fertile source of discord between the English colonists and the natives. The natives had always, heretofore, refused to part with those privileges and rights except to a very limited extent, for various reasons, which I shall come to by and by. But I wish, first of all, to point out the position of the English colonists, and the state of opinion among them. There had been two parties among the colonists, holding, upon the land question, very different views. There was one party who held the opinion—which I must say appeared to me most just—that we had only a right to such lands as we could obtain from the natives by purchase. There was another party which maintained that the Crown had a right, by virtue of its prerogative, to all lands to which no counter right could be substantiated by the natives. Your Lordships will see that such a proposition involved very dangerous questions, supposing it came to be disputed in the General Assembly; and it was under such circumstance that Sir George Grey, who had acquired an influence and a power over the natives which no English Governor had ever before possessed, employed that influence successfully in inducing them to do what I am confident, and I defy my noble Friend to dispute it, no other Governor could have persuaded them to do—he induced the natives having rights over a vast tract of land to abandon those rights which they had exercised, to turn over the whole for a very insignificant sum, and to expend the money which they so received in the purchase of so much of the land as they desired for their individual purposes. Thus by this means a most important part of the colony of New Zealand—the middle island—was almost entirely cleared of the rights of the tribes, and except those small portions which were purchased by the natives as individuals, the whole of the middle island became vested in the Crown—and it devolved on the General Assembly to deal with it. So far, therefore, from depriving the General Assembly of any rights or privileges which they would have possessed over the waste lands of the Colony under the powers of the Constitutional Act, he has not only handed over to that body the small district which then belonged to the Crown, but he has handed over with it the whole of the middle island, cleared of those rights and privileges which had been previously exercised by the tribes. The benefit, therefore, is far greater than it would have been if Sir George Grey had failed to act as he had done. But then, my noble Friend asks, why was it necessary, in order to carry out this arrangement, that he should lower the price of land? My answer is, that if my noble Friend had watched these matters more narrowly, he would have known that one reason why the natives had so obstinately persisted in refusing to dispose of their land at all, was the high price at which it was retailed to the colonists, and the immense advantages which were supposed to accrue to those who purchased it and then resold it to others. I dare say my noble Friend will say that the advantages at 10*s.* per acre were so enormous that 1*l.* per acre, although double, will not affect the question. That may be so to our judgment, but we cannot deal with the native intellect or with native prejudices as we would do with Europeans; and in transactions with native tribes, whatever their whims and fancies, we must humour them to a certain extent—we must deal with them as we find them. There is no doubt they had refused to sell the lands up to that time, and there is no doubt that they did sell them at the time to which I have referred; and coupling these facts together, with another to which I have before alluded—that no other man than Sir George Grey could have accomplished this object—I say that, instead of blame, he deserves the thanks of the colonists. But my noble Friend said—and it did astonish me very much—that he could not conceive how the Governor could deal, upon one uniform plan, with all waste lands of the colony, considering the very different circumstances in which the settlements are placed. He did not deal with them upon one uniform plan. He did not reduce the price where he had reason to believe, from what had passed before, that such a proceeding might be detrimental to the interests of the settlement; and in that particular part of the Colony in which my noble Friend is more particularly interested—the settlement of Canterbury—he never attempted to introduce it in any way whatever; on the contrary, the proclamation which was issued expressly exempted Canterbury from its operation. Why, then, does my noble Friend say that Sir George Grey attempted to introduce a uniform system in the Colony when the proclamation shows he did nothing of the kind? But even if he had, he would only have been substituting a uniform price of 10*s.* per acre for what was before a uniform price of 20*s.* Well, now, my noble Friend proceeded to lay a very grave charge against Sir George Grey, for he stated that his conduct was so strongly disapproved that an injunction was obtained from the Supreme Court to prevent his carrying his intentions into effect. In the first place, I do not admit the fact that any great discontent prevailed with respect to the conduct of the Governor. I am aware that two gentlemen with whom I had been long on terms of intimacy, and for whom I feel the greatest possible respect, having just arrived from England, and knowing very little of the Colony but what they had heard in England, did apply for an injunction to the Supreme Court against the Governor. But my noble Friend, I have no doubt unintentionally, and without weighing very well the force of the terms which he employed, stated that that injunction was issued against Sir George Grey. Now, my Lords, I deny that. The injunction never was issued. It was undoubtedly applied for, and was granted, but it never was issued. I am speaking in the presence of a noble and learned Friend who can set me right if I am wrong, but I think my noble and learned Friend will bear me out when I say that there is the greatest possible difference between the one and the other. My noble Friend says the injunction was treated as waste paper by the Governor. If it had been issued, that statement might have been justified; but I have said that issued it was not. Why, then, was not the Supreme Court moved to further action in the matter? My noble Friend—speaking not quite so broadly as some other people have done, but still with sufficient significance—says that the Court would not have dared to do so. Now, I must say that on such facts as are before us, on such evidence as my noble Friend possesses, it is a little too bad to imply—for it is an implication—such a charge against the late Governor of New Zealand. I do not know whether from the words of my noble Friend I should have understood its meaning, if this charge had not been made more specifically by others. What is it? Clearly that the Court did not dare to issue the injunction, although it was applied for and granted, because, under the rules affecting the Colony, the Governor had the power of superseding the Judges—a power granted whether rightly or wrongly we are not here to discuss—but granted, undoubtedly, to meet great cases of exigency and great cases of delinquency on the part of those Judges, and not for the purpose of vindicating any supposed privileges of the Governor. It is, therefore, to be supposed that no further action was taken—these gentlemen did not call on this Court to issue the injunction—out of consideration for the Judges, because they were under the impression that the Judges would be superseded by the Governor if they took that course, which they were bound to take, supposing their judgment to have been correct. My Lords, I say that to put forward such a subterfuge on the part of those gentlemen who applied for the injunction, is unworthy of them. At the risk of all hazards to the Judges—if they really believed Sir George Grey would be so forgetful of his duty as to attempt anything so monstrous—I say without question, that these gentlemen, if they thought that this proceeding of the Governor ought to be prevented, were bound to have proceeded. Having applied for and obtained the injunction, they ought to have gone on to issue it, and then the legality of the matter might have been tried. My Lords, they did no such thing; the matter was permitted there to stand; and I say that Sir George Grey was not only justified under all the circumstances of the case, in proceeding as he did, but he had no other course to take.

But, my Lords, my noble Friend then proceeded to the other part of his case, to the delay on the part of the Governor, and the difficulties he threw in the way of the meeting of the General Assembly. Now, my Lords, to what does this charge amount? Does it mean that the Governor evaded the Act of Parliament? No, but that he literally fulfilled it. Does my noble Friend, or do those who have followed up this attack on Sir George Grey, intend to say that in any one instance the Governor exceeded the time within which each separate act was to be performed? No, they do not; but they say that he waited until the last day authorised by the Act of Parliament. Now, my Lords, supposing this to be true, which I am bound to say it is not, a more frivolous charge against a public man was never made. What was the meaning of Parliament giving this discretion, but that the Governor might be able to choose, within the prescribed limit, what might be, in his judgment, the best possible time for taking the necessary steps? You may say he judged rightly or wrongly; but to make it a matter of grave accusation, does indeed surprise me, and I think it will surprise your Lordships and all who look at the facts. I doubt whether, in any other instance, in bringing a constitution into operation, the latest day allowed by Parliament has not been uniformly taken, and I believe that in the case of the Cape of Good Hope—although I have not looked back to see—every single step in the proceedings was taken on the last day. But my noble Friend is wrong as to the fact; for the most important step towards setting the machinery in motion—the proclamation of the new constitution — was issued in three weeks after it reached the Colony, whereas the Act of Parliament allowed six weeks. Sir George Grey, therefore, on the very first opportunity that was afforded him, showed that his animus was not delay. Is it unfair to suppose that in the other cases there were good reasons for choosing the last instead of an earlier day? I have gone through all the various steps connected with this matter, and I must say that the twelve months for the whole transaction, from the beginning to the end, originally given by the Act, was a short time; but within that time everything was done. But the powers given to the Governor by the Act were in fact to frame a constitution; and to him were left all those matters of detail which in other cases have been carried out by the Secretary of State at home, or by some legislative authority in the Colony. He had to define the provinces, to define the electoral districts, to decide of how many Members the Legislative Councils should consist — of how many the General Assembly; to determine how many of these should be elected, and how many should be nominees; to decide who the nominee Members should be, and, in short, he would not say frame a Reform Bill, but to work out a vast number of preliminary details before the constitution could be brought into operation, requiring a great deal of local information, and necessarily occupying time. And when, in addition to these circumstances, you come to consider the great distance of these settlements from one another, and that the only means of communication is by water, and that, too, at uncertain times, I must say I see no reason for charging Sir George Grey with delay in bringing the constitution into operation, even if the Act of Parliament did not sufficiently shelter him from any accusation of that sort. So far from setting at nought the provisions of the Act of Parliament, I think I have shown that he has executed them at every step. My noble Friend said that it was intended by the Act that the six Legislative Councils of the provinces and the General Assembly should be brought into operation together. I do not know what clause in the Act he can quote to substantiate that statement. I can only say I know of no such provision; and having attended to the passing of the Bill through this House, I never heard anything in the course of its progress which indicated such an intention on the part of the framers of it. And of this I am certain, there were good reasons why such an attempt should not be made — why the Legislative Councils of the six provinces ought to meet before the meeting of the General Assembly. In the first place, it was desirable that each of the Legislative Councils of the provinces should have the opportunity of considering their local interests, and passing many laws of considerable importance, before the meeting of the General Assembly; and they availed themselves of that opportunity. But must it not be palpable to your Lordships, and to every one who considers the subject, that in a colony of small population like New Zealand, where you have to find persons to represent each province in the Legislative Council, and moreover to find competent parties for representatives in the General Assembly, that, as regards the composition of the General Assembly, if it is to be formed of the best materials, it must include many individuals who are also Members of the Legislative Councils of the provinces? And so, undoubtedly, is the fact. One of two results must have followed their meeting at the same time. Either the Legislative Councils could not have been brought into work in consequence of the absence of so many at the meeting of the General Assembly, or the General Assembly would be deprived of the advantage of such Members as belonged to the Legislative Councils. The whole machinery, therefore, in the first year would be brought to a dead lock, instead of into harmonious operation, by the fact of the Legislative Councils not having met in sufficient time before the meeting of the General Assembly. My noble Friend says that the defence made on the part of the Governor, that the writs were not returned for calling the General Assembly, is invalid because there is no provision in the Act which requires it. I must take the liberty of saying, that I think if he refers to the 44th clause of the Act, he will find it was required that these writs should be returned before the General Assembly is called together. But I say the Governor was justified in studiously watching every possible requirement to see that he kept within the letter of the law, because, on the part of many who are now complaining of the delay in bringing the constitution into operation, there was an indication of an intention to render the whole constitution null and void if the Governor failed in acting legally in every step which he took.

My noble Friend then branched off into another topic—what he called the illegal appropriation of the revenues which stood over from the collections under the old system, to the Legislative Councils. Again I must dispute the illegality of this transaction. It has been held by lawyers, to whom the question has been referred, that the transaction was legal, and I believe there is nothing in the accusation of my noble Friend beyond the question, whether it was politic or right he should do so. I admit there is considerable perplexity in that part of the Constitution Act in which the Governor is called on to apply these revenues, and certainly it is no fault of the Governor that it was not made clear; for precisely the same provision was found in the old constitution, which the House will remember was suspended for four or five years, and at that time the Governor called the attention of the Secretary of State to the position in which he was placed by the perplexity attaching to that part of the Act; notwithstanding which remarks, precisely the same clause was introduced into the Act which passed two years ago, and, therefore, the Governor is not responsible for any consequent difficulty. As regards the appropriation being illegal, that can easily be tested. But I believe on the whole the Governor acted not only legally, but rightly, in the difficulty in which he was placed. The balance of the revenue, after meeting the charges specially cast upon it, had to be appropriated in some way. He felt that, with the old legislative body extinct, and the new one coming into operation (the Legislative Councils being assembled, and the General Assembly not yet called together), it was more in accordance with instructions on a former occasion—though there were no instructions which would quite meet this case—to hand over the balance, divided equally, to the Legislative Councils, as it would place them in funds at a moment when it was impossible they could have any other funds at their disposal, and when it would, of course, cause considerable embarrassment if they were obliged to proceed either by borrowing money or without any money at all.

My noble Friend says that he considers that Sir George Grey's conduct in coming away at the time he did is most reprehensible, and he should be glad to see the terms in which my leave of absence was couched. I say at once, Sir George Grey did not act at variance with the permission given by me in that despatch. When Sir George Grey applied for leave of absence, which I received within a fortnight of my appointment, I wrote, in reply, giving him leave of absence, but upon two conditions, that he should wait until the whole of the arrangements were made for bringing the Constitution Act into operation, and that he should be assured the state of the native population was sound, and that there was no apprehension of insurrectionary proceedings, as on a former occasion, in consequence of these free institutions being given to the Colony. Sir George Grey attended literally to these instructions. He waited until the last stage in bringing the Constitution Act into operation was reached, and he left the Colony in a state of profound peace and contentment, receiving addresses expressing regret at his departure, not only from the inhabitants who had proceeded from this country to colonise it, but from the natives; and those addresses, which I have seen, were of the most affectionate and interesting description. It is somewhat hard to charge Sir George Grey with culpability in leaving the Colony at the time he did. What were the circumstances under which he asked for leave of absence? Seventeen years of colonial services he could show, out of which he had been in England three months only—thirteen years and a half of continual service, during which he had never revisited this country. At the time he was serving in South Australia, and the colony of New Zealand was in the greatest possible difficulty and danger, he was earnestly requested by the then Secretary for the Colonies, the present Lord Derby, to proceed from South Australia to New Zealand as a means of saving that latter colony. Lord Derby pressed it on him as a matter of duty, and I must beg to read only a small portion of that despatch intimating the opinion the noble Earl then entertained of the services of Sir George Grey. Lord Stanley writes—

"After the repeated testimonials I have borne to the value of your public services in administering the government of South Australia, it would be very gratifying to me to prove my esteem of your public spirit and great ability, by proposing to you other offices of greater rank and superior emoluments; still I trust it will be a most welcome proof of the confidence Her Majesty reposes in you by inviting you to undertake duties more arduous and responsible, though recommended by hardly any other consideration. The necessity of a vigorous head in the government of

New Zealand is the single apology. To a man of your character, it will be ample apology for calling on you without previous notice, at some sacrifice and inconvenience, to proceed immediately to relieve Captain Fitzroy from that office."

In a subsequent portion of the despatches the noble Earl shows what were his anticipations of Sir George Grey, from what he had accomplished. "I know," he says, "he will meet difficulties with a firm disregard of any responsibility in which evident duty may involve him." I say Sir George Grey has justified the favourable expectations on the part of Lord Derby; and now he is accused of coming home too soon. He has fulfilled the duties which devolved on him, and he has stayed at great inconvenience to himself. It may not be delicate to allude to the domestic concerns of any man, but when a public servant is attacked I feel I am justified in referring to them. What were the circumstances which induced Sir George Grey to apply for leave of absence at all? I knew them not at the time, but I have learnt them since Sir George Grey arrived in this country, and the circumstances are these:—Sir George Grey had left in England one relation, and, so far as I know, one only, whom he was most anxious to see again before death should preclude that possibility. He had left a mother in England, and he was desirous of coming home to see her, and for that purpose, and that alone, he applied for leave of absence. Sir George Grey knew she was in an infirm state of health, and that every month was precious. He nevertheless fulfilled the duties I had imposed on him. He remained twelve months to carry out the constitution in a manner which I confidently anticipate will be most advantageous. He remained to his own bitter cost. If he had come away earlier, he would have attained his object. Sir George Grey arrived in England to hear, before he landed, that that mother whom he had come 16,000 miles to see lay on her death-bed, and before he reached her residence she had departed this life; and is it not cruel that he should be accused of coming home at an inopportune moment, when he remained and fulfilled all the duties imposed on him, knowing he was running the risk of the sad event which occurred? What was the first act of Sir George Grey? Having attended to those melancholy duties, he came up to town. He had left the Colony in profound peace.

He found the mother country involved in a fearful and perhaps protracted war. He thought, under the circumstances, it was the duty of every man to be at his post, and on his first visit to the Colonial Office he told the permanent secretary, if it was thought desirable for the public interests, he was ready to return to New Zealand without a day's delay. That is the characteristic of the man, and of the public spirit which attaches to him. I do deprecate attacks on a man of that description, unless they can be borne out thoroughly by the facts. I have no doubt the noble Lord believes what he has been told, but I am confident further inquiry in the Colony will show there has been the greatest possible misrepresentation, and I say it is cruel that a man under such circumstances should have his hopes and his prospects blighted. I hope I am not departing from proper delicacy in divulging a private communication, but I must add to this that Sir George Grey has said to me, alluding to one of my last acts as Colonial Secretary—the appointment of him as Governor of the Cape of Good Hope—

"I feel the disadvantage under which a Governor must go to a new colony whose conduct has been brought in an adverse way before both Houses of Parliament. I know that imputations attach, or are likely to attach, even if they can be disproved, which in many instances they cannot without subsequent events. All I can say is, you have proved your good opinion of me by asking me to do further service to the country. I am gratified with that proof of approbation on the part of a public servant of the Crown, my superior in office, who has had the opportunity of judging of my conduct; but if, in consequence of these attacks, my means of usefulness are diminished, I hope you will press on your successor to reverse the proposal made to me, and to cancel it."

This is the man whose part I have taken, and for doing which I have incurred the censure of my noble Friend. I will not defer to my noble Friend, or to any other man, in friendliness to free institutions; but at the risk of being considered as having departed from principles which I hold dear, I will not be a party to sacrificing an able public servant, who, I believe, has acted with proper discretion, and with a due sense of the responsibility attaching to him, and I rejoice that the last act of mine at the Colonial Office was to reward and promote such a man. My noble Friend says he can hardly believe that I will defend the conduct of Sir George Grey. I have defended it in all the points which my noble Friend has attacked, and, as I have said before, I am ready to discuss every other accusation which may be brought against him. I have spoken specifically of Sir George Grey; but on behalf of the service generally I must say I cannot believe those are really the best friends of colonial government who bring accusations and charges against those who have performed the arduous duties of a Governor, without the clearest and most distinct proofs that everything they advance can be substantiated. Does my noble Friend really believe that it is for the advantage of the public service to bring public accusations against an able, disinterested, and honourable man like Sir George Grey? Our witty neighbours have taunted us with occasionally shooting an admiral pour encourager les autres. My noble Friend selects a Governor to attack, and he chooses, not one of inferior character, but one in high station, who is carrying out a plan which will be of great advantage to this country. That is the principal reason that I promoted Sir George Grey to be the Governor of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope. It was because I had watched events in that Colony, I knew we had been involved in wars of long duration, and that on each separate occasion the main cause of those wars had been the ill-treatment of the native population—a spirit of encroachment on them which they would not endure—a want of dealing with the natives in an equitable and satisfactory manner. To save one or two millions more being spent in another Kafir or Zulu war was my paramount duty, and instead of selecting a man possessed only of great capacity to deal with constitutional government, it was my duty to find one possessing these requisites, and, moreover, possessing the power of dealing with native tribes and treating them with kindness. I confidently look forward to the career of Sir George Grey to justify my selection. I feel confident he will deal with the natives of the Cape of Good Hope as he has dealt with the natives of New Zealand; and if the result be as I anticipate, though I receive blame now, I shall be amply rewarded by the satisfaction of seeing the success of that man whom I have chosen in his conduct of Governor, and I feel certain my noble Friend on some future occasion will be the first to come forward with manliness and candour to express his regret that he should ever have said one word to derogate from the high character of Sir George Grey.

After a few words from Lord LYTTELTON in reply,

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

Order for Committee read, House in Committee.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he begged to move to leave out certain words in the clause relative to the appointment of election officers; namely, that, in case the candidates or their agents not being able to agree upon a person to act as election officer, the returning officer should before the nomination appoint such election officer himself. He considered that if this provision remained part of the Bill, there was nothing whatever to interfere with the power of the returning officer to appoint any one he pleased. By the 19th section of the Bill, all claims were to be sent in to the candidate or his agent, and by the subsequent clause the candidate was to make a declaration to the election officer of the correctness of the claims, and that he had paid no expenses except advertising and personal expenses. The candidate must not pay a single farthing beyond those expenses which were legalised by the Bill, except through the election officer; he was to send in all bills and charges to the election officer within a month, or be liable to a penalty of 50*l.*, and 20*l.* for every week of his default. The result of this enactment would be, that the candidate would have to go through all the accounts sent in to him, and if he made any mistake or paid what were considered not legal expenses under the Act, he would be liable to a heavy po-nalty. In point of fact, all the expenses of the election would have to go through the hands of an irresponsible and, perhaps, partisan election officer without security at all, who would be enabled to put a veto on any particular expense, and expose the candidate to actions at law, which, by the subsequent clauses of the Act, were not allowed to be settled without the consent of the election officer, and if decided by the Court, a copy of the judgment was to be sent to him. Considering, therefore, that such election officer might be a partisan, it showed considerable want of care in the preparation of the Bill to invest him with such powers over the candidate. He (Mr. V. Scully) objected also to the payment by each candidate of a fee of 10*l.* to the election officer. How were they to define the word "candidate?" It very often happened that half-a-dozen gentlemen came forward at an election when not more than two or three went to the poll; yet by this Bill every one who addressed the voters might be termed a candidate and made to pay the fee. He thought if an election officer were appointed at all, he ought to be invested with something of a judicial character, and certainly not appointed in the way proposed. He therefore wished to omit that portion of the clause which enabled the returning officer, be he partisan or be he not, to nominate the election officer, be he competent or not competent, partisan or otherwise. He was willing that there should be a judicial officer appointed to discharge the duties of election officer, and after the omission of the words which he desired to exclude, he was prepared to move the insertion of words which would constitute the election officers on what he considered to be a proper and sound basis.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he also had an Amendment to move in the same clause, which, as it came before that of the hon. Member who had just sat down, was entitled to be taken first. He considered it extremely desirable, when they were making provisions which would so stringently affect candidates, that the word "candidate" should be properly defined. Was a candidate a man who had been regularly proposed and seconded on the hustings, or one who had merely addressed the electors through the medium of a newspaper? He should move to substitute the word "after" for the words "previous to" the nomination, in the 4th line of the clause.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that the strict legal meaning of the word "candidate" applied, no doubt, to a person who had been duly proposed and seconded; but popularly, it embraced the wider sense of any person who presented himself to a constituency for election; and it was in this latter sense that the clause was to be understood. Its effect was, that, whenever an election was approaching, the candidates might meet together and agree upon the individual to be appointed as election officer some time even before the actual election.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he thought that after the nomination the gentlemen who intended to go on as candidates bond fide could arrange how they were to carry on the business of the election.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he attached great importance to the part of the Bill in question for which the House was indebted to the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly). If that part of the Bill which related to the appointment of an election officer was carried out in an efficient manner, it would be an important step taken to putting an end to bribery, by rendering it impossible hereafter to bribe. The more this was the feeling of the House, the more he was convinced of the importance of appointing a person of the kind, and the more important it seemed to him how that officer should be appointed. The plan recommended by the Select Committee, however, appeared to him to be open to some serious objections. In the first place, knowing the heat and warmth of a contested election, and how every man was open to suspicion of undue bias, it seemed to him highly improbable that all the candidates should concur in the nomination of one individual; it was, on the contrary, far more likely that they would fall out on the subject. The nomination would then devolve upon the returning officer. He (Sir J. Pakington) had asked an hon. Friend, a Member of that House, who had been a Member of the Committee, what were his views as to the person to be appointed, and he had answered that he thought the man to be appointed should be an impartial, clever, gentlemanlike attorney. It had been his fortune to know, in his time, a great many clever, and a great many gentlemanlike attorneys; but an impartial attorney, more especially in election matters, he considered a man not so easy to be found. He could not help thinking, therefore, that if the plan turned upon the appointment of this officer, it would be extremely difficult to work. He objected, therefore, to the plan in that respect. The officer in question should be, in his opinion, appointed upon some intelligible principle, and his duties strictly defined, otherwise there would be as much variety in their views and in their practice as there were returning officers for the whole kingdom. He could not, for his own part, see why election officers should not be appointed in the same way as revising barristers—a plan which had been in operation for twenty-three years, without the slightest imputation of partiality against those appointed. He felt much disposed to offer an Amendment to bring that suggestion to the test; but if the Committee was not disposed to adopt it, why not appoint an officer to name to all these appointments? That would give something like uniformity, and certainly it would be far preferable to the plan proposed in the Bill. He (Sir J. Pakington) should, however, prefer the appointments to be in the hands of the Judges, or some person of high station, duly qualified, as were at present those of the revising barristers. He thought it was important to have an officer whose position should be above suspicion.

Mr. WALPOLE said, that the Select Committee to which the Bills of the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) and of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly) had been referred, and of which he (Mr. Walpole) was chairman, had come, after much deliberation, to the conclusion that it was not advisable to appoint from sixty to eighty barristers, with judicial powers to determine the various delicate questions that would be litigated before them in the several boroughs and counties where elections took place. They thought that the adoption of such a plan would, in the first place, lead to great expense; and that, in the second place, it would not be satisfactory that the decision of a single barrister should be taken as conclusive upon the various questions that would be brought before him. At the same time the Committee did think it right that all bills should be paid through a public officer, by which means an easy method of detecting corrupt practices would be provided. He did not think it probable that the plan embodied in the present clause would produce partisan appointments; or that in consequence of it the chances of either party at an election were likely to be affected by any party feelings on the part of the election officer. For the Committee must remember that if the candidates did not themselves appoint him, he could not be named by the returning officer until the night before the nomination, since it could not be ascertained until then who were the candidates. It was a mistake to suppose that the election officer could be or could act as a partisan. His duties were chiefly of a ministerial character, to receive money and to pay the accounts. The clause, when read carefully, would not be found so objectionable as asserted. He could not help expressing an opinion that the clause was well drawn, but, if any better person than the returning officer could be suggested, he should have no objection to the alteration.

Mr. BRIGHT said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the hon. Members who had opposed this clause had entirely mistaken the object with which this officer was to be appointed. The Select Committee had unanimously determined that it was not desirable to have a judicial officer, but simply a ministerial one—a trustworthy person to secure due publicity in the payment of the accounts. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Pakington) still seemed to cling to the idea of appointing barristers as election officers. But he would ask the Committee whether they were prepared to let loose 400 barristers upon the constituencies of the country at every election? Who was to appoint them? The right hon. Baronet said the Judges were to undertake that duty; but he felt sure that if 400 barristers were to be appointed, they would not have the duty so well discharged as if the officers were appointed by the candidates, as the Bill proposed. It was said that the candidates were not likely to agree with respect to the appointment of such an officer; but he really thought this improbability was very much exaggerated, and both parties would very frequently concur in some respectable person in whom both had confidence. But even if they did not, he did not see any objection to intrusting the returning officers with these appointments. The election officer was not likely to display partiality, for his duties were strictly limited to the reception of bills designated for payment by the candidates, and to the publication of an abstract of the election accounts of both parties in the newspapers. They would not have half so many opportunities of displaying partisanship as were possessed by the returning officers; and yet we very seldom heard any complaints of partiality against them. He could not see that legal knowledge would be at all requisite on the part of these election officers. In fact, their duties would be better performed by a banker's clerk with a good knowledge of accounts, than by most lawyers, who seldom combined a good knowledge of arithmetic with their other qualifications.

MR. EVELYN DENISON said, without reference to the party who should appoint the election officer, he would only ask the attention of the Committee in respect to the time of the appointment of this election officer. It was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) that the officer should only be appointed on the day of nomination, but in county elections it was necessary to canvass the electors, and to incur considerable expenses by agents weeks before the election took place. Now, any payment, even for a postchaise, would be an illegal payment. It would thus be seen the great inconvenience of not having an election officer appointed from the period when expenses commenced. If not appointed till the nomination day there must be a series of running accounts, which would create confusion when they came to be presented for settlement. If it was decided that the election officer was to be appointed on the day of nomination, that would be found an insuperable difficulty. It was essential that the election officers should be appointed in time sufficient to meet expenses as they arose.

MR. WALPOLE said, the candidate was allowed to pay personal expenses, which in the interpretation clause were defined to mean—

“the reasonable expenses of such candidate in travelling to and from the place at which such election shall take place, and the reasonable expenses of his living at hotels or elsewhere during the time of his residence at or near such place for the purpose of, and in relation to, such election.”

He knew the hon. Gentleman would reply that this said nothing of agents' expenses, and he agreed that the excepted items of expenditure ought to be made more extensive than they were. The 32nd clause, however, provided that the current expenses of the election might be paid by the agent of the candidate under the authority of the election officer.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, there were two questions at the present time before the Committee—when was the election officer to be appointed, and by whom? Now, with respect to the first point, he thought that, so far as the objections of the hon. Member for Malton (Mr. Denison) referred to the personal expenses of the candidate, that difficulty might easily be met by extending the wording of the interpretation clause, which permitted such personal expenses as those described to be paid without reference to the officer. Still, it was impossible not to see that there were many expenses necessarily incurred in the conduct of an election contest which it was absolutely necessary to pay forthwith, and for which credit could not be obtained; and he therefore thought it was desirable that the election officer should be appointed at a considerably earlier period than the day of nomination, in order that his authority for the payment of such expenses might be obtained. He thought it was desirable that his appointment should be vested in some one free from local influence, for he put entirely out of the question the idea that it could be made by the various candidates. If you gave the power of electing such officers to the sheriff, or to the returning officer, then parties incurring expenses would be able at once to apply to the proper quarter as to payment. With reference to these parties to be appointed, seeing that for twenty-three years the revising barristers had done their duty without reference to party feeling, and with satisfaction to the public, he thought to this class of gentlemen the appointments might with advantage be confined. But as this appeared to be distasteful to the Committee, he would not press the matter on their consideration. His opinion was, that there should always be some public officer, and that public officer be required to appoint election officers. He certainly thought it would be better to select some other officer less open to the charge of partisanship than returning officers for the duty of appointing election officers. However, if some hon. Gentleman would raise that question the Committee would no doubt determine it at once, and thus the difficulty suggested by the hon. Member for Malton (Mr. Denison) would be entirely obviated.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he thought the person having the appointment should have no local bias. If they adopted the clause, he did not think that in the majority of instances the candidates would agree as to the person to be appointed. He thought as other hon. Members had that a respectable banker's clerk would be a very proper person. He entreated the Committee to have no person having a local bias; and he thought the appointment might properly be in the last revising barrister, or the last Judge of assize.

MR. HENLEY said, they were told that if the candidates concurred, they might appoint the election officer. But had any one looked at the definition of a "candidate" in the interpretation clause? The words of the clause were dangerously wide—"all persons who have been, or are about to be, nominated or proposed." The next question was as to the time when this officer should be appointed. His hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly) had demonstrated that not only must this election officer be appointed before the election, but that he must be always in existence. His right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Walpole) maintained that it was of no consequence who the election officer was to be, that he had nothing but ministerial duties, which any banker's clerk could discharge. [MR. WALPOLE: I said, chiefly ministerial.] Nevertheless some of those duties were amongst the most difficult which could devolve upon any man. You could not compound an action for election expenses, or suffer judgment to go by default, without the consent of this election officer. Then, see how the provision would work in promoting corruption. What more easy mode of corruption would there be than for a man to say, "I will pay nothing, bring your action?" It would be a good deal more profitable for an attorney to have the defence of 100 actions than to have a sum of 100*l.* given to him. Yet the party must rely on the discretion of the returning officer in order to make these transactions safe.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that every Member of that House was aware of the wonderful acumen which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) always brought to bear upon the clauses of a Bill, and he had now exercised it con amore in pulling the present clause to pieces. There could be no doubt that the object of the Bill was a most laudable one, and that every one should do his best to overcome the difficulties that presented themselves. The mode of proceeding laid down in this Bill would, he believed, be more advantageous in stopping direct bribery than all the penal laws they could enact—the fact that payments could only be made through a responsible officer, and were immediately afterwards to be proclaimed to the world, was the most effectual check that could be placed upon bribery. He had felt the difficulty that existed as to the appointment of that officer. His own view, however, was, that the appointment ought to be made independent of the candidates. Three parties had been named who might appoint him—the revising barristers, the Judges, or the sheriff of the county. With respect to the revising barristers and Judges, the great objection to them was, that they really had no local knowledge, so as to make the best selection; they were not always on the spot, and could not know the circumstances sufficiently. It seemed to him that they were driven to make a choice between the sheriff of the county and the returning officer; but the sheriff could not have the same amount of local knowledge as the returning officer. It was said that the returning officer might be a partisan, but the same objection might be made to the sheriff. There might be individual cases in which they forgot their duty to the community, but, on the whole, it was his opinion that they discharged their functions exceedingly well. He would prefer that the proposed officer should be styled election auditor, as that would be a more appropriate designation. The only case in which there would be a departure from simple ministerial action was, where the candidate was not disposed to pay the amount demanded of him. The cases would be exceedingly few where the intervention of the officer would be called for, and then all he would have to do would be of a very simple nature and requiring no amount of legal knowledge. They would do wisely and well to leave the appointment of this election officer to the returning officer, and there could be no room for doubt that the appointment should be made as soon as any expenses were incurred, which would be as soon as the proceedings of the election commenced.

MR. MASSEY said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman in some of his observations, but he doubted whether bribery could be prevented by penal enactments. He was convinced that if there was one man willing to give a bribe and another ready to take it, no legislative contrivance of a penal nature would prevent them from coming together. He thought the solemn and unequivocal declaration proposed to be made by Members at the table, that they had not been guilty, directly or indirectly, of any undue practices to procure their return, would be the only effective provision against corruption that could be devised; and if he received any encouragement from the Committee, he would move the omission of the clause.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he was inclined to regard the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General as an improvement on his own. He thought that having the public officer, who should have all the election expenses brought under his view, and should be afterwards bound to declare them, would be a check on bribery greater than having an agent of the candidates. The objections made had been chiefly to the time of the appointment, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had exhausted his ingenuity in pointing out the difficulties that would be created by the wording of the clause; but he thought that, taking the view of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, there would be no difficulties in the course proposed. It appeared to him that the returning officer, if it were decided that the nomination be vested in him, should make the appointment as soon as possible after being appointed himself.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he did not see the necessity of the returning officer making the appointment immediately after being appointed himself. He would propose, in substitution of the words in the clause, other words to the following effect—

“That once in every year, in the month of August, the returning officer of every place returning a Member or Members to serve in Parliament should appoint an election officer, to be called ‘Auditor of Election Expenses,’ to act at every election during the year.”

MR. EVELYN DENISON said, that there was no security required in the case of this officer. It might be expedient to provide some security to protect the candidates who had paid the money.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that the attention of the Committee had already been called to that difficulty, and various proposals had been made to meet the case, none of which had been adopted except one, which would be found in Clause 21, which indirectly, but yet with certainty, protected the candidate, as it enabled him to pay to a banker of his own choice all the money with which the election officer had to deal, and through that banker alone the charges were to be paid by the election officer with cheques, countersigned by the candidate.

MR. GROGAN said, he doubted whether there was any necessity for this officer at all. In small boroughs the legitimate expenses of the officer who was expected to do such wonderful duties would be so exceedingly trifling, that if a candidate wished to get in by bribery his simplest method would be to bribe the officer himself. Again, in a large borough the percentage allowed to the officer would amount to a large sum, and the arrangement would then not be characterised by that economy which it was one of the declared objects of the Bill to enforce. He thought that the best security against bribery would be the oath which every Member would be required to take at the table of the House by the 33rd clause. He should vote for the rejection of the present clause if any Motion to that effect were made.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, he thought that the election officer, instead of being, as suggested, nominated in August, should be appointed at the period when the returning officer was appointed, otherwise a returning officer might have serving under him for a portion of the year an officer for whose appointment he was not responsible.

MR. HILDYARD said, that they ought to take care in considering this clause, for it provided that any payment made by the Member, otherwise than through the election officer, would be illegal. That might lead to the candidate being petitioned against, on the ground of some informality in the appointment of the officer. He must say that he never read in his life a Bill in which such especial pains had been taken to lay so many traps for the candidate; and, in his opinion, they should be extremely cautious in exercising their ingenuity in such a manner as to devise means by which the elections of Members returned to sit in that House might be rendered void.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he believed that there was no necessity whatever for the appointment of the officer in question, and that they might easily have recourse to some more simple plan for the purpose of effecting the object which they professed to have in view. He saw no objection, for instance, to the introduction of a provision into the Bill, declaring that when any man became a candidate at an election he should nominate an agent, due notice of that nomination being given to the public that all payments should pass through the hands of that agent, and that within one fortnight after the election had taken place both the agent and the candidate should be bound to furnish an account of all payments made by them in connection with the election; should verify that statement, and in case any payment should be concealed by them then that the election should be declared void, or some other penalty inflicted. In his opinion, a provision of that nature would secure the attainment of the object which they had in view more efficaciously than the cumbrous machinery necessarily connected with the appointment of an election officer. He should not vote against the clause, though he did not think it would be of any benefit, for it was his intention to vote in favour of every Bill proposed to prevent bribery, and when all those measures were found to be fruitless the House would come round to the conviction that there was only one way to check bribery and corruption, and that was by the ballot.

MR. BENTINCK said, he very much doubted whether this or any other clause that could be framed on the subject would be effectual in attaining the desired object, and whether it would not tend to complicate rather than remove the difficulty connected with this subject. It must be patent to every Gentleman in that House that election expenses were very complicated matters, and that there was a great deal of trickery and fraud incident to them, to prevent which required the closest examination and the greatest care. He contended that there were few men in any county or borough competent to enter minutely into the very complicated question of election expenses; and he thought the best course would be to appoint a permanent officer, who would be thoroughly conversant with the subject, and against whose ability, at least, no possible objection could be raised. He would also suggest that, instead of remunerating such an officer by a commission of 2l. per cent upon the amount of the election expenses, and thus holding out a direct premium to increase the expenses, he should be paid in the inverse ratio, or just as he diminished, and not as he increased, the expenses of the election.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, he objected to the clause as it now stood, for he thought that if an election officer were appointed at all, he should not be appointed annually, but, as the candidature continued for the whole of the election, there was no reason why the person through whom the expenses would pass should not be appointed for the same period. The 21st clause stated that any payments made in connection with an election by the authority of a candidate, except through the election officer, should be an illegal payment, and, upon proof thereof, the election of such candidate should be void. Many Members were called upon to contribute towards registration expenses, and he wished to know whether, such payments being certainly in connection with the election, they were to pass through the hands of the election officer? He thought the extraordinary machinery of this part of the Bill was likely to lead to a great deal of mischief, and that it would place power in the hands of those to whom it ought not to be given. His own impression was, that that and many other clauses of the Bill deserved far more consideration than they were likely to receive in Committee, if their legislation was really to have the effect of maintaining purity at elections of Members to that House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he must maintain that the provisions of the Bill with respect to what might and what might not be considered legal expenses were so vague, and laid so many pitfalls for the candidate, that Members would, under their operation, be constantly liable to have their honour assailed, and would be exposed to the risk of a prosecution, because it might be demonstrated that they had defrayed some expenses whose payment was not sanctioned by the Act. All the registration expenses, for instance, were expenses connected with the election; and, in fact, every shilling which a candidate or his agent might spend from the commencement to the close of the election might be classed under that denomination. It was, therefore, perfectly manifest that the candidate could never be certain as to whether, in making certain payments, he was or was not acting in violation of the law—a state of things which all must admit it was by no means desirable should exist. He must also add that he felt disposed to regard with the greatest suspicion the appointment of an election officer, inasmuch as he saw no reason why the returning officer should not be able to perform all the duties for whose discharge it was proposed that a new officer should be appointed, and also inasmuch as the responsibility, which ought, if possible, to be confined to one, would thus be shared by two individuals. To the entire of the latter provisions of the Bill, in short, he was altogether opposed.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought the discussion had established the propriety of the returning officer appointing the election officer, and he was, therefore, not disposed to press any further the view which he had stated when the question was first introduced. He confessed, however, that he was not satisfied of the wisdom of refusing to introduce a barrister of experience into the matter. He concurred in the remarks which had been made that this was the appointment of a very important officer, in whose hands the character of the candidate would be, to a great extent, placed, and that there was no security proposed for his responsibility. The scheme of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly) gave a better security; for it proposed to give judicial power to revising barristers, and to enable them to tax the bills sent in. If that had been agreed to, there would have been an officer responsible to public opinion, in whom they would have had a guarantee that no improper expenses would be allowed. By the present Bill, however, there was no security for the responsibility of the parties to be appointed, and no security for the expenses to be incurred.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he was sorry to be obliged to add his voice to the almost unanimity of dissatisfaction with which the clause had been received. There was so much force in the remarks which had been made in the course of discussion, and especially by the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Bonham-Carter), that he confessed he thought the adoption of the clause would add to the numerous difficulties which had already been experienced in knowing how to interpret the law as applied to election proceedings. If the Bill were to be incumbered with these clauses, he was afraid there was no hope of its becoming the law of the land this year, and he therefore hoped his noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) would consent to the withdrawal of these clauses, and that the House would then endeavour to frame such a Bill as would attain the objects they had in view.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, he had strong objections to the introduction of this clause into the Bill. An hon. Member returned to Parliament frequently had bills laid before him which he refused to pay as illegal, but he was now given to understand that unless he paid them he would never be returned again, and would inflict ruin upon the cause. Hon. Members were, therefore, obliged either to pay the bills laid before them or to lose all chance of representing the place again. He thought the Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk was far more beneficial in its objects than the Bill now before the Committee. If a gentleman, on becoming a candidate for any borough or county, were required to state to the returning officer who his election agent really was, and if a declaration were required to be made on oath by each Member when he took his seat, all that was required would be attained. If these clauses were agreed to, however, every candidate standing for a borough or county would be open to prosecution and snares of every description; and, unless something in the way of protection were afforded, it would be impossible to induce hon. Gentlemen to risk a contest.

MR. BRIGHT said, he feared there would be some difficulty in passing the clause from the opinions that had been expressed. All parties were agreed on two points, that they ought to get rid of the scandals at elections, and that the subject was a very difficult one. He thought, however, that all those Members who had voted against the ballot were particularly bound to agree to conditions of the most stringent character for the purpose of lessening the evil. The noble Lord the Member for London and the other Members of the Committee had made every exertion to render the Bill as perfect as possible. The appointment of a public officer was taken from the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly); but as his character was changed, he (Mr. Bright) did not think it necessary to have a legal person. The Bill, so far from opening new pitfalls for the candidate, would place him in a much better position. He thought it advisable that the candidate should be disconnected from all pecuniary transactions both before and after the election. The officer to be appointed was not to decide on the propriety of any particular payment, but to pay all charges and expenses that the candidate admitted were sanctioned by him. This was a better mode of establishing the precise amount then expended, than to leave it to the declaration of the agents. He knew if that were done, the result would be that a candidate would look for an agent who was not troublesomely scrupulous. It was no objection to say that the officer might be a political partisan; the returning officer might now be so. In the borough of Rochester the returning officer since the Reform Bill was a decided Tory, yet the Liberal Members for the borough bore their testimony to his impartiality and fairness. If the question came to a division, he would support the clause as it stood. If the clause was withdrawn, the whole force of the Bill was gone; it became a mere consolidation of the bribery law, with a clause on the subject of undue influence. If the clause was rejected, he did not see any use in going on with the Bill. He was anxious to render the Bill as efficacious as possible, although he thought the ballot would be the only sure means of putting a stop to bribery. The passing the Bill would not prevent the annual discussion. They should endeavour to make both candidates and electors feel that the law regarded bribery as a disgraceful and infamous offence, and that it would not receive the same indulgence as before. The clause was an attempt to apply a new remedy. Some elections were now at hand, and they would have an opportunity of testing it. If the Bill passed, he was sure the noble Lord the President of the Council would not object to issue the suspended writs; if the plan failed, they would next Session be able to discuss the subject to more advantage. He was not very sanguine as to the successful operation of the Bill, but he would support it in every way.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the more the clause was discussed the greater was the difficulty that presented itself in reference to it and the more unintelligible it became. The hon. Member who last spoke said he understood the clause, but it was clear that all the Members of the Committee were not agreed upon its precise effect and bearing. They had had no consideration of who this officer was to be, or what were to be his qualifications when the election began, and the liability of the candidate was to commence—that liability which might disqualify him altogether. It might be well to have the election accounts published, but the difficulty was how that was to be done, and how were they to ensure that they would be published accurately. One hon. Friend of his behind him had suggested that it would be easy for a candidate who wished to evade the law to bribe the election officer, and that probably would be the best way—at all events they by no means appeared to be agreed upon any one point in reference to this clause, and he would suggest, therefore, that the better course would be to defer it for the present Session. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) had hinted that those who opposed the ballot should support this clause, but that the ballot would be the most satisfactory remedy. He differed from the hon. Member. He believed that with the ballot there would be more bribery than now, and he did not see, that, as an opponent of the ballot, he was bound to vote for this clause. The hon. Gentleman had further said that they would probably have the opportunity of judging of the effect of this proposal in the elections for the boroughs, which by the suspension of the writs were now unrepresented; but he (Mr. Henley) did not attach much value to that experience. He believed, with the noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor) that the effect of the clause would be to surround the candidate with traps and pitfalls, and he hoped, therefore, it would not be persisted in.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would remind those hon. Gentlemen who considered that the effect of this clause would be to surround the candidates with traps and pitfalls, that there were traps and pitfalls existing as the law now stood. Last year they had more than a usual number of charges of bribery at the previous general election, and more than the usual number of Members were unseated on that ground, many of whom he would venture to say had not the least intention when they became candidates of securing their seats by corrupt means. But the position of things was such under the existing system, that a candidate honestly desiring to confine himself to the strict legal expenses, might find, six months after his election, that, unknown to him, large sums of money had been expended on his behalf in bribery, and might lose his seat in consequence. This was no unusual occurrence, and he thought it would be a great security, therefore, if, by any plan like that provided in these clauses, they could be sure that all the legal expenses incurred at the election should be published, and that the person who expended the money should know that, if the published amount were exceeded, he would not be entitled to recover it from the candidate. A gentleman concerned in an election not long ago complained to him of the bribery committed by the opposite party, but admitted that he had spent

6,000*l.* or 7,000*l.* in maintaining the purity of election. The worthy man said it was difficult to account for the spending of so much money on such an object. He could not but think that the end to be obtained by this clause was important; namely, that the expenses of elections, which they knew to be now enormous, should be limited to the strict legal charge; and he believed that if candidates and those who were concerned in elections were to agree to place the accounts of each election in the hands of an officer appointed for the purpose, and that those accounts should be published, and open to the inspection of every elector, a very considerable check would be placed upon corrupt practices. Whether they called such officer an election officer or an auditor of election expenses mattered not; the proposal was the same. But by means of that person publicity should be given of all the election accounts, and he could not but consider that the effect of such publicity would be that the expenses of elections would be greatly diminished in amount, and rendered much less objectionable and corrupt than they now too frequently were. But it had been urged that under this clause many questions of great difficulty would arise, and that, for instance, it would be very difficult to say where an election began, or where the candidate's responsibility commenced. No doubt there were questions of this kind that might require much debate; and if they were called upon to settle every one of them in the present Bill, he admitted they would not be likely now in the month of July, or even if they were at the beginning of the month of February, to pass the Bill in the present Session. Practical men would be able, he apprehended, to solve those questions tolerably well when they came before them; and if it were contended before an Election Committee that a gentleman, because he might have exhibited great hospitality and great liberality in the borough or county five or six years before, had done so as a candidate, and with a view to influence the electors, he thought the Committee would very soon dispose of such an allegation. He hoped, for the reasons he had stated that his right hon. Friend, the Chairman of the Committee, would not be a party to the withdrawal of the clause.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that as his objection to the clause was with reference to the appointment of the election officer by the candidate, and as he understood the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) was about to move a proviso to prevent that, the difficulty he had felt in the matter was removed. He believed the ballot was the only effectual remedy for bribery at elections, but he felt bound to unite with those who thought differently when they proposed a measure which they considered would cure the evil.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he would propose that the election officer should be appointed, not by the returning officer, but by the revising barrister in England and the assistant barrister in Ireland.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON hoped the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentlemen opposite would persevere in their view, and that the original suggestion of the noble Lord would be adopted in allowing the returning officer to appoint his own officer.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, it was a mere question whether it would be better that the appointment of the officer should be made a fixed and permanent one, or whether the appointment should be from year to year. He considered the clause, as it stood, would effect the object they all seemed to have in view. It would be very desirable that the election officer should be a fit and proper person, but it would be difficult to define the qualifications of this officer more minutely, and it would be undesirable to introduce prohibitions into the Bill. It would be better hereafter to introduce a clause imposing upon the election officer the necessity of making a declaration that he would well and truly perform his duty, and imposing penalties for any wilful breach of duty.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he thought the returning officer ought to be made responsible for the acts of the election agent.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, it would be impossible to make the returning officer responsible for the conduct of the gentleman whom he might appoint. They might take all the securities they pleased from the officer appointed.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would move that the further consideration of this clause be postponed.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member could not make this Motion at present.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would then move that the clause be negatived. It was indispensable, before they proceeded to the appointment of an officer of this description, that two precautions should be taken—one, that the appointment should be placed in such hands, that a fit and proper person should be selected; and secondly, that the Bill should state what were and what were not legitimate election expenses. Until this was done, it would be dangerous to appoint such an officer.

MR. CAIRNS said, he thought it desirable that the clause should be negatived unless some understanding was given that it would be brought forward in a different form. If the election officer was to have any control over the expenses of elections, care should be taken to place the appointment in the hands of some person independent of the candidates. As the clause stood, the election officer had no discretion over the expenses which were to pass through his hands. What, then, was he appointed for? It might be said that the object was to secure publicity to all expenses at elections, which was, no doubt, a good object. But at present candidates appointed their own agents, and if you could obtain that publicity by some such plan as that proposed by the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) in his first Bill, it would be desirable. That plan was, that each candidate should pay to his agent the sums required for his expenses, which should all pass through the agent's hands, and the agent was bound to make a return of the expenses, and he and the candidate were to be compelled to declare on oath that these were all the expenses incurred. If some such plan were adopted, you would have gained all the objects required by the clause, and there would be no questions about appointment or fitness, or any of those points which had been now discussed.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he should support the clause. He should wish to see those expenses which properly belonged to the community, such as polling-booths, paid by the public.

MR. VERNON SMITH said that, as a Member of the Select Committee, he could state that the Members were unanimously of opinion that some such election officer as the one proposed in this clause should be appointed, and that this clause was regarded by them as the keystone of the Bill. The question was started and thoroughly canvassed, whether they should give the power to these officers of declaring what were legitimate election expenses, but it was abandoned as impracticable. They, therefore, relied upon the force of the publicity to be given to these accounts, and they thought that that of itself would go far to shame the constituency out of bribery. He would only add that, if the Committee should not agree to this clause, he should think it would hardly be worth the while of the Government to go on with the Bill.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to say a few words before the Committee proceeded to a division. This clause contemplated the appointment of an election officer, to whom, and through whom, and whom alone, the whole of the election expenses should be paid. When the evil to be remedied was considered, he thought the Committee would approve of the clause. The evil was grievous and enormous in this country; and, notwithstanding legislative and other remedies, bribery had of late increased until it assumed a magnitude discreditable in the highest degree both to the Constitution and people of this country. How was it now proposed to remedy the evil? At present a gentleman, after being elected, might take a stringent oath that, to his knowledge, or with his sanction, no money had been spent in bribing voters at the election. Yet the bribery might have been practised to a great extent without his knowledge. The custom was for the candidate to pay large sums of money to his agent, with directions that they should not be misapplied, and that only legitimate expenses should be paid; and yet, when the election was over, it turned out that bribery to the amount of thousands of pounds had been carried on, and Members were unseated by the acts of those over whom they had no control. In his opinion, the only way to overcome the evil was this—to appoint one individual into whose hands the whole of the expenses of the election should be given. They were told that the system was a complicated one; now he considered that it was simple in the extreme. The whole of the candidates were to pay all the possible expenses of the election into one man's hand, and he did not see how it was possible that any bribery could take place, unless that officer should himself consent to it. All the candidates had to do was, to take care not to pay one shilling of money for any matter connected with the election, except what he paid into the hands of this election officer, and he would be perfectly safe. If the law they now sought to carry into effect had been in existence for the last twenty-five years, the thousands and tens of thousands of pounds which had been paid by the candidates, much of which doubtless was expended in bribery, would not have been expended at all. The system proposed would give the only protection that could be afforded to the candidate himself, and that was a point well worthy of the consideration of the Committee. No man, however pure his motives and his conduct might be, could deem himself safe, as he might, although duly elected, be unsent by the acts of others, with which he had nothing whatever to do. He knew of no more effectual protection to the candidate than his being enabled to make a declaration of all the money he had paid, and the dates and objects of such payments, and he did not know how it was possible, under these circumstances, that any bribery could be committed. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would approve of the clause, which put the matter in the easiest and simplest form, under the control of a public officer. One of the objections to the clause was, that it was full of snares and pitfalls. He utterly denied it, and he did not think that bribery could be put down in a more simple and effectual manner.

Mr. MALINS said, he felt considerable hesitation in opposing the clause, but having listened to the long discussion that had taken place, he must say that he felt now, as throughout, insuperable objections to it. He could assure hon. Members that he was not actuated by any desire to perpetuate the existing unfortunate state of things, or to countenance the bribery which so extensively, and he regretted to say so generally, prevailed. He was desirous that every effort should be made to adopt practical means of repressing it, but he did not want to fetter the candidate with undue restrictions, or place him in a position of difficulty and danger, to which no man ought to be exposed. He contended, however, that the candidate got no protection whatever—there was merely to be a publication of the account of the expenses attending the election. There were certain expenses connected with elections which were inevitable; and let them legislate as they would they could not put a stop to them. Hon. Members not having any local connection with a borough were applied to for subscriptions to races, to public balls, to blanket clubs, and coal clubs. It was well known that these subscriptions were paid to strengthen the influence of the candidate in the borough.

Was the election officer to be called upon to pay these subscriptions? Again, the candidate was liable to be sued for any election expenses incurred, notwithstanding the appointment of this public officer. He could not settle this demand, nor could he, by payment of a small sum, get rid of the cost and vexation of the action without consulting the public officer. He believed there was not a gentleman behind him who was not prepared to vote against this clause, and there were many hon. Gentlemen on the other side who were also opposed to it. Although all were desirous of preventing bribery at elections, he hoped they would not give their assent to any such a clause.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, he considered the clause as the very essence of the Bill, and, if the Committee rejected it, it would be plain to the country no desire existed to put an end to the system of bribery and corruption which had become a scandal and a disgrace to it. He believed the whole objection to the clause was the publicity it would occasion; its intention was simply to enforce the payment of election expenses and enable the public to know what they were.

Mr. BENTINCK said, the inference was, that the opponents of the clause were in favour of maintaining and perpetuating bribery at elections; but if the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Member would frame a clause, no matter how stringent, that would secure publicity to all the payments made by candidates it would have his support; this clause he maintained would not do so.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 133; Noes 74: Majority 59.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 20 (Every Candidate shall, within two months after the declaration of the Election, or within one month after any Bill has been sent in by the legal representative of any deceased creditor, send all such bills and claims to the election officer for payment).

Mr. HILDYARD said, he wished to move that the respective periods should be "three months" and "two months."

Mr. BENTINCK supported the Amendment. If an agent died, or was guilty of misconduct, it would be rather hard to call upon the candidate to send in his bills within one month.

Mr. HENLEY said, there could be no doubt that the accounts should get into the hands of the election officer as soon as possible, even for the sake of the candidate himself; but at the same time they should give the candidate proper time to examine the bills and satisfy himself that they were correct.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he thought that before proceeding further they should settle the question whether refreshment tickets were to be legal or not.

Mr. WALPOLE said, he should be prepared to discuss that question fully upon a subsequent clause.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he must complain of the numerous penalties contained in the clause, and he would propose that they should be struck out.

Mr. PIGOTT said, he thought the penalty of 50*l.* very severe, because the candidate would be liable to it if by some mistake he omitted to send in one particular bill. There was also to be a cumulative penalty of 20*l.* for every week of default during which the bills and claims continued not to be sent in to the election officer after the time specified for doing so.

Mr. ELLIOT said, he also considered the penalties very heavy, as the bills and statement of charges might not be sent in merely from accident or excusable oversight. He, therefore, thought notice should be given to the candidate that the time for sending in the claims had expired, and allowing him an extension of the period for doing so—say a week longer.

Mr. WALPOLE said, he thought, as the object of the penalties was merely to secure the sending in of the bills and claims, that the continuing penalty need not be retained.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that if the continuing penalty were omitted from the clause, the candidate might pay the first penalty, and then afterwards defy the law with impunity.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would not object to the cumulative penalty being reduced from 20*l.* to 10*l.*

SIR JOHN WALSH said, he hoped he might be allowed to point out the necessity of clearly defining every term employed by the Bill. Thus, for instance, it would be well to know whether travelling expenses and refreshment tickets would come under the same heading. In the case of the Southampton Election Committee it had been decided that travelling expenses were lawful, and by that means the seat of the Attorney General was saved, though numerous contradictory decisions were on record.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he could not express his opinion too strongly on the point to which the hon. Gentleman had adverted. There was an absolute duty imposed upon Parliament, finally, and he hoped satisfactorily, to settle the question of travelling expenses. It would be better to have the Bill rejected than that it should be passed leaving any part of that question unsettled.

Mr. MASSEY said, he wished to know whether any of the penalties under the Bill were recoverable before the county courts?

Mr. WALPOLE said, that the Select Committee had drawn this distinction—that all penalties for bribery and treating should be recovered in the county courts; while all offences involving the consequences of disfranchisement or disqualification were made recoverable only in the superior courts of law.

Mr. HENLEY said, he wished to know whether it would be lawful for a person to pay a bill after a month had passed by. No doubt many cases would occur by which, from some mischance or other, candidates would be debarred from paying legitimate expenses during the period marked out by the Act. Now, there could be no doubt that, to sensitive and honourable minds, it would be a severe affliction to feel that they had incurred obligations which could not be discharged. For if their seats in Parliament were jeopardised by their defraying those charges, it might end in their remaining due altogether.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that if a tradesman from inadvertence had omitted sending in his bill within the month, although under the Act it would be unlawful to pay it, yet, if it were a fair and reasonable bill, there would be no objection whatever to the candidate paying it.

In answer to Mr. EVELYN DENISON,

Mr. WALPOLE said, that if a bill were paid except through the election officer, it would be illegal, and in consequence the election of the sitting Member might be declared void, but it would be only so declared by a Committee of the House; the question could not be at all brought before the county court.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 21 (No payments to be made except through election officer, and except personal and advertising expenses).

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to know to what period before the election this prohibition referred? Did it extend to the payment of expenses incurred in the registration of voters?

MR. WALPOLE said, that registration expenses formed totally distinct payments, and had nothing whatever to do with the election. The Committee were now coming to the clause enacting that no payments were to be made except through the election officer, so that any breach of this provision might make the election void. The payments which would form exceptions to this rule would of course be contained in other clauses of the Bill. That would give rise to questions as to what you were to include under the head of personal expenses, and what you were to allow the agents to pay as current expenses. He wished, however, now to say that he was willing to admit on both of those points—both as regarded current and personal expenses—that a larger interpretation ought to be put upon them than was put in the Bill. He was willing to allow that these exceptions should cover every legitimate expenditure which was likely to be incurred prior to the election. He proposed, therefore, to leave out the words, “having any connection with the election,” as the retention of those words would extend too widely the operation of the clause.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that the Bill altogether surrounded candidates at elections with a perfect network of penalties, which there would be the greatest possible difficulty in avoiding. In this clause, however, they arrived at the culminating point. If after the election it turned out that a money payment, unauthorised by the election officer, had been made by the candidate or by the authority of the candidate, this fact, if proved before a Committee of the House, would make the election void. Now, was there any necessity for such a provision? The payment might be to the amount of but 5s.; it might be a perfectly honest one, free from any imputation, and a just and legal payment; and yet, because not made through the appointed officer, the election was to be void. He could not sanction a provision of this sort, and should therefore move that these words “upon proof thereof the election of such candidate shall be void” be omitted, and that these words be inserted instead, “and upon proof thereof such candidate shall be subject to a penalty of 10*l.*, to be recovered by any person who shall sue for the same.”

LORD SEYMOUR said, he thought that it would be advisable to insert words into the clause, stating before what tribunal it was necessary that proof of illegal payment should be brought.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that as the loss of a seat was involved, proof must necessarily be brought before an Election Committee.

MR. HILDYARD said, he doubted if an Election Committee would have jurisdiction if words were not introduced, more clearly defining the tribunal before which the proof was to be taken. It seemed to him that it would be necessary to exclude registration expenses under this Bill, because agents might be bribed indirectly in that way. He believed that a great number of election petitions would be presented under the hope of hitting the Member through the operation of this clause. He hoped, however, that the Committee would consent to the Amendment.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL had no objection to strike out the words which involved the loss of a seat, but he considered that 10*l.* was too severe a penalty for an accidental payment.

MR. WALPOLE said, he concurred in the opinion expressed by the noble Lord.

MR. COBDEN said, that by Clause 33 the Member was required to make a declaration on taking his seat to the following effect—

“I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely declare, without any equivocation or mental reservation, that I have not knowingly made, authorised, or sanctioned, and that I will not knowingly make, authorise, or sanction any payment on account of my election, other than is allowed by law under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854.”

Now, if the Member who had taken his seat after that declaration, and who had violated the law, was subjected to a penalty of only 10*l.*, it might appear that they were dealing in a different spirit towards the Member and towards the electors, whom by previous clauses they struck off the lists. In assenting to the Amendment they should take care that they were not acting inconsistently and more leniently towards themselves than towards the electors.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, the hon. Member for the West Riding did not appear to understand clearly the intention of the hon. and learned Member for Ennis’s Amendment. The object of the Amendment was not to avert any consequences of having made a corrupt payment "knowingly." It was to avoid the extreme penalty in cases of accidental payment that the Amendment was proposed.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the question was this—was it intended to assign a time for payments at election time within which the provision was only to operate?

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the Committee, before imposing penalties, ought to define legal and illegal expenses. There were many expenses which, though not necessary, were sanctioned by custom, and were not corrupt. He wished the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) to prepare a schedule of expenses which were to be permitted to be paid. Unless this were done the candidates would be at the mercy of the election officer.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought that no one except the hon. Baronet would think it necessary that the Committee should define whether every expense was legal or illegal before legislating upon this subject. The payments declared to be illegal were not so in themselves, but only if they were made in a particular manner. All corrupt payments had been defined, but others remained exactly as they were.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the question of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had not been clearly answered. As payments were made illegal on account of the time and manner in which they were made, it became of the first consequence to define the time. He hoped that those Gentlemen who had charge of the Bill would throw out something to guide the Committee, in order to arrive at a sound opinion.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he thought that it would be as well, in order to avoid all illegality, to require that all expenses should be paid through the election officer. It was evident that before the election began, it was necessary to incur various expenses. When a person proposed to stand as a candidate, he (Sir F. Kelly) did not see any reason why he should not be required at once to announce his determination, and to pay whatever expenses were necessary through the election officer. When they came to consider the exceptions, he presumed that those who had charge of the Bill would listen with attention to every suggestion offered in respect to the description of payments which might be fairly made before the election.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he viewed the clause with great apprehension. He considered that, as the clause was framed, an innocent person might be compelled to suffer by the act of a guilty individual. As to the publicity of the accounts, he could not understand how the accounts would be made more public by this clause than they would be if it were not passed.

MR. COBDEN said, that it had been stated that they were under this clause legislating as to a particular mode of payment, and not for a corrupt payment, but he begged to remind the Committee that they might be dealing with both under one head. This clause had been carefully considered, and he should be sorry to see a relaxation of the stringent provisions of the Bill made only in favour of the candidate. Were they to agree to the proposed alteration, they would destroy the moral effect of the law and render themselves liable to the imputation of not being in earnest with the subject.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that the relaxation which he proposed referred not to payments that were in themselves illegal, but solely to payments illegal in respect to the hand by which they were made. His object was simply to protect a Member from losing his seat because the payment was made by an illegal hand.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he concurred with the hon. and learned Member as far as this—that he thought they should not declare the election void because a payment was illegally made. He thought, however, they had better not fix any penalty then, but limit the present clause to a declaration that any payment not made through the election officer should be deemed an illegal payment.

MR. STUART WORTLEY hoped that the clause would be postponed, inasmuch as he did not think that the Committee were aware of what its effect would be. By this clause any trifling payment, such as even 5s. to the postboy for driving the candidate in respect to the election, would be sufficient to forfeit his seat.

MR. WALPOLE said, he must remind the Committee that personal expenses included travelling expenses. The question as to what were to be considered personal expenses was, however, a subject for discussion when they came to another portion of the Bill.

MR. PIGOTT said, he also thought there was a difficulty in deciding what were election payments. For instance, candidates were often called upon to contribute towards the repair of a church or to a race fund, and he wanted to know if those subscriptions were to be taken as payment incident to the election.

MR. WALPOLE had no hesitation in saying decidedly not.

MR. HILDYARD said, he must still contend that all this legislation was useless, because bribery would be carried on under the guise of the subscriptions which the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Pigott) had suggested. Suppose a coal fund were established in a borough, and one candidate subscribed 1,000*l.* to it, while the other declined to contribute anything to it, could the Committee have any doubt in deciding which candidate would be returned?

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 148; Noes 67: Majority 81.

House resumed; Committee report progress.

POOR LAW COMMISSION CONTINUANCE (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he would not object to the Bill proceeding, if the Government would consent to retain the Commission for two instead of five years. If not, he should oppose Mr. Speaker's leaving the Chair.

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, he knew the object of the hon. and gallant Member to be to have an inquiry into this Commission. As far as the Commission was concerned, however, he thought it might be as well continued for five as for two years, and the hon. and gallant Member should recollect that the salaries of the Commissioners were subject to the annual Vote of Parliament.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he should support the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Portarlington (Colonel Dunne). Without a full inquiry he could not consent to the renewal of the Commission for five years.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

House in Committee.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he should move that the Chairman should report progress.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would suggest that the hon. and gallant Colonel should then proceed with any statement with reference to the Bill which he desired to make.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that if he were to do that, the majority at present in the House would carry the Bill in its present form, as it had carried many other measures injurious to his (Colonel Dunne's) country. He believed the Poor Law had inflicted more injury on Ireland than almost any other, except one or two. He did not object to a Poor Law, but he objected to the great and unnecessary expense of the present system, and to other parts of that system which were unjust, and he wished for a thorough inquiry. He thought it not unreasonable to ask that the Bill should be limited to two years, within which time the inquiry he was anxious for might take place. He regretted there were not more Irish Members present, and inasmuch as it was too late to discuss the matter now, he must persist in his Motion to report progress.

MR. I. BUTT said, he also protested against proceeding with the consideration of the Bill at that late hour (a quarter past one o'clock).

LORD NAAS should support his hon. and gallant Friend in his Motion if any question in connection with the Bill before them should arise which required discussion. At the same time, he must observe that he was in favour of continuing the powers of the present Poor Law Commission for five years, as proposed by the Bill.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 90: Majority 62.

The Bill then passed through Committee. House resumed; Bill reported without amendment.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

On Clause 181, which provides that wages shall not be dependent on the earning of freight,

LORD CAMPBELL objected to the clause, and observed that there was an old maxim that "freight was the mother of wages," or, in other words, that in case a ship went to the bottom, no wages were paid. If any part of a ship were saved from a wreck and sold, then the seamen were entitled to their wages from the sum received; but if the ship, cargo, and stores were all lost, then no wages were paid. This regulation was a matter of public policy, and incited the seamen to exert themselves to the utmost in the case of a wreck, and to stick to the last plank, in the hope that something might be saved. The regulation was also for their own advantage, for it increased their exertion, and enabled owners to give, upon the whole, better wages than they would otherwise. He thought those nations had acted wisely and humanely who had adhered to the rule that, unless a sailor brought his ship safe to port, having earned freight, he should have no right to his wages. The proposed enactment was contrary to the principle of the Bill, which was intended to consolidate, not to alter, the fundamental principles of the existing law relating to merchant shipping. He, therefore, felt it his duty to move the omission of the clause.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that, though the maxim quoted by the noble and learned Lord, that "freight is the mother of wages," certainly prevailed in all countries, nevertheless, their practice differed so much from the principle involved in the maxim, that it could no longer be considered applicable. Neither was it any argument that the clause was at variance with the laws of other nations, for many of our best laws differed from the law of other nations. The decisions given by Lord Stowell were to the effect, that if a ship came back to port without having earned any freight, and even in case of a wreck, the sailors would have a right to their wages, and the 7 & 8

"freight is the mother of wages," enacted that a sailor should be entitled to recover his wages, even if no freight had been earned; and if the vessel were wrecked immediately after leaving port, in case the master or mate should certify that the sailor had exerted himself properly to save the vessel. This clause only extended that provision a little further, by enacting that a sailor should have a right to recover in either of the cases mentioned, unless it should be proved that he had misconducted himself. If the maxim were rigidly applied, the effect would be to make the seamen demand higher wages, in order to compensate them for the chances of no wages where no freight was earned. A little reflection must, he thought, convince every one that this provision was only based on justice and fair dealing, and, indeed, he was bound to say, that in almost every case liberal and fair-minded ship-owners made no difficulty in paying the sailors their wages under such circumstances. There were some, however, who insisted on abiding by the strict letter of the law, and it was to prevent the injustice which might occur in such cases that the present alteration was made.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, the policy of the law was, that the safety of the ship was the only kind of security which the sailor had for his wages. By the 7 & 8 Vict. a sailor could only recover his wages, in the event of the ship being lost, in case the master or owner gave him a certificate that he had done all he could to save the ship. He thought that the law ought to go further, and compel the party to give such certificate. He thought, however, that the present clause went too far. It involved a most serious change in the law, and in his opinion required much consideration.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR hoped that their Lordships would not interfere with the clause. If it were allowed to be an improvement, he could not understand why they should be deterred from altering the law on the ground that they would be acting differently to other countries. Surely it was not desirable to permit the law to say to the sailor that he should not have his wages, because the owner had lost his freight. He knew that the policy of the existing law was to make the sailor stick to the last plank of the vessel. But that was a question between the owner and the sailor. If the sailor be bound to enter into a contract by which he would only receive his wages under peculiar circumstances, of course he must necessarily demand higher terms than if his wages were to be paid him under every contingency. It should be recollected that the owners could insure their freight, but the sailor could not insure his wages. He admitted that this clause would subvert the existing law, and it was meant to do so, with a view of benefiting a large and meritorious class of persons.

LORD CAMPBELL thought it would be most mischievous if the law of England differed on this subject from that of other nations. Commercial nations formed one community and one society, and it was most desirable that uniformity should prevail in their commercial law. He contended that there was a presumption in favour of a practice which existed everywhere and among all other maritime nations, and existed, too, as far as he knew, without exciting any ground of complaint.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE could conceive nothing more unjust than that sailors, who might have rendered very important service in the working of a ship, should be denied their wages. Many cases had happened where a master insured his ship, and then took an opportunity of losing her on purpose, and afterwards received compensation for the vessel, while he saved the wages of the seamen. It would be a great wrong if the seamen in such a case were to be defrauded of their wages.

PUBLIC REVENUE AND CONSOLIDATED FUND CHARGES BILL.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that as a noble Lord had given notice that he would propose to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, he thought it desirable that before moving the third reading he should make a short statement as to the nature of the measure. The object of the Bill was twofold. It proposed to bring into the public Exchequer the gross revenue of the com-

try, leaving the expenses of collection to be provided for, as were the expenses of other departments, by the annual vote of Parliament; and it proposed, in the second place, to remove from the Consolidated Fund certain salaries and other payments now charged upon it, and to place them, by annual votes, under the control and revision of Parliament. These objects were similar in their kind, because the sums charged on the public revenue and those placed on the Consolidated Fund were both equally removed from the consideration of Parliament. The manner in which it was proposed to deal with these objects in the Bill was threefold. In the first place, with regard to certain hereditary pensions now charged upon certain branches of the public revenue, it was proposed to leave them as they are; but it was proposed, through the medium of private negotiations—which negotiations had in fact been commenced—to buy them up, in a manner which it was hoped would prove advantageous to the public, and which would certainly remove an existing anomaly. With regard to the Judges, Scotch sheriffs, and other legal officers of that description, it was proposed to leave their salaries on the Consolidated Fund; but with regard to all the other salaries named in the Bill, and not included in the above category, it was proposed to submit them to the annual revision of the House of Commons. These objects were carried out by the first clause of the Bill and the schedule applying to it, and by certain provisions for bringing into conformity with the Parliamentary financial year all the annual accounts connected with the Consolidated Fund and the funds belonging to the Exchequer. One clause provided for certain quarterly payments being made at periods different from the present; and the last clause but one made provision for paying out of the Consolidated Fund certain sums now received in the way of fees. The great objects of this Bill had been very often pressed on the attention of the House of Commons, and on successive Governments; and it was one that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the late Government announced to the House of Commons it was his intention to bring under their consideration. The subject had at length been taken up, and was now submitted to their Lordships for their approval. The noble Lord (Lord Montagu) proposed to send the Bill to a Select Committee, but he must say it was not a usual practice to refer a Bill, which they could not alter without interfering with the privileges of the other House, to a Select Committee. He hoped the noble Lord would make it clear to the House what the object of this reference to a Select Committee was. If their Lordships disapproved the principle of the Bill, it would be better to reject it altogether than to have it hereafter rejected on a question of privilege by the other House of Parliament. But it might be that a majority of the House were in favour of the principle of the Bill, while there were some of their Lordships who objected to certain salaries in the schedules being removed from the Consolidated Fund, and placed under the annual revision of Parliament, and he would venture to make an observation or two on that subject. All the great judicial officers had been excepted from the operation of the Bill, and even since its introduction the Master of the Rolls had been so excepted. There remained three classes of persons who would be subjected to an annual vote of the House of Commons, and whose retention in this position he understood to be objected to. These were the Commissioners of Lunacy, the police magistrates, and the revising barristers. With regard to some arguments that had been used that it would be an indignity to persons exercising judicial functions to take office if their salaries were subjected to the annual control of Parliament, he thought there must be some exaggeration on this subject. The Commissioners of the Insolvent Courts had always been subject to an annual vote, but no one ever heard that it was an indignity offered to them, or that it created any difficulty in finding proper persons to discharge the duties. He could quite understand that some noble and learned Lords wished to do all honour to their profession, and were fired with the idea of making independent of Parliamentary control all persons whatever who exercised judicial functions. But if they were to ask what constituted a judicial function, he ventured to say that there was no person connected with the conduct of the revenue department who was not called upon to exercise judicial functions. The Commissioners of Excise and Customs, for example, exercised judicial functions of a particularly invidious character connected with the raising of taxes, and which affected those who belonged to that most influential class who were likely to have their interests represented in the other House of Parliament. If, therefore, they were to put on the Consolidated Fund persons who exercised much less invidious functions than the Customs or Excise Commissioners, then they must except those Commissioners also. He hoped their Lordships would feel that great care and delicacy should be exercised by them with regard to such a Bill as the present, after it had been fully discussed and passed by the House of Commons, and that they would do nothing that would lead to the rejection of such a Bill without necessary cause. He therefore hoped their Lordships would agree to the third reading of the Bill, and not consent to its being referred to a Select Committee.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3^d.

LORD MONTEAGLE then rose to move that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. His object in recommending that course was, that the House might examine in the only way in which it could do so with effect the various objections to which the measure was justly liable, and because he despaired of being able to do justice to those objections in a Committee of the whole House, and still more so on the Motion for the third reading of the Bill. He therefore thought it essential that it should be sent before a Select Committee in order that it might be there considered in all its details. As he saw that farther Estimates were to be submitted to the other House that evening, he did not suppose that if the result of inquiry should prove—not that a Bill on this subject was unnecessary—but, that the present Bill was open to such serious objections that it ought not to be agreed to, the noble Lord who had moved the third reading would have any difficulty in introducing and passing a better measure even during the present Session. His objections to the Bill were mainly to the first and last clauses—the other clauses referred to details, which comparatively were matters of indifference. There were few charges brought under Parliamentary control by this Bill, which had not been exempted from the charges of an annual vote on deliberation and on adequate grounds. These charges had been purposely created in such a manner as to be freed from such control. He therefore contended that, both on grounds of political expediency and positive justice, the Bill ought not to pass. The transfer of a salary from the Consolidated Funds to the Votes of Supply deprived the individual to whom it was payable of the legal security he previously possessed, but it subjected one who had an inherent right to his office to the double caprice of a Minister and of the House of Commons. The Minister might refuse to present the estimate, the Committee of Supply might reject the Vote. It was true that there was a clause saving the rights of existing holders of offices, but this was done incompletely and inconsistently; and even had it protected the present holders of office, his objection would apply as soon as the offices became vacant. The Masters of the Rolls and the Masters in Chancery of Ireland, though judicial offices, had originally been transferred to the Committee of Supply, though as an after-thought they had been excepted from the Bill. If on grounds of general policy it had been found expedient to except certain officers exercising judicial functions, it could not be otherwise than wrong that the provisions of the Bill should be made to apply to others of the same class, for instance, to the Commissioners of Lunacy, who exercised judicial functions of no ordinary character; and these Commissioners were to be subjected hereafter to an annual Vote in Committee of Supply. So likewise would be the police magistrates. Then there was the case of the revising barristers: to submit the salaries of these officers, who ought to be kept peculiarly free from the control of the House of Commons, was to return to the system which prevailed upon the first establishment of such officers, and which was amended by the Government of Sir Robert Peel, in 1843, under the Registration Amendment Act, by which their salaries were properly charged upon the Consolidated Fund. They were, therefore, by the present Bill reversing the Parliamentary decision of 1843. While it was proposed thus to deal with the salaries of revising officers in England, the Government had not ventured to adopt a similar course with regard to the salaries of the revising barristers of Ireland, who, though it was true that they were assistant barristers, received a distinct remuneration for revising the lists of voters. These instances, without adverting to many others, showed that the Bill had not been framed with proper precision and accuracy. But he would mention another case. The Clerk of the Crown was a most important public officer, and held his patent office during good behaviour. That office was a charge upon the Consolidated Fund. Under this Bill, as drawn up, the holder's interest was affected, and the charge was transferred from the Consolidated Fund. If there was any one officer beyond another who ought to be independent of an annual Vote, it was the Clerk of the Crown. He issued the election writs, and ought not to be brought before the Committee of Supply. The Clerk of the Patents was dealt with in the same fashion. On what principle then, he would ask, was the Bill framed? Was it on a saving of existing legal rights? That principle he had shown was not uniformly or consistently carried out. A variety of offices had, from the Union, been charged on the gross revenue, before it was transmitted to the Exchequer. The parties had an interest in their salaries for life, or during good behaviour. It was evident that such regrets secured by Act of Parliament, could not be interfered with consistently with the principles of good faith. The life interests of all such persons in England were charged on the Consolidated Fund, and they were protected by the exemption which the Government were compelled to adopt whilst the Bill was in progress. But these Scotch charges being payable out of gross revenue and not out of the Consolidated Fund, were deprived of their legal security, and were subjected to an annual Vote. If these offices were in England, the provisions of the Bill would not come into operation during the lifetime of the parties, but in the Scotch cases it would come into immediate operation. Take, for example, the case of Lion King-at-Arms. The salary of that officer was paid out of the Scotch revenues. If it came under the English provision, the right of the Earl of Kinnoul would have been respected, but in the case of Scotland it would be transferred to the Committee of Supply. He presumed not to inquire how his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Eglinton), who so loudly complained of the indignity offered to the Lion in the Scotch escutcheon, would tolerate the injustice to the Lord Lion King-at-Arms. History taught that under the ancient cry of Christianos ad Leones much cruelty was perpetrated, and future Committees of Supply might not be more merciful, if Parliament were now to pronounce a sentence of Leonem ad Christianos. There was another class of cases in which a Parliamentary compact would be violated and injustice done. How would the London parishes be affected by this Bill? A bargain had been made with certain parishes that upon the payment by them of a fixed sum towards the charge of the metropolitan police, they should be entitled as a right to a contribution from the Consolidated Fund. That payment was about to be transferred to the Committee of Supply, and the parishes would have no security for the performance of this engagement beyond the caprice of the Government or the Committee of Supply. Again, take the case of the Secretary of the Irish Education Commissioners. Power was given to them to appoint a secretary. The charge fell upon the Consolidated Fund; but two or three days ago the secretary, who had given up his profession to accept this well-secured income, found that this Bill would deprive him of the solid security given to him by law, and that his salary would be in future held at the discretion of the Government. Even supposing the principle of the Bill to be right, the cases to which he had referred abundantly proved the violation of the principle laid down by the Government. He now proceeded to another part of the question, which was even more important than the points to which he had alluded. Of what did the public complain most loudly in reference to the conduct of both Houses of Parliament? They complained, and perhaps but too justly, that their duties as legislators were imperfectly performed. Year after year measures were thrown aside to such an extent that "the day of massacre of the innocents" was a term which had become a proverb, and described a period annually recurring in the Parliamentary Calendar. The present Government, as well as their predecessors, had had one antagonist more formidable than all their political opponents united. That antagonist was Time. Some of the most salutary measures had been defeated by what was called by courtesy "the period of the Session." The effect of this Bill would be to throw still greater obstacles in the way of proceeding with important measures. The increased number of miscellaneous Votes might hereafter double the time now appropriated to such financial purposes, and to that extent would lessen the time applicable to legislative functions; this would necessarily bring Bills to their Lordships' House at such a period of the Session that they would have no alternative but to pass them without consideration, or to reject them in a manner which might be misconceived and misconstrued elsewhere. The success and popularity of a Government naturally depended upon the number of good and useful measures to which it could appeal at the end of the Session as having carried; but already the Government had been compelled to throw over the Divorce Bill, the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, the Regulation Bill, Landlord and Tenant Bill for Ireland, the County Constabulary Bill, the Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill, the Corrupt Boroughs Bill, the Colonial Clergy Bill, and, above all, the Law of Settlement Bill; all these matters were of importance, greater or less, and all related to the internal welfare of the country. And how many more such measures would have to be sacrificed hereafter, on account of the increased number of Votes proposed to be taken in Committee of Supply—most of them Votes which would not only lead to discussion, but must inevitably excite angry debate and discussion? The number and amount of the miscellaneous Votes had gone on gradually increasing, and the following statement would show their progress from time to time:—Average of ten years, from 1798 to 1807, 1,800,000*l.*; ditto, 1809 to 1817, 2,162,000*l.*; ditto, 1818 to 1827, 2,115,000*l.*; ditto, 1828 to 1837, 2,269,000*l.*; ditto, 1838-9 to 1847-8, 3,016,000*l.*; ditto, 1851, 3,948,000*l.*; ditto, 1852, 4,407,000*l.*; ditto, 1853, 4,812,000*l.* The miscellaneous Votes for 1854 would amount to 4,052,000*l.*; and if this Bill were passed, the enormous sum of upwards of 5,000,000*l.* would be added to the Votes in the Miscellaneous Estimates. He was the last person to doubt the right or expediency of the House of Commons acting as guardians of the taxation of the country. That right he had never contested. But although he acquiesced in the claim set up by the House of Commons, he could not abandon the peculiar rights of their Lordships, as a branch of the Legislature and would point out the manner in which they would be acted upon by the Bill as it now stood. Let their Lordships suppose two contending principles occupying the public mind—one the principle of direct, the other the principle of indirect taxation, these principles being, for example, represented by the malt duty and the property tax—and let them suppose a majority of the House of Commons eager to decide in favour of one or other of these antagonistic principles by repealing an unpopular fiscal burthen. At present this could only be done by a legislative Act, in which their Lordships would be called upon to take part. But the present Bill, by placing the voting of the expense of collecting the whole of the revenue upon the Committee of Supply, would enable the House of Commons, by one single vote, cutting off the amount of money required for the collection of a given tax without concert with their Lordships, without the formality of an Act of Parliament, to put an end to that tax. Their Lordships ought to protect themselves and the public against such a course of proceeding. Besides all these objections, he must complain the Bill was drawn up with singular haste, looseness, and inaccuracy; for instance, the Legislature was required in seven or eight cases to enact an etcetera, in what ought to be always the most precise and well defined, namely, the appropriation of the public money, as for example, he found the expression "salaries of inspectors, &c." This was surely unbearable. We have heard old complaints of an etcetera oath, but an etcetera vote of money was still more absurd. But the most gross and most extraordinary inaccuracy he had ever known was contained in the last page of the Bill, where it specified "charges of collection and management of the revenue, superannuations, pensions, &c., of Customs and Inland Revenue," as payable under "various Acts." Now these charges were mostly not payable under any Act of Parliament at all. The revenue was not collected by virtue of any Act of Parliament, but by the prerogative of the Crown, to whom the revenue was voted. On this point he could quote very high authority. In the course of a discussion which took place in the other House of Parliament last year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"He was loth to say that any constitutional principle had been violated by the present practice, because that practice had uniformly prevailed in this country at all periods of its history, and under all systems of government, and because he believed that the supervision of the revenue was part of the known and established prerogatives of the Crown."

The opinion of past Governments upon this subject had been referred to, and no doubt the idea of carrying the gross revenue into the Exchequer was thrown out by the late Government, but no measure on that subject was proposed by that Government. A mere suggestion of that kind was not sufficient to show that the present Government had the sanction of their predecessors to this particular Bill. This very same subject was brought under the consideration of the Government of Lord Grey, and a Commission was appointed to consider whether changes of this kind were expedient or not expedient. To the Report of that Commission the most authoritative names were attached; and it recommended the change, but on consideration Lord Grey and Lord Spencer decided that the scheme was inexpedient, and it was not carried into effect. He had shown that the Bill contained principles of injustice—that it dealt with judicial offices with which Parliament had no right to deal as was now proposed—that it dealt with persons who had a permanent right in their offices—that it divested them of their present title and gave them an insecure and inferior title—that in cases where the right of the existing officer was saved, the principle was violated in the case of his successor—that in the case of Scotch offices, the principle was set aside altogether—that the Bill was full of anomalies, and an act of spoliation, the equal of which he had never heard of in the Statute law of England; he therefore trusted they would at once refer the matter to a Select Committee, in order that it might be more fully considered.

Amendment moved, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Motion, for the purpose of inserting "the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."

LORD BROUGHAM said, he entirely agreed with his noble Friend in the whole of his argument, both as to the independence of the office bearers, violated by the Bill, and as to the independence of their Lordships' House, violated in a most important particular, to which he would add, the inconvenience sure to result, not only to their Lordships' House, but to the other House of Parliament, from the addition of he knew not how many days to the, at present, all but endless discussions of the items of the Estimates in Committee of Supply. But it was to the interference with the independence of a great class of officers, some of them judicial, others quasi-judicial, that he most objected. The result would be to drag to the Treasury a vast number of officers, and make them more or less dependent upon the Secretary to the Treasury for the time being. They would not only be dependent upon the Treasury, but, to a certain degree, upon the House of Commons also, so far as any discussion in that House was sure to result from their salaries being voted in Committee of Supply. Take the case of the police magistrates—one of the items mentioned in the schedule. A police magistrate did not hold his office for life, or during good behaviour; he was liable to be removed by the Crown, and might be removed at any time by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The consequence was, that the police magistrate did not take the benefit of that saving clause which was intended to save vested interests, because they were not of that description of officers who held their places during life or good behaviour. This would be adding a new item to their dependence, for they would be dependent not only on the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being for their emoluments, but their conduct would be scrutinised and debated in the House of Commons when their salaries came under discussion. He did not wish in the slightest degree to trench upon the privileges of the House of Commons, or upon the just prerogatives which it exercised in carefully scrutinising the conduct of all public officers;—but he thought, if there were any one office which ought to be exempt from unnecessary discussion and unnecessary criticism in Parliament, it was the office of the man who had the delicate duty cast upon him of the administration of justice in the police courts. Without entering into particulars, or any minute retrospective references, he might appeal to their Lordships, whether it would have been expedient, at certain periods of their history, that the conduct of persons charged with the performance of such a delicate duty as that of superintending the police of the country, and particularly the police of the metropolis, should have been made matter of discussion. Take, again, the case of the revising barristers. If there was any man more than another who ought to hold his office independently, and without the possibility of Government influence, it was the individual employed in the delicate and important duty of ascertaining the validity of the claims of persons seeking to vote for Members to serve in Parliament. He would entreat their Lordships to reflect whether, without further inquiry, they would sanction a measure which would deliver over to the discretion of the House of Commons such a multitude of offices, and of equal necessity prevent their Lordships from exercising their just privileges. He thought it would be far better to adopt the Amendment of his noble Friend for a Select Committee, which was, in point of fact, a Motion for inquiry.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had listened attentively to the speeches of the two noble Lords, but he had been unable to perceive any argument which should interfere with the usual course of proceeding in reference to money Bills coming up from the other House of Parliament. His noble Friend (Earl Granville) had explained to the House the two main branches into which the measure was divided. With regard to the first, the schedule of salaries and allowances now paid out of the Consolidated Fund, the whole argument used against the Bill proceeded upon the unfounded supposition that it was the rule to charge salaries upon the Consolidated Fund, and that it was the exception to vote them. Now, the fact was precisely opposite. Large portions of all the salaries were voted in the annual Estimates. Exception had been taken to the introduction into the schedule of a certain number of offices which were said to be either of a judicial or a quasi-judicial character; but in reply, he must observe, that there was hardly any office which involved the exercise of great administrative functions which might not be said to be of a quasi-judicial character. All offices which were strictly judicial had been excluded from the schedule, and left charged upon the Consolidated Fund, and in his opinion they had been rightly so left, because he thought they ought to adhere to the principle that all persons who were engaged in the administration of the law ought to be placed beyond the reach of a casual Vote of the House of Commons. But he thought that they were carrying the principle to an absurd extent, when they said that quasi-judicial officers ought to be placed upon the same footing. If they were prepared to go that length they must not only go further, but must go back—they must not only retain on the Consolidated Fund such offices of that description as were now chargeable upon it, but they must remove from their present position, and place upon the same footing, a great number of such offices which were now included in the annual Votes. He had heard no answer to the argument of his noble Friend, that the Insolvent Commissioners were placed upon the annual Votes, notwithstanding that they had, as nobody could deny, not merely quasi-judicial, but strictly judicial, duties to perform. But it was said that there were certain other offices which ought not to be included in this schedule, not because they were judicial, but because they involved the exercise of a very large and a very delicate discretion, and exposed those who were called upon to fill them to local influence and popular clamour. But what administrative department in this country had more difficult or delicate duties to perform—duties which required greater independence on the part of those on whom they might devolve, which exposed them more to local influence, or which were more likely to provoke popular outcry—than the Poor Law Board and the Board of Health. Yet these were upon the annual Votes; and so were the Dublin police magistrates, whose duties were as much judicial in their character as those of the police magistrates of this metropolis. He maintained, therefore, that the schedule of this Bill was quite consistent with the ordinary course. Up to the present moment the placing of these salaries upon the annual Votes had been the rule, and those which had been charged on the Consolidated Fund were the exceptions. The Bill provided that existing interests should be protected; and he could not agree with his noble Friend that in thus keeping faith with the individuals they were doing anything to cast a doubt upon the general principle and policy of the measure. On all these grounds he thought the reference to a Select Committee was unnecessary, and he deprecated the adoption of that course as an unusual interference with the ordinary course of business. With respect to the other part of the Bill, by which it was proposed to bring the charges for collecting the revenue under the annual control of Parliament, he could not understand how any noble Lord could argue, as a question of principle, that that was a course which ought not to be adopted. He had in fact heard no argument against it, except that it would lead to delay; and, in answer to that, he would observe that if, as had been suggested, the other House of Parliament should postpone their measures until it was too late for their Lordships' House to consider them, they had remedies for such a state of things in their own power. If, therefore, it were a mere question of time, he thought they might safely leave it to be dealt with by the House of Commons. He thought his noble Friend must have been very hard pressed for an argument when he said that the House of Commons might put an end to a tax, without the concurrence of their

Lordships, by cutting off the cost of collecting it.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought it quite right that the charges for collecting the revenue should come under the consideration of the House of Commons; and as that matter had been referred to as having been under the consideration of the Government of which he (the Earl of Derby) was a Member, he would state that the intention of that Government was so far to fall in with the view of the noble Duke who had just sat down as to bring under the control of the House of Commons, not the net receipts of the Customs and Excise and other sources of revenue, but the gross amount of that revenue, and to let it vote the annual cost of collecting it. If this Bill had gone no further than that, he should not only not have said a word against it, but should have given it his cordial concurrence. But the Bill went much further, for his noble Friend had clearly pointed out that it brought into the annual Estimates, and under the annual control of Parliament, various classes of persons who had hitherto been purposely exempted from it. In the first place, it brought under that control certain judicial and quasi-judicial officers; and as all their Lordships admitted the proposition that officers of that description ought not to be placed upon the Votes, all that his noble Friend asked was, that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, with a view to ascertain what officers were included in the schedule who came properly under the denomination which, they all agreed, ought not to be included in it. Then there were other persons, who, in consideration of offices abandoned, or of alterations made for the convenience and advantage of the public, had had granted to them certain compensations charged on the Consolidated Fund. It was impossible for Her Majesty's Government to contend that such persons would not be placed in a worse position than at present by the alterations made by this Bill. It was true that all life interests charged on the Consolidated Fund were to be protected; but the benefit of the protecting clause would not extend to those life interests which were charged (as some in Scotland were) on the hereditary revenues of the Crown, or on the Customs or Excise. The police magistrates also, as the noble and learned Lord had pointed out, not being appointed during good behaviour, would be brought by this Bill under the control of Parliament. But the noble Duke said that there were some officers of a similar class to some of those which had been enumerated who were now paid by annual Vote, and that if the principle contended for by his noble Friend were to be adopted, they ought to go much further and apply that principle to those officers also. This argument came exceedingly well from the noble Duke, who had stated the other day that having committed one injustice was a very good reason for committing another. But he (the Earl of Derby) could not see why, if they had committed an injustice in placing certain officers upon the annual Votes who ought not properly to have been placed there—

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had spoken of it as a matter of policy, and not as a matter of justice. There could be no question of injustice with respect to persons who had accepted these offices on the understanding that their salaries would be annually voted.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Well, then, if they had committed an act of impolicy in placing certain officers upon the annual Votes who ought not properly to have been placed there, was that a reason why they should commit an act of impolicy accompanied by an act of injustice with respect to other officers who had hitherto had the security of a permanent income? He would not go through the provisions of the Bill. It appeared to him that the House of Commons was taking on itself by this measure a very invidious and a very laborious duty, and subjecting individuals to a great deal of injustice. He thought that the measure was one which the House of Lords ought to have the opportunity of fully and deliberately considering—that it was impossible that the House itself could enter into the details of all these various offices to which the Bill would apply—and that the proposal to refer it to a Select Committee, not for the purpose of destroying the principle for which the noble Duke contended, by bringing the cost of collecting the revenue under the control of Parliament, but of seeing how and to what extent the schedule would apply, was therefore just and reasonable. They were agreed upon the principle on which they ought to legislate; there was still sufficient time to introduce another measure which should be free from the objections which had been so forcibly urged against this; and even if there were not, the matter was not so pressing as that it might not, without any great public inconvenience, stand over for consideration to the commencement of another Session.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he had received a letter from an able and learned police magistrate, Mr. Jardine, representing the expediency of exempting police magistrates from an annual discussion in the House of Commons. In that opinion he entirely concurred, and he could not conscientiously vote for the Bill in its present shape, although he approved the proposal for placing the revenue under the control of the House of Commons.

EARL GRANVILLE observed that, in deference to what appeared to be the feeling of their Lordships, he would consent to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee, on the understanding that the principle of the measure should not be destroyed in the Committee.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON expressed his gratification at the course taken by the noble Earl, and remarked that in its present form the Bill violated the 20th Article of the Treaty of Union with Scotland.

THE INCLOSURE COMMISSION—QUESTION.

MR. AGLIONBY said, he believed this would be a proper opportunity for asking a question connected with the Minister of War. He referred to the removal of the Inclosure Commission from the house in which they had been located to make room for the War Minister. He did not think that the Government was aware of the importance of keeping the Commission where it was. He did not mean merely the Commissioners and their clerks, but he spoke in behalf of the public and of the landowners of the country, who were most interested in the question. The Commission had in its keeping some 75,000 documents and maps connected with land. The House and the Government could not be aware that the Commission had been removed already four times, and when it was removed from Somerset House to its present office in Whitehall, it took two months to effect its removal and six months for the rearrangement of its documents, and the arrangement was, at present, most perfect for the purposes of inspection. Neither, he apprehended, could the Government be aware that at least eighty persons were at the office every day inquiring for, or inspecting, documents relating to titles, copyholds, and inclosures; and in the space of three minutes any one could see the map or document he required.

MR. WILSON said, with regard to what had been stated by the hon. Member for Cocker mouth (Mr. Aglionby), he could only say that the Treasury had used every possible exertion to secure a suitable place for the Minister of War without disturbing the Inclosure Commissioners, and it was not till it was found impossible to obtain a place for the Minister of War near to the other Government offices in Downing Street, that it was determined to remove the Commissioners to St. James's Square, where, he was told, the house was quite suitable for them, and containing every convenience that they now enjoyed. It was of more importance that the Minister of War should have his offices near Downing Street than for the Inclosure Commissioners to remain there.

SUPPLY—WAR DEPARTMENT.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Mr. Bouverie, I am about to place on the table the Estimate for the present year, ending 31st March, 1855, of the sums required to defray the expenses of the Secretary of State for the War Department; and in doing so I beg to recall to the attention of the Committee what has passed on former occasions upon this subject. I think it was my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) who, early in the Session, stated his opinion—repeatedly expressed before—that the military departments in this country ought to be brought together, and that a special Secretary of State for the War Department ought to have efficient control over these military departments.

A right hon. Gentleman whom I see opposite (Sir J. Pakington), and who has been Secretary of State for the Colonies, added his opinion, that the Secretary of State for the Colonies, although he was nominally Secretary of State for War, had not the means in his department to carry into effect those resolutions which he might think necessary for the public service. At a later period the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) asked me a question in reference to this subject, and certainly received a very general assent from the House when he said that he hoped there would be a Minister of War. In answer to him, I stated that the subject was under the consideration of the Government. A little later I said that the Government had determined that the departments of Secretary of State for War and the Colonies should be divided, and that further arrangements were in contemplation. I have now to give the Committee a general outline of the changes that have so been made. In the first place, I beg to remind the Committee that I stated that two questions came under consideration together, though of a very different character. The one was, whether in time of war it is desirable to keep united the offices of Secretary for War and for the Colonies; and the other was, whether, with a view to public convenience in the arrangement of the business of the departments, it is desirable to make other changes with regard to the military departments, and to simplify and consolidate the business which they have to transact. With reference to the first question, the Committee is aware that during the late war the Secretary of State for War and the Colonies could devote his time and attention to the business of the war—to the fitting out of expeditions and the other military arrangements—the colonial business at that time occupying only a comparatively small portion of his time. Since the peace, and especially during the last twenty years, the business of the Colonial Secretary has very greatly increased. In almost every colony—even in some of the military colonies—there have been discussions with respect to arrangements for the control of the public expenditure, and many questions, some of the highest and gravest importance, have arisen in our several colonies. It therefore appeared to the Government that, considering that question alone, it was not desirable to keep these offices united, and that, although it was physically possible for a person of great decision, of great habits of business, and of health which should be uninterrupted, to go through the business somehow or other, of the two departments, yet that it was desirable to separate them for the sake of the efficient discharge of the duties of each. The questions that would come before a Secretary of State in each department might be of the utmost importance. The fitting out of an expedition, the troops that are to compose it, the points to which it is to be directed, the means that are to be employed, are all subjects involving questions that would require the sole and undivided attention of a man of the utmost practice in public business. On the other hand, although it might happen that the consideration of ordinary colonial questions might often be postponed, still from time to time there do arise questions that cannot be deferred consistently with the order and with the satisfaction of the Colonies, and which require, both as to their principle and details, the undivided attention of the Secretary of State. On these grounds, therefore, seeing the great war in which we are engaged, the Government thought that these departments should be divided. With reference to the other question—which, as I said, is of a totally different nature—it is one that has from time to time occupied the attention of former Governments. It was not long after Earl Grey's Administration was formed that the Duke of Richmond represented to Earl Grey that it was very desirable to inquire whether the military departments might not be consolidated with considerable advantage to the conduct of public business. A very extensive inquiry was made into that subject by a Commission consisting, besides the Duke of Richmond, of the right hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) and of Sir James Kemp. There was also employed, as secretary to the Commission, a gentleman of considerable ability, Mr. John Bissett, once Commissary General in the Peninsula. But, although the Duke of Richmond arrived at conclusions in which I was ready to concur, the Government did not think fit to adopt them, in consequence of the practical difficulty of putting them in force. At a later period of time the present Earl Grey, when Secretary at War, assisted by some of his Colleagues, made very extensive inquiries, and proposed a different scheme of arrangements. To that scheme of arrangements, which consisted mainly in placing the Secretary at War in the position, though with the functions and the proper attributes, of a Secretary of State, there were some objections, arising from the nature of the department, and there were also other practical objections of a most forcible nature which were stated by the late Duke of Wellington and the late Marquess of Londonderry. That plan was not adopted, and I do not know that any subsequent Government has proposed any inquiry into the subject. And although, from time to time, up to the present day, several changes have been under consideration, no material or organic change has been adopted. In considering this subject, it has appeared to the Government that the chief inconvenience that we have to complain of is, that, the military departments being divided into several heads, there is no supreme head to administer those departments generally. I have stated on former occasions that I do not think it is any fault that separate official persons should have separate duties, although they may belong generally to one department. As in the construction of this House, for instance, it would be absurd to endeavour to consolidate and join the departments of the mason, the carpenter, and the bricklayer, but it would be equally absurd to have three or four architects, who should give different opinions as to the general construction of the building. What is wanted, therefore, is one supreme head, who should be able to take into his view the wants, the requirements, and the duties of the several departments, and to govern them with full information and with decision, and be able to come to a final conclusion on the subjects which occupied his attention. One of the departments which it is most obvious should be placed under a Minister of War is the Commissariat, which is now a department of the Treasury. There are reasons for that arrangement, connected not so much with the distribution of provisions and supply of arms, or what the Duke of Richmond called the feeding the army, as with the financial operations which the Treasury has to perform in distant parts of the empire. Now, although the Treasury should have the general superintendence of the financial concerns of the public, there does not seem any convenience, but the contrary, in an officer of the Treasury having the regulation of the arrangement and distribution of rations to the troops. That is business which does not properly belong to a department which has the general supervision and control of the finances of the country; it is an executive function of itself, and, therefore, should belong rather to an executive Minister, such as a Secretary of State, than to the department of the Treasury. The Government, therefore, are of opinion that, besides what I have stated as to the general direction of the operations of the war, the Minister Secretary of State for War should take the direction of the Commissariat Department. With respect to other questions, there are many changes which have to be considered; but few which can at once be carried into effect. In considering this subject, I remember that the late Duke of Wellington gave the opinion that the Master General of the Ordnance was properly the officer who ought to be the military adviser of the Government, that he, being in possession of the military wants of the country, should be best able from time to time to give the Cabinet such advice as he should think proper on military topics. But although this is apparently, and may be occasionally, a very good arrangement, it is obvious that it can very seldom be practicable. If you could find on ordinary occasions a general who had taken a political part and held the same opinions as the Members of the Government, supposing him to be in the prime of life, and his opinions in regard to military subjects very generally held in esteem, it would seem very fit, whether he were to be called the Master General of the Ordnance or by some other name, that he should be the military adviser of the Government. But such a concurrence of circumstances is very seldom the case, and we generally find that the mode in which the office of Master General has been supplied is this. You find a man of great military distinction—Sir George Murray, or Sir James Kempt, or the Marquess of Anglesey—appointed to fill the office, a man who has won great honours in the field, and who, therefore, is placed at the head of the Ordnance Department. But this will not suffice for more than the most ordinary occasions. What the Government must look to for the present purpose is an officer who can provide for the homogeneous administration of all the arrangements requisite, including all the civil arrangements connected with the office. For, observe, it is not the case of a military chief merely, a general, however distinguished, placed at the head of the artillery and engineers, and intrusted with the supply of arms and the care of fortifications; there are added to the department great civil functions, which connect it at once with the political as with the military duties of the State. For instance, take the subject of barrack accommodation for the troops at home and abroad, which is one of high importance, involving various considerations, and for which Estimates are presented to this House involving very considerable expenditure to the country. But the manner in which that question has been generally conducted is one which makes it very difficult to come to a permanently sound conclusion. I mean, for example, that the Secretary of State for the Home Department, finding that there are riots and tumults in a particular district, and being told by persons resident in it that it would be a great security for them to have a garrison at a particular spot for their protection, would naturally take measures to have barracks constructed in that locality. But it is obvious that the question of barrack accommodation in the United Kingdom involves both civil considerations of expense and military considerations as to the stationing of troops at points where they are wanted, and from which a concentration might take place at the shortest notice. So, likewise, with regard to the Colonies. At one time a long and voluminous correspondence occurred, which has been referred to by Earl Grey on a recent occasion, with regard to the best mode of disposing of troops in the island of Jamaica. Opinions were given here on the subject by persons of authority, and those opinions were sent out by the Ordnance Department to the Colony. Reports came back, which were referred to the Treasury. The Treasury then consulted the Secretary at War and the Master General of the Ordnance, and more than a year elapsed without a solution of that question. Now, it is obvious that a Secretary of State for the War Department, having the authority which a Secretary of State has, being also connected with the Government, being by his office of Secretary of State a Member of the Cabinet, would have brought that question to a very speedy decision; he would have informed himself authoritatively as to what was the salubrity of the position proposed, its fitness for defending the locality from attack, the cost, and all the other circumstances, and, having thus arrived at correct and complete information, he would have been enabled to act at once and authoritatively. Take, again, the question of fortifications; the question of fortifications, both at home and abroad, is one of the very greatest importance. I will not touch now on the question of home fortifications, but I will take the fortifications of distant dependencies—of Corfu, of the Mauritius, with reference to which the Committee on Military Expenditure made a Report, in which they desire the Government fully to consider the subject. It is obvious, that the question of raising or of adding to those fortifications requires very close attention, which attention as obviously is closely mixed up with the policy of the State, the future intentions of the Government as to those Colonies. I remember, with reference to Gibraltar, when I had the honour of being Secretary of State for the Colonies, a Commission was appointed consisting of several high military authorities, and a considerable time passed before they came to any decision. A Master General of the Ordnance, not politically connected with the Government, of course rather hesitates to give an opinion by which very considerable expense may be incurred, without being fully aware of the views of the Cabinet on this subject. A Minister of War would be enabled to collect all the materials necessary for forming a judgment in this case, and before the Estimates for the year were prepared he would have gone over them, and would have informed the Government what measures were in his opinion necessary, and whether it was advisable that any further expenses should be incurred, or whether any retrenchment could be safely effected. So with regard to our West India Islands; several years ago it was found that those islands, having been occupied in time of war by large bodies of troops, had a great number of forts mounted with cannon, which required small parties of artillery to be posted in different places in order to keep them in repair, and questions arose as to the arrangements which should be made for these objects. Upon such points the opinion of a Secretary of State for War would probably be of great use in drawing up the Estimates. With regard to the department of Secretary at War, there are less changes that can be made. The business of the Secretary at War is chiefly one of details; if you have 100,000 men, you have a certain Estimate and various arrangements consequent on that number, and so if you have 20,000, or 30,000, or 40,000. A good deal of consideration is required in order to fix the point at which your establishment should be kept; but that having been done, there are few questions of difficulty which arise. Except in regard to the Commissariat, I cannot now enter into any outline of the official arrangements which will be made. The question has been found one of much difficulty by the Governments of Earl Grey and Lord Melbourne, and I think it better that the head of the department, an active man of business—such as my noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle, who is now at the head of it—should take into his consideration what changes are expedient in the whole department, and should propose them when they are required. With regard to the Commissariat, I see no objection which can be made to the change we propose. I do not see that there is any other change that can be made in the official arrangements, and I will only say that there is no person who is in the Government charged with any department who will make any personal objection to such arrangements as may be thought necessary for the public service, and that whatever arrangement shall be thought desirable, it will be cheerfully acceded to. With respect to another part of the arrangement—namely, that relating to the militia—I think the arrangement prevailing at present is, that the embodied militia comes under the Secretary at War and the Commander in Chief, but the disembodied militia is under the Secretary for the Home Department. As at present advised, we do not think it expedient that any change should be made in that respect; if it should be thought necessary, it can be made at any time; but the present arrangement being one that concerns the colonels of militia, and other officers who are in the habit of transacting business with the Home Department, there appears no advantage in making any other change. The great benefit which I think will be gained by our measure is the separating the civil from the military department, a great part of the business now done at the Board of Ordnance under a military chief being entirely of a civil nature. It appears to me, whatever may be the mode in which you arrive at the result, that the Commander in Chief and the Master General of the Ordnance, if those two offices are to continue separate, or the head of both combined if they are to be united, should have the whole control of the discipline and patronage of the Army, including the artillery and engineers, and that, on the other hand, the civil departments should have the whole of the arrangements that are necessary for the lodging of the Army, the fortifications at home and abroad, the provisioning and pay of the troops. When these changes shall have been effected, the House of Commons will then have before it, on the responsibility of the Secretary of State for the War Department, the whole military expenditure of the country. Therefore, if there should be any complaint with respect to furnishing provisions for the troops, for instance, instead of saying that the arrangements of the Treasury have been defective, the House will be enabled to call on the Secretary for the War Department to answer, and will consider him responsible, for arrangements which must at all times entail a very heavy burden on the country. These, Sir, are the general arrangements which are in contemplation. I have already said that I think there are others which must be carried into effect from time to time. It would be impossible to carry them into effect at present, now that we are at the beginning of a war, when the Secretary of State is fully employed by those urgent and important duties which belong to the Minister who is to superintend the military expenditure of the country, and give directions for the employment of our forces. Having explained the general views of the Government, what I have to ask of this Committee, therefore, is to afford time, in order that new arrangements may be carried into effect on the responsibility of the Government. Every question of this kind must be duly weighed by the Government. There are, at present, two offices at the Board of Ordnance usually held by Members of the House of Commons, which are now vacant. There is the office of Surveyor General, and there is the office of Secretary to the Master General of the Ordnance. It is not intended, without full consideration, to fill up those offices. When I say this, I mean it is not intended to fill them up in the way in which they have been filled up hitherto. At present the only information I can give is, that, while we think it is not necessary to keep up the office of Secretary to the Master General of the Ordnance with so large a salary as he has received hitherto, it will be necessary to appoint a Surveyor General for the Ordnance Department. If, however, the Ordnance Department is kept up as it is constituted at present, it may be advisable rather to appoint a person who has special knowledge with regard to the important duties which belong to that office, than to appoint a Member of this House who is not equally conversant with those duties. I think the efficiency of the department might be served if a change of this kind were made, but I am asking now that the whole subject may be reserved for the consideration of the Government, and I shall put the Vote on that understanding. I should say, however, having regard to the amount of the Vote, that a considerable part of the expense has been already voted. We considered it right that it should come again before the House in the shape of this Estimate, and that it was desirable the House should have all the details of expenditure connected with the department at one time under its observation; but I think to the amount of about 2,000*l.* a year or more of the salaries contained in this Estimate have been already voted among the Estimates relating to the Colonial Department. There are other salaries—of which I cannot tell the exact amount—which have already been voted under the heads of other departments, the Treasury and the Home Office. With regard to the offices vacant, I should state, first, that the military Under-Secretary was appointed by the Duke of Newcastle when he was Secretary of State for War and the Colonies. As respects the other Under-Secretary, the proposal is to appoint a gentleman to that office that he may conduct the correspondence, and have charge of the arrangements with regard to other offices which must be placed under the control of the Secretary of State. It is at the same time intended, however, that the person who is to fill that office shall be told that he will have no longer tenure of office than until the final arrangements are made; that those final arrangements may provide other duties which he will have to discharge, and that, therefore, for the present, it will be only a provisional appointment. With regard to the senior clerks, the assistant senior clerks, and the junior clerks—three classes of clerks—it is intended that they shall all of them be appointed from offices where they are at present employed as clerks. It is not proposed to appoint any new persons to these duties. There will be a fourth class of probationary clerks, with salaries of from 100*l.* to 150*l.* a year. With this explanation, I beg, Sir, to move the Vote of 17,300*l.* for the salaries and other expenses in the department of Her Majesty's

Secretary of State for War, from the 12th of June, 1854, to the 31st of March, 1855.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I have listened, Sir, to the statement of the noble Lord with feelings of the greatest astonishment and disappointment. The noble Lord has told us that he has stated the views of the Government. It appears to me, however, that that is exactly what the noble Lord has not told us. I can only understand from the speech of the noble Lord that, with the single exception that the Commissariat is to be transferred from the Treasury to the new department, the Government have formed no views on this subject, and that they have called into existence a new department of the State and have established a new Secretary of State—an officer of the highest class—without having at all determined what are to be the duties of that office, or what are to be the new arrangements upon this subject which, under the force of existing circumstances, has become one of the most important which can come under the consideration of this House. The noble Lord, in the outset of his observations, did me the honour to refer to some remarks which fell from me in a former discussion during the present Session upon this subject. So far as the remarks which then fell from me are concerned, I entirely agree with the noble Lord as to the course of the Government—namely, that now we are unhappily involved in war it has become impossible for any public servant holding the position of Secretary of State for the Colonies adequately to fulfil the duties of that office in conjunction with the duties which devolve upon the War Minister, by whatever title he may be designated. I pointed this out as strongly as I could upon the occasion to which the noble Lord has referred. The noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) and others spoke to the same effect; similar views have also been expressed with the greatest force in another place by my predecessor in the Colonial Office (Earl Grey); and it is impossible for any one conversant with the arduous duties of the Colonial Minister to suppose that that Minister could satisfactorily conduct the affairs of a serious war. But I think the Government ought not to have been content with stating their opinion that now we are involved in a great war the duties of the Minister of War ought to be taken away from the Minister charged with administering the affairs of our Colonies. I think we had a right to expect that, before the Government came down to this House and asked us to vote an Estimate for the establishment of a Secretary of State and of a new department, they were bound to have made up their minds what were to be the duties of that Secretary of State, and how and in what manner the present anomalous and inconvenient management of the Army was to be reconstructed. But the noble Lord has done nothing of the kind. The noble Lord has scarcely dwelt upon two considerations which bear upon this subject, and upon which I for one confidently expected that he was about to enter into the fullest details and to give the most ample explanation. Are the Committee and the country aware—I hardly think they can be—that the present arrangements connected with the government of our military forces may be divided into six different classes—namely, those connected with the Army (the regular Army, that is, of cavalry and infantry), the artillery, the pensioners (who have lately been embodied in a distinct corps), the yeomanry and militia, the Commissariat, and the dockyard battalions? Under the present anomalous government of our military forces every one of these different branches of the military service is under a different head and subject to a distinct authority. The Army is mainly managed by the Commander in Chief; the artillery is managed by the Master General and the Board of Ordnance; the pensioners, I believe, are under the direction of the Secretary at War; the dockyard battalions are under that of the Admiralty; the Commissariat is subject to the supervision of the Treasury; and, as to the yeomanry and militia, I think it would be very difficult indeed to say under whose authority they are. Here you have these six different branches of the military force of the country under six different departments connected with the Government of this country. Then, how is the administration of the Army itself conducted? Why, for the conduct of the Army there are no less than five different departments. I speak now, of course, of what has been the state of things up to the establishment of this new War Department. The Secretary of State for the Colonies was theoretically and nominally the War Minister. You then had the Horse Guards, with the Commander in Chief; the Ordnance, under the Master General; the Commissariat, under the Treasury; and you had the office of Secretary at War distinct from all. Well, I do think, if this subject was to be broached by the Government, that the Government were bound to have made up their minds in what manner they would amalgamate and consolidate these six different branches of our military forces and these five different authorities, among which heretofore all these branches of our military establishment had been divided. Let me remind the Committee that this is by no means a new subject. It is a subject to which, for very many years the attention of the Government, of Parliament, and of the country has been at different seasons directed. The noble Lord opposite has reminded us to-day of the fact that, so long ago as the time when the Duke of Richmond held office under the Administration of Earl Grey, a Commission was appointed upon this subject, of which Commission the Duke of Richmond was Chairman, and of which the noble Lord himself was a Member. The noble Lord has adverted also to a subsequent Commission appointed in 1836, of which the present Earl Grey, then Lord Howick, and also, I think, then Secretary at War, officiated as Chairman. Of that Commission the noble Lord himself and the noble Lord now Secretary of State for the Home Department were Members. In 1837 this Commission made a very able and elaborate Report. The recommendations of that Report were distinct and strong. They recommended that the anomalous state of things to which I have adverted should be put an end to; that the Master General of the Ordnance and the Commander in Chief should continue to fulfil their present executive functions with regard to the military branches of these two departments; but the Commission recommended that the civil duties of the various departments connected with the Army should be consolidated; that the anomalous and inconvenient duties of the Secretary of State for the Colonies should be put an end to; that the Secretary at War should be made an important officer, with a seat in the Cabinet, as the responsible War Minister in this House, though not a Secretary of State, the Commission recommending that the directions of the Sovereign for the movements and employment of the troops should still be conveyed through one of the Secretaries of State; and, if I remember right, the Commission also recommended that the Commissariat should be transferred to a new department, and should be taken away from the Treasury. The noble Lord told us that, in consequence of objections on the part of the Duke of Wellington, the recommendations of that Commission were not carried into effect; but the noble Lord did not tell us that he, as a Member of that Commission, and having concurred in its Report, now dissents from the recommendations to which he was then a party. I heard nothing from the noble Lord at all to imply that he had changed his mind. The only reason he assigned for not having carried out the recommendations contained in the Report to which I refer was, that the Duke of Wellington objected to them. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: I said that the Duke of Wellington gave very good reasons for objecting to them.] Well, but the noble Lord did not tell us that he dissents from those reasons and did not now concur in the Report of the Commission of 1837; neither did the noble Lord refer to the important fact that in the year 1850 a Committee of this House was appointed to inquire into the details of our Army and Ordnance expenditure. Of this Committee the noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) was the very able Chairman; it was selected with great care; it contained Members most competent to form a judgment upon the subject intrusted to their consideration; and that Committee recited in their Report the recommendations of the Commission of 1837, repeating those recommendations, and advising that the Report of that Commission should be acted upon. Here you have a third competent authority showing you distinctly how these anomalies might be got rid of, and how the inconveniences hitherto existing might be obviated; but to the fact of the Report of that Committee the noble Lord has made no reference whatever. Perhaps the Committee will allow me, however, to recall its attention to what passed upon a previous occasion, during the present Session, upon this subject. I was one, in common with many other Members of this House, who were greatly surprised that with a war already imminent—a war which too probably will be a very protracted one—the Government had not directed their attention to this subject before Parliament met, while they had the leisure of the recess, and that they were not prepared, upon the meeting of Parliament, to present a complete scheme for the consolidation of these different departments, and at once to put the Army in a position better fitted for the arduous duties upon which they are now embarked than they can be expected to be under their present conflicting and anomalous administration. But the Government had not, as I think they ought to have done, directed their attention to this subject, and had not made up their minds how they would deal with it before the present Session of Parliament met. After Parliament had met, of course this unsatisfactory state of the Government of the Army became the subject of comment and debate in both Houses. It was adverted to with extraordinary ability in the other House of Parliament, while in this House our attention was directed to it by the hon. Member for Montrose (whom I regret not to see in his place), and that debate took place to which the noble Lord has already referred. Let me remind the Committee of the language held on that occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War and by the noble Lord himself. We complained of the unsatisfactory state of affairs connected with the administration of the Army, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War made a strong speech in answer to those complaints, declaring that, though there might be anomalies, the existing state of things ought to continue. He referred to the great advantages which arose from the division of labour, deducing from his arguments the opinion that it would be better to go on as we were; and he quoted some opinions expressed by the present Lord Grey upon the subject—

"If," he said, "Lord Grey thinks there is a time when no alteration should be made, a fortiori, the present is a moment when, in my opinion at least, it would be dangerous to make such a change as that proposed by my hon. Friend" [namely, a change in the management of the Army, and the consolidation of the various branches of the service]. "At any time I think you ought to proceed step by step. The process should be gradual; but, at this moment, I do not believe you could undertake a more rash experiment than when you are about to enter upon a serious contest, and when you will have the greatest pressure upon your machinery from being engaged in a very hot war."—[3 Hansard, cxxxi. 241.]

The noble Lord followed, with very similar language—

"My right hon. Friend," he said, "has explained the great difficulty and inconvenience that would arise from attempting to carry into effect a new organisation of the departments at a moment when they are all required to make the utmost exertions in the preparation of the expedition now on its way to the East. . . . Instead of its being a great public convenience, I believe it would be a great public inconvenience, if the carrying out of these arrangements were to be transferred to any other department."—[3 Hansard, cxxxi. 259.]

In the course of a previous debate it has been announced that the pressure of business upon the Colonial Secretary was so great that the Government intended to add a new clerk to that department, and I then yielded to the force of the arguments used. I believe that the plan then proposed by the Government was a prudent and a wise one, and that it would have been a proper course in the existing state of things to wait until the recess enabled the Government to devote their whole attention to the subject, and to frame some definite plan to lay before Parliament and before the country. I heard with astonishment, however, that during the Whitsuntide recess the reluctance of Her Majesty's Ministers to make any changes had vanished, and that in the course of those few days the Government had determined to establish a new department and a new Secretary of State, and I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the speech of the noble Lord has gone far to prove that his first intentions were wiser than those which he has since adopted. It would have been far better, I think, if the noble Lord had deferred until after the Session the consideration of this subject, and had then framed some definite measure, instead of coming to this House with an imperfect proposal for establishing a new department without having determined, except in one trifling respect—namely, the transfer of the Commissariat from the Treasury to the new War Department—what are to be the duties of that department. The noble Lord has adverted to the subject of barracks and fortifications, but I did not understand him to say that either barracks or fortifications were to be transferred to this new department—indeed, what I did understand was, that they were to continue to be under the Board of Ordnance. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL expressed dissent.] Well, at all events, I did not understand the noble Lord to express any very decided opinion that barracks and fortifications were to be transferred to the new department, or that the Government had at all made up their minds except with regard to the Commissariat. There is one circumstance, however, which must have struck everybody who has heard the speech of the noble Lord, and I myself listened with the greatest anxiety to hear if anything should fall from the noble

Sir J. Pakington

Lord with regard to the anomalous position in which they have placed the Secretary at War. The country must have been surprised to find that, when the Government had so far matured their plans as to constitute a new department, the office of Secretary at War was still to be allowed to continue; that that Minister was still to be left at the head of an important public department, and to hold the position of a Cabinet Minister. What authority, I must ask, does the noble Lord find for that arrangement in any of the Reports to which I have just referred? One of the suggestions which has been thrown out by authorities competent to deal with the subject is, that there should be a new Secretary of State, but that he should discharge those duties which had hitherto been performed by the Secretary at War, and that the latter should cease to be an office any longer recognised after the office of the new Minister had been established. Another plan which has been suggested is, that the new Secretary of War should become an important officer, but not a Secretary of State. I know of no recommendation, however, having been made by any Commission in which the simultaneous existence in the Cabinet of a War Secretary and a Secretary at War was urged as advisable. I cannot, indeed, help thinking that the anomalous position in which matters then stood is the strongest proof that can be furnished in support of the supposition that the Government have, from some motive or another, changed their mode of action, in order to add an additional Cabinet Minister to their ranks during the Whitsuntide recess. As a consequence of that step, the Committee are now called upon to vote a sum of money to defray the expenses of a new department, and to contribute to the support of a Secretary of State whose duties it is perfectly clear that even the Government themselves have not defined. I think we have great reason to feel extremely dissatisfied with the statement which the noble Lord has made this evening, and that we have a right to demand that some explanation should be given as to what distinction, if any, exists between the duties of the new Minister and those which devolve upon the Secretary at War, both these functionaries being Cabinet Ministers. I shall, therefore, resume my seat in the hope that before the Government call upon the Committee to grant the Estimate for which they have asked we should receive some explanation upon the changes which have lately taken place in the War Department of a more satisfactory nature than those which have been afforded by the speech of the noble Lord.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I am afraid, Mr. Bouverie, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the astonishment, regret, and surprise, with which he heard what fell from my noble Friend—astonishment in which the right hon. Gentleman usually finds himself when any proposal is made to the House to which he cannot assent—that I shall not be able to remove that astonishment by anything which I am about to address to the Committee; but I hope I shall be able to make clear to the great body of the Committee what are the intentions of the Government, and to defend the course taken by the Government, which has been so impugned by the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Baronet said he was surprised that we, who so short a time ago expressed opinions diametrically opposed to making any change in the military departments, should now suddenly propose to make a complete reconstruction of those departments. The right hon. Baronet quoted one or two extracts from a speech that I had made on this subject, in order to show that I, at least, had expressed an opinion that the present system was perfect and ought to continue. I think the Committee will do me the justice to believe that at the time when we before discussed this question there was no want of frankness on my part in stating my opinions on the subject. I have held my present office in the Government on two separate occasions, and having turned my attention a good deal to this subject, I thought it would not be inopportune in me, though not speaking with the authority of the Government, to give a general outline of what appeared to me were the principal defects of the existing system, and of the measures which seemed to me necessary to remedy those defects. Now, it is quite true, as stated by the right hon. Baronet, that I had spoken in reprobation of the arguments used for a consolidation of the military departments, grounded on the misunderstandings which had arisen between the different military and civil officers at the commencement of the present century. Now, a great deal of public feeling has been excited upon this subject, which is entirely uncalled for. We have great difficulties to contend with in dealing with these departments; and I say, let us apply ourselves to that task, but let us first get rid of all those pre-Adamite anecdotes, founded on conversations of old in which some hon. Gentlemen are wont to indulge, but which are wholly foreign to the purpose in hand. What I stated to the House on that occasion was, that, so far from difficulties being caused by the distinctions between the heads of the military department, nothing could have worked more harmoniously; but I also said that I was quite willing to allow the inconvenience of the present system, that the Commander in Chief has not that knowledge of the Ordnance Department, and not that combination between men and matériel, which ought to exist. It is true that, if a fortification be built by the Board of Ordnance, the Commander in Chief may disapprove of it, and that he may not view it with the same scientific eyes as the Ordnance authorities; but I much question if it is always desirable that things should be regarded by scientific eyes alone. I think that it is a great evil to have the separate action of two departments not controlled by one superintending authority, but at the same time that superintending authority is not necessarily to be procured by consolidation alone. For some years past, when there has been work to be done, and the other departments have been much employed, it has been intrusted to the Ordnance, and any one who will look to the Report of the Commission will see what additional duties have been placed upon the Ordnance Department; and, indeed, I am not sure that we do not now suffer from over-consolidation rather than the want of it. What you most want is, not so much the consolidation of the different departments, but one supervising authority, with a view to make all of them act in harmonious combination. I said at that time that it appeared to me the provisioning of our troops in the field and at home by a department which has, practically, nothing at all to do with that subject, but which has a great deal to do with it in reference to the cash supplies for carrying it on, was wrong in principle. I think the department of the Treasury, which is a department of check, but which is not an administrative department, should not be intrusted with a duty of that kind; and I suggested that the direction of the Commissariat should be removed from the Treasury to the military departments. I may here also state that I have expressed my opinion that the Board of Ordnance might be divided into two portions. It is now, practically speaking, divided into the civil and military departments, and nothing can be more distinct than their operation; for, while both are governed by the same man, they are not governed in the same manner. There is, then, a clear distinction between these portions of the Ordnance Department; but to what extent that distinction should be carried is a matter which ought to be carefully inquired into before any decision is arrived at. It is a question of great importance as to whether the Commander in Chief shall have the control over the engineers and artillery, and the Commission of 1837 had recommended that they should be continued under the authority of the Master General of the Ordnance. I have no doubt that there are some sound reasons for that opinion, although personally I have thought that the Commander in Chief is the proper person to command the whole personnel of the army, and, in that discussion to which I have already referred, I proposed that the military portion of the Ordnance Department should be transferred to the Commander in Chief, while the civil portion should continue under the control of the Board of Ordnance. That I thought was a clear and distinct settlement; but that the right hon. Gentleman should have interpreted it as implying my complete adhesion to the existing system, does for the moment inspire me with some of that surprise which so constantly agitates his own bosom. The right hon. Baronet says the Government ought to have been in a condition to act immediately on the spur of the moment in this matter, or not at all. The Report of the Committee to which he has referred was published in 1837. Well, what happened in the case? The Committee came to no decision upon the subject, but there were one or two Reports drawn up by different Members of that Committee; and when the Commission sat which subsequently reported, they dissented from those views, and substituted one of their own. At any rate, therefore, the subject was not so easy of decision as the right hon. Baronet seems to think. This Commission having reported, no Government that succeeded it has ever attempted to carry that Report into effect—and why? Because they felt the change was so great, involving, as it did, the remodelling of every military department, and their consequent consolidation, that unless they had a great deal of concurrence of opinion in favour of that specific plan, and unless there was a great change of feeling, it would be in vain to attempt to carry it out. Four Governments succeeded to the appointment of that Commission, but none of them attempted to make the change which had been suggested. It might be possible to do a great deal, and I hope it is so, at the present moment; but, I must say, at the moment when every department was strained to its utmost, for the purpose of sending out, on a great emergency, a force amounting to nearly 40,000 men, under very great difficulty with regard to ships, but I hope and believe in a state of very great efficiency—if we had chosen that as the time, as suggested by the right hon. Baronet, for carrying into practical effect certain theoretical improvements in this and that particular subject—if we had, regardless of delay, and of the great emergency, set about squaring all these departments to a model suggested twenty-five years ago, the Government would have been unworthy of the position they hold, and unworthy of the confidence of the country. The Government felt, and justly felt, that the first thing to do was that which pressed most. There is no doubt about it, that the duties of a Minister charged with the management of the Colonies, are so great and so numerous as to be incompatible with those of carrying on a war. In former years, when this country was at war, the Colonial Minister, it is true, carried on the war; but for the simplest of all reasons, that he neglected the business of the Colonial Department. But that cannot be done now. That, as I have said, was the first thing to be done, because it was necessary to the efficiency of the service, and therefore we did that first. My noble Friend the Lord President stated, that the Government would then take care, after due consideration, and step by step, to put the new departments on another system, which should free them from the recurrence of acknowledged evils; but he declined to state exactly how he would distribute the various duties, and what changes he would make in the different departments. And he was quite right in acting on general principles; for I may remind the right hon. Baronet that this paragraph appears in the Report of the Committee which sat three years ago—leaving the responsibility of that to those whose official position and authority can alone guide them in applying a remedy to the present state of things.”

I stated at the commencement of the Session, when the hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) raised this question, what were my views on the subject generally, and what were the views of the Government. From none of those views have I seen any reason to depart. We have already taken this great step—we have disconnected the Colonial from the War Department. We have, therefore, established an officer who will be the responsible head, who can supervise all these establishments, and who can supervise all the changes which are to be affected in these departments. He will at once have the Commissariat put under his authority. That is a great and important step. He will then have the means of examining to what extent the consolidation of the military and civil portions of the Ordnance can be carried into effect. But if you ask us to put the whole machinery out of gear for the sake of introducing some theory which the right hon. Baronet might easily in a few moments sketch out on a sheet of paper, I say I think the subject is by far too important to be treated so lightly as that; and on such an emergency the Government are bound to feel their way as they go on. They would not risk the efficiency of those departments, on the efficiency of which the safety and success of our arms at this moment so materially depend. The right hon. Baronet complains of the position of the Secretary at War, and says that, in his opinion, the office ought to be abolished, or else that the full control of the War Department should be intrusted to him; and the right hon. Gentleman went on to say, that he could not understand how two Cabinet Ministers could be engaged in the military department. With regard to the first complaint, I can only say that the Secretary at War has nothing whatever to do with the management of war. The duties of the Secretary at War are duties delegated to him by the Treasury. The Treasury has the great financial check and control over all the expenditure of the country; but the expenditure of the country is too great and too minute in its details to be susceptible of being checked by any officer of the Treasury, and therefore they delegate to the Secretary at War, with reference to the Army, all the powers which they exercise themselves in respect to other departments of expenditure, and he checks and controls the expenditure with a view to proper economy and efficiency. If, therefore, you have him doing the duties of both departments, he ceases to have any check or control. I have heard the hon. Member for Montrose constantly complain that the management of the Navy was far more expensive than that of the Army. I have no doubt the management of the Army has been far more closely looked into than that of the Navy, because in the case of the Army one man expends the money and another holds the purse; not a regulation can be made by the Commander in Chief without the consent of the Finance Minister, in the person of the Secretary at War; and that is the secret of much of the economy in the military department, which had been practised for a great number of years. If, therefore, you combine the two things, you do away with that whole system of economical control in the management of the Army which has done so much to enhance its efficiency. Again, the right hon. Baronet says you ought not to have two Cabinet Ministers in the War Department. But why does he assume we are going to constitute departments which must be held by two Cabinet Ministers? The right hon. Baronet objects to the office of Secretary at War, and says it is useless, and if it is useless, why not abolish it? I think I have satisfied the Committee that, financially speaking, the existence of the office of Secretary at War is vital to the cause of economy and efficiency in the administration of the Army. The Secretary at War now exercises a very wholesome check over the expenditure of the Army; and I am clearly of opinion that the control which the Secretary at War has over the expenditure of the Army, under the Commander in Chief, ought to be extended to the expenditure which is now under the Master General of the Ordnance, as the Commander in Chief of the Artillery and Engineers. I do not see why the whole expenditure for the matériel and personnel of the Ordnance should not be placed under the control of the Secretary at War. With regard to the office of Secretary at War losing, as the right hon. Baronet complains, some of its importance, that is a subject upon which I will not trouble the Committee, but I think that some additional duties might be imposed upon him, such as moving the Commissariat Estimates, and that the whole of the War

Estimates should, as nearly as possible, be laid before the House as a whole. I should be inclined to say, therefore, retain the office of Secretary at War as a finance officer, while those duties of a half military character which were attached to the office might be transferred from it, such as that relating to the pensioners; but I must still stand out that if you want to continue that which has so much contributed to causing economy in the administration of the Army, and to promote that steadiness by which a financial check has been brought to bear upon the whole of the expenditure, you must maintain the office of Secretary at War as a separate office. With regard to the question, as to whether the Secretary of State for War and Secretary at War should be Cabinet Ministers, that is a point upon which I shall not enter, and, with regard to the general question, I can only say that I have looked at it and considered it with perfect impartiality. So far from attempting to prevent changes being made in the present system, I have urged the necessity of change, and I have in Parliament spoken very freely as to what were the evils to be remedied. I am sorry that the right hon. Baronet objects that there should be two Cabinet Ministers connected with the War Department; but it appeared to me, and I hope that I shall not be thought guilty of self-sufficiency, that, having been for a long time Secretary at War, and having, during that time, received most cordial support from every one connected with the Army, that having bestowed a very considerable amount of attention on this subject, and from my knowledge of the details of the business of the War Office, I thought that my services might be of great value to assist not only in promoting the efficiency of the Army, but also in assisting the Government in arranging in a final and satisfactory manner the various duties of the War Department. I thought, also, that I should not be justified in resigning an office because it had become of, perhaps, a little less importance, and, therefore, I undertook to carry on the duties of Secretary at War, and, if the right hon. Gentleman disapproves of my doing so, I regret it; but I can only say that the assistance which I may have given to the Government shall continue to be given, and I hope that the result will be, that we shall shortly be able to lay upon the table of the House a detailed plan of the entire change. I trust that this House will not deprive the Government of that assistance and confidence which are necessary to enable them to bring this change to a good issue, by giving their utmost attention to the subject, and by taking every step to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. Give us time—that is only fair—and I am satisfied that we can introduce into the military department changes which will promote the efficiency of the service, and which will enable the Government and people to look with perfect confidence, as to efficiency in every respect, upon those forces upon whom now the honour and safety of this country depend.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he believed that the explanations given by the noble Lord the Member for London and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War were not calculated to give satisfaction either to that House or to the country. It would appear from those explanations that the only tangible change which had been effected in the case was the transfer of the Commissariat from the Treasury to the new War Minister. Now, he entirely approved of that measure, and believed that it would greatly tend to increase the efficiency of the Army. But that surely was not the only reform they had a right to expect under the new system. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War had also shadowed forth a separation of the civil and military departments of the Ordnance. He (Col. Dunne) believed, however, that those two departments were so closely interwoven that it would be very difficult, and even detrimental, to separate them. He entirely approved of the proposal that the embodiment of the militia should remain under the control of the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

MR. G. BUTT said, he had a few words to say upon the subject, although it was one with which he was not much acquainted. He was surprised at the statement which the noble Lord the President of the Council and the right hon. Secretary at War had made, because the Committee had a right to expect that when a new office like that of Minister of War was created, the duties of the office would be clearly defined; but neither the noble Lord nor the right hon. Gentleman had let them into that secret. The noble Lord says—"Appoint the new officer, and from time to time he will consider what duties it will be convenient for him to undertake;" while the right hon. the Secretary at War said—"We cannot tell what duties are to be assigned to this new officer, but give us time and we will find him something to do, although I may state at once that there will be no consolidation of duties yet." Now that was the sum and substance of the two speeches, which contained no explanation whatever that could be satisfactory, either to the Committee or the country. What he wanted to know was, the nature of the duties which this new Minister would have to perform for the remuneration he would receive and the honour of a seat in the Cabinet. The noble Lord in his ingenious speech was elaborate about the clerks, but he said nothing about the duties of the Minister at War, which was just what the country required to know, but which neither the noble Lord nor the right hon. Gentleman had thought fit to explain, or even to shadow forth. It was only natural to suppose that there would have been a consolidation of the business of our War Department in the newly-created War Secretary. But no such consolidation had, it appeared, taken place, and they had not even been led to think that any such consolidation was contemplated by the Government. It was clear that no attention had been paid in that case to the recommendations of the Committee over which the noble Lord the Member for Totteness (Lord Seymour) had presided. What was wanted was, not merely that the supervision of the Commissariat should be transferred to the new Minister, but that he should be intrusted with the superintendence of all our preparations for the conduct of the war.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

Order for Committee read; House in Committee.

Clauses 22 to 25 agreed to.

Clause 26 (No person to pay Expenses of Elections except to Candidate or Election Officer).

MR. H. T. LIDDELL said, this was a clause that he had opposed in the Select Committee, which was very nearly divided in opinion as to its propriety, and he also intended to oppose it on the present occasion. The restrictions and regulations with regard to election expenses, with which, by this Bill, candidates were to be surrounded, were justifiable up to a certain length; but he called upon the Committee to pause before carrying that species of legislation too far. Suppose that an independent man promised to give his support to a candidate, and undertook to get the electors together in a certain district, and in the course of the proceedings gave some refreshment to them, he would be liable to the penalty under this clause if he did not make a return of all that he had expended to the election officer. It was ridiculous jealousy on the part of the Legislature to say that there was any harm in such a thing; he had done it himself, and would do it again. He did not wish to shield any man who had been guilty of bribery or improper conduct, but some respect ought to be shown to that independence and freedom which were dear to all Englishmen. There was no harm in public dinners at which the general political feeling of a county was expressed, all who were present paying for their own tickets; but a man would not be able to make a present of tickets to his friends without being guilty of a misdemeanor according to this clause, unless he sent in the Bill to the election officer. But would this clause take away all opportunities for electioneering demonstrations? No. They would have flower-shows or cattle-shows, and the proceedings would terminate with a dinner, at which the health of the favourite candidate would be drunk. He thought that, although the Bill itself would be a great advantage, this clause was of an arbitrary and tyrannical nature, and he should therefore move that it be expunged.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there were various cases to which it was very difficult to administer an exact measure of justice. A candidate might be a person who had no money to spare, but was supported by some great proprietor, who would put down 5,000*l.*, or that sum might be put down by his friends in the county in order to carry his election, and in that case none of the clauses which applied to the candidate would have any effect with regard to the expenditure of that money, and they would lose all the advantages which were derived from the appointment of an election officer. But, while he quite agreed in the necessity of inserting a clause of this sort, he did not see the necessity for imposing so severe a penalty; and in a case in which the expenditure had not corrupted any elector the penalty might not be enforced. He should therefore propose that the word "misdemeanor" be omitted, and that a person offending in the manner named in the clause should only be subject to a 50*l.* penalty.

Mr. H. T. Liddell

If this were found insufficient, Parliament might hereafter increase the severity of the punishment.

MR. G. BUTT said, he would recommend his hon. Friend (Mr. Liddell) to accept the clause with the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord. If the clause were altogether expunged, all the preceding provisions with respect to the appointment of an election agent would become perfectly nugatory.

MR. GROGAN said, that cases of very great hardship might occur in Ireland under the operation of that portion of the Bill. Landed proprietors in that country frequently found it necessary to give shelter to their tenants at the approach of an election, in order that those tenants might not be violently carried away, and deprived of the power of recording their votes. It would manifestly be most unreasonable and unjust to render landlords, who had thus protected their tenants, liable to the penalties of the law.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, that the object of this Bill was to obtain publicity for election expenses, and he could not see how that end was to be attained without this clause, but at the same time he felt that it would be better so to word the clause as to admit of the fine being mitigated in some cases. Let the wording of it run that the fine should not exceed 50*l.*

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would put a case which, in his opinion, would show how unjust might be the operation of that portion of the Bill. A number of electors might resolve on supporting some favourite candidate without entailing on him any expense; and for that purpose they might treat one another, or pay one another's coaching expenses. It was clear that in such a case those persons ought not to be made liable to the penalties of the law. He believed that the Bill as it then stood would form one of the greatest possible restrictions on the freedom of election.

MR. W. J. FOX said, he suspected that what the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) meant was this—certain rich electors conveyed certain poor electors to the poll free of expense, besides paying for their refreshment, and that appeared to him to be nothing more nor less than treating for a corrupt purpose. Unless this were put down, the interference of that House would be of little use, and they would be quite as much in the dark as ever as to the nature of the expenses. He thought the penalty ought to be considerably increased, in a case where thousands of pounds might be spent.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he should support the clause. If any expenses whatever were allowed to be paid, except through the election officer, they opened the door to the greatest bribery. A person might spend 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* in that way if he chose, if he were allowed to spend 2*l.* or 3*l.* in bringing up voters. It would be unwise to fetter the exertions of independent electors; but the clause provided for this by allowing any person to pay any amount he chose towards the expenses of the election into the hands of the election officer. A man might wish to bring up fifty or 100 of his own tenantry as voters; and he had only to obtain the authority of the election officer to allow him to do so. It was true an emergency might arise where a person wished to bring up voters on the spur of the moment, to save the election, and had not time to apply to the election officer; and he would suggest an alteration in the clause to meet this case.

MR. W. WILLIAMS regretted that the noble Lord had consented to withdraw the word misdemeanor. In these cases parties did not mind about money; he thought the only thing to deter them from bribing was the punishment of misdemeanor. The alteration would render the Bill much less effective.

MR. HILDYARD said, he believed that any person subscribing money towards election expenses would be liable to indictment for misdemeanor under this Bill. They were passing clause after clause without considering their effect, and adding new traps and pitfalls to those already existing.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought the alarm of the last speaker was unnecessary. Hitherto the provisions against bribery had proved wholly ineffectual; now it was proposed that no money should be spent except for lawful purposes, and to secure that the money was only to be paid through an appointed officer. Parties might still subscribe towards the election expenses of candidates, but it must be done through the officer; otherwise the Act would be wholly inoperative. Each man might pay his own expenses at the poll; and if a number combined from motives of economy, such a proceeding would not come within the clause at all. The omission of the punishment of misdemeanor was complained of,

but the penalties of themselves he considered were sufficiently high.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he feared that the clause would be difficult to carry out; but without some such provision they might as well leave the law in its present state. Even with this enactment he doubted whether bribery would be effectually prevented.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would ask the hon. and learned Attorney General whether the fact of voters clubbing their money together would not compel them to give an account of their expenses to the election officer? He thought the clause would destroy the independent action of the constituencies.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, every man was entitled to pay his own expenses, and the mere fact of his joining with another voter in the payment of their common expenses would not bring him within the meaning of the clause. The sole object of the clause was to prevent his expenses being paid by another person without the knowledge or sanction of the election officer.

MR. AGLIONBY said, he thought that this was one of the most valuable clauses in the Bill. It was necessary for the protection of the honest voter, would enable them to secure purity of election, and was of still more importance as a protection to the candidate himself.

In reply to a question from Lord ROBERT GROSVENOR,

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would undertake to propose a clause to this effect—that if, upon the trial of an action to recover these penalties, it should appear to the Judge that the payments had been made without any illegal intention, it should be competent for him to reduce the penalties to any sum not less than 40*s.*

The Amendment proposed by Lord J. RUSSELL was then agreed to.

MR. H. T. LIDDELL said, he still objected to the clause, as interfering with the freedom of election. They had attempted to do a great deal by the present Bill, and he warned them against trying to do more than they were able to accomplish.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 115; Noes 26: Majority 89.

Clause 27 (Election Officer to render an Account of all Moneys paid by him or by his authority on account of Election Expenses).

MR. HENLEY said, he would suggest that, as the candidate by a former clause was required to return an account of all claims made on him, the election officer should also make a return of the sums so claimed.

MR. WALPOLE said, the claimants by this clause were directed to send in to the election officer all charges and claims which he or they had against the candidates, and the election officer was then to make out a return or account of all such claims and charges as should have been paid, or should have been disallowed and not paid. He thought it would be desirable to make the clause more distinct.

MR. HENLEY said, he did not think the clause would properly bear such a construction. What he wanted was, that an account of what had been claimed as well as paid should be returned.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, if his right hon. Friend wished, the clause might be amended by inserting the words "of all sums claimed, although the same shall not be allowed or paid."

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would suggest that the election officer should be required to account for the money belonging to the candidate which he had not disbursed, as well as the money he had paid away. If, as the clause stood, the candidate paid the election officer 1,000*l.* towards the expenses of the election, and that he paid away of that 200*l.* or 300*l.* as election expenses, he was not required to give any account of the balance—that was to be a matter of private arrangement between the candidate and himself; and he thought, to prevent any collusion or fraud between the parties, the clause should contain a proviso, directing the election officer to give an account of how he had disposed of the balance.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had no objection to the Amendment suggested.

MR. WALPOLE said, all the sums were to be paid by checks, and might easily be traced, but there was no objection to the introduction of the words suggested by the hon. Member.

MR. ELLIOT said, among the sums which were to be returned were those paid into court, or for which judgment had been obtained. If they had to wait until judgment were given on some claims, he was afraid delay might take place, and as there was to be a supplementary account, he would suggest that such sums should be included in it.

MR. WALPOLE said, that all such sums as were paid, or for which judgment was recorded within three months, in which the return was to be made, might be included in the general account; but those obtained after the lapse of three months might be placed in the supplementary account.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 28 (General Account to be kept at some convenient place for the inspection of Voters).

MR. HENLEY suggested that, as this clause seemed to imply the necessity of keeping an office for the purpose of depositing the accounts and returns, and as the next clause provided for the publication of such accounts in the newspapers, the object, which was publicity, might be obtained by the advertisement of the general account alone.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that in some cases a considerable length of time might elapse before the accounts could be completed, and it might be necessary, for the purposes of justice, that the accounts should be inspected long before they were published. It might be advisable, therefore, that the accounts should remain in custody where they could be readily inspected, before they were deposited with the clerks of the peace or town clerks.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the officer who was responsible for the custody of the accounts should be required to take care that persons who were permitted to take copies did not play tricks with the original documents; for men with sharp knives and free consciences might easily remove leaf after leaf, and so mutilate the accounts as to render them valueless.

MR. G. BUTT said, he could refer to a case which had occurred under the Municipal Corporations Act, where persons who were entitled to inspect the polling papers at a municipal election, such documents being kept in the custody of the town clerk, had abstracted half the papers, and consequently the election became void. He thought that measures ought to be taken to prevent any equally improper proceedings under this clause.

MR. McCANN said, he would suggest that three copies of the accounts should be provided, and that one of them should be kept in safe custody for reference, in case of necessity.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 29 (Election officer to publish Abstract of such Accounts).

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR begged to ask, by whom the expenses of this advertising was to be borne? He put the question, because, in his own case, he found the expense of advertising at elections for the county he had the honour to represent (Middlesex) extremely heavy.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he feared he could not flatter the noble Lord with the hope that the expense would be borne by any one but the candidates. This was, he considered, a necessary part of the expenses of an election.

LORD SEYMOUR said, the clause provided that abstracts of the accounts should be inserted in two newspapers, published or circulating in the place where the election was held; but in many parts of the country there was not a single newspaper published, and he wished to know what was to be done in such cases?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had not prepared this and several other clauses in the Bill, but he thought there could scarcely be any place in the country where newspapers of some kind or another did not circulate.

MR. GROGAN said, that the advertisements might be inserted in the Times, but the charge for such insertion would cause considerable expense to candidates.

MR. HILDYARD said, he could not conceive what reason there was for throwing upon candidates this expense for advertising. In the neighbourhood in which he resided (Dorsetshire) there were three places returning Members to that house—Lyme, Bridport, and Honiton—in none of which was a newspaper published. It was said that advertisements might be inserted in the Times newspaper. Why, they might even be inserted in a newspaper published in the Orkneys, and a great deal wiser people would be.

LORD SEYMOUR said, there were no penalties inflicted for non-publication of these accounts. The election officer was merely directed to do so; but, supposing that he chose to have nothing to do with such nonsense, there was no mode of compelling him to act or of punishing him for neglect. The clause, however, was a specimen of the Bill:—a set of learned Gentlemen got together upstairs to make up a Bill, and this was the good-for-nothing stuff which they brought down.

SIR FITZROY KELLY could assure the noble Lord that the clause which seemed to excite so much of his disapprobation had not emanated from him, nor from any one else who came under the denomination of "learned Gentlemen." It was originally proposed by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), and it was inserted in the Bill with the entire approval of the Committee upstairs. Its object, he believed, was to give publicity to the election accounts, and more particularly to the names of the persons who made claims on the candidates. With regard to the number of advertisements, he thought one would very likely be sufficient, and he would therefore propose to substitute for "two newspapers," the words "some newspaper," and also to meet another objection which had been made—to add the words, "published or circulating within the place or county."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HILDYARD said, the object of the clause was to give publicity to the delinquents who made claims on the candidates; but by this clause the claims which were allowed were to be published, but not those which were disallowed. Such an oversight might have been excused in the hon. Member for Manchester, but his hon. and learned Friend ought to have known better. Although intending to take the sense of the Committee on the whole clause, he would still move an Amendment by inserting the words, "or disallowed," and, "if disallowed, by whom claimed."

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the word "account" in this and in the two preceding clauses would include the publication of the charges disallowed. Still, if this interpretation was objected to by his hon. and learned Friend, he would not oppose the introduction of words to the effect he desired.

MR. HILDYARD said, he totally differed from this interpretation of the three clauses. The words in the clause were, "admitted to be correct;" and was it possible that that would include the claims which had been disallowed?

MR. BRIGHT said, he must advise the Committee to view the Amendments of the hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven with suspicion. The question whether the accounts to be published should include Bills, both paid and unpaid, was discussed in the Committee, and it was understood that the object was to give an honest account of the expenses of the election, and not what persons might have attempted to cajole out of the candidate. It was the actual expenditure of each candidate, and that being done, all the cheek that was desired was obtained. No good would be derived by putting into the papers a string of bills which never could have been paid, and were merely fabulous and dishonest. The clause as it stood was, he thought, sufficient.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk and the hon. Member for Manchester were entirely at issue upon the meaning of the clause. He (Sir J. Walsh) thought there was a great object to be attained by the words proposed—namely, the stoppage of those fraudulent claims so frequently made for the purposes of intimidation at elections.

MR. BENTINCK supported the Amendment. Though great good, however, might be attained by publication, a great evil would be created also. The principal objects of the Bill would, in his opinion, be attained by making the accounts accessible for three months after the election; after that they should be closed, and with them the chance of vexatious litigation. He should wish to move the substitution of the words "three months" instead of "one year."

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought the Amendment would create the evil it was intended to meet. The candidate would lie under the imputation of not paying the claims against him in the mind of the public. He was of opinion that the publication of the claims allowed would be sufficient, without the publication of those which had been rejected.

MR. HILDYARD said, he could not accede to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. He should, therefore, persevere in his Amendment.

MR. MASSEY said, he thought the reasons adduced were conclusive against the retention of the clause in the Bill. Every object of publicity was attained by the 28th clause; and nothing but scandal could arise from the clause in question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it struck him that the clause was open to great doubt. With reference to the scandal of publishing disallowed claims, he would remind the Committee that by the 28th clause any elector might go to the election officer, and obtain a copy of all the claims allowed and disallowed, and publish them if he chose to take on himself the responsibility. He thought the publication of the accounts by the election officer was one of the most important features of the Bill. He did not, however, see the necessity of publishing disallowed claims; but if the Committee thought this ought to be done, he had no objection to the proposition.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, the object of the clause was to invoke public opinion to shame persons from making improper claims. He had no doubt the clause would be beneficial, and he trusted that hon. Gentlemen would not be so carried away by ridicule as to throw out one of the most valuable portions of the Bill.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he did not see the necessity of the Amendment, as any elector could get a copy of the claims on application. He rose, however, to call attention to the fact that it was not stated in the clause who was to pay the expenses of publication. As the object was to reduce election expenses, he thought it would be better to pay them out of the borough or county rates, and he should move the insertion of words to that effect.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY thought it would be advisable to have all claims published. He objected to compulsory publication in newspapers, as the charge for such advertisements would be excessive. The publication by printed placards, which would be inexpensive, might answer all the purpose.

MR. HILDYARD said, he had reconsidered the Amendment, and having had the assistance of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk, would state the exact words he wished to have inserted in the clause. He proposed that the words, "all claims and objected to," be inserted, and at the end the words, "or by whom the same have been claimed respectively."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it certainly was an omission that no provision was made for paying the expense of publishing the accounts. He objected to the proposition of paying the expenses out of the rates, as such payment involved an important principle. If the payment was to be so made, it ought to form the subject of a separate clause, or even a separate Bill, and not be introduced at the end of a clause. He considered that the matter might be made clear, as far as the payment by the candidate was concerned, by few additional words.

MR. DEEDES said, he was at a loss to understand the principle of putting the expenses on the borough or county rate.

MR. BRIGHT said, he believed from his experience of newspaper proprietors there would be great competition to get hold of these accounts and to publish them.

Mr. Bright

They would prove an interesting item of intelligence, and he should be quite content to have no provision with regard to payment for publication. It would be greatly advantageous to the public as well as to the candidates that publication should take place; the public would be great gainers by the publication; and he was quite satisfied to allow the question of publicity to settle itself.

Mr. HEADLAM said, he agreed in thinking the newspapers would compete for the publication, but that argument was conclusive against the clause, as a preceding clause provided for one authentic copy being exhibited, from which the newspapers would make publication.

Mr. HILDYARD said, it was quite clear the Committee would be guilty of a great constitutional mistake if it cast any burden on the particular body or district which returned Members. The constitutional law was that they were Members, not for the benefit of this or that place, but for the benefit of the nation. If the expense was to be borne by the public, it must come out of the public purse, for whose benefit they sat there, if they sat there for the benefit of anybody, which people out of doors doubted. To throw any expense on a particular place would be recognising that the Member for that place was bound to look exclusively to their interests.

On the Question that the clause stand part of the Bill,

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that this was one of the most valuable clauses in the Bill, and he hoped that the Committee would adopt it. It was possible that there might be a competition amongst newspapers for the publication of the accounts; but would any one say that there should not be an authorised publication, or they might not have the accounts correctly given. If the publication was left entirely to the newspapers, one party would publish one statement, and the other party another. For those considerations, he believed the clause would be of great benefit, and he should support it.

Mr. HILDYARD said, the Committee must understand that the printing of these accounts would be attended with very heavy expense. He knew from his experience in revising the list of voters of a division of Yorkshire, in which there were thirty-nine polling places, and he had no doubt every county Member knew so too, that there were an immense number of charges for lists that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred were never looked at, and he believed that the expenditure would be a pure waste of money.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 178; Noes 94: Majority 84.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 30.

Clause 31 (All Moneys and Documents to be handed over to the Election Officer).

Mr. BENTINCK said, he must complain that no precaution seemed to be taken as to the character of the person who was to be appointed as election officer. There was no restriction whatever. Any person in the country, let his character be what it might, was eligible for appointment. Now, supposing a person holding this situation absconded with whatever money or documents happened to be in his possession, what means were there of recovering such property?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that if the election officer committed such an offence, he would incur the ordinary penalties of misdemeanor, and might be proceeded against. He would remind the Committee, however, that, as originally framed, this measure proposed to appoint a barrister to this office. If the Committee had agreed to that proposal, they would have had in the character and position of such a person an ample security that he was a fit and proper person to be intrusted with the duties of the office. But he found that as soon as a proposal was made that the appointment should be conferred on a barrister, it was met by almost universal disapprobation.

Mr. BENTINCK must say that he did not see much use in indicting a man who had gone to America, or who was not forthcoming. But another difficulty presented itself to him. A man appointed as election officer, and to whom documents and money were handed over, might die; it might be very necessary that those documents, and that that money should be in the possession of the candidate in a short time, and yet it might be competent for the heirs of this man to retain possession.

Mr. J. BALL suggested there should be a power of appeal against the nomination of an improper person.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he thought that security should be given that the person who was appointed should not be a person who was capable of absconding, and thereby preventing an investigation into the practices that had taken place.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 32 (Candidate to declare to Election Officer the name of his Agent or Agents).

LORD SEYMOUR said, the clause required the candidate to give to the election officer in writing the names of his agents. He wished, however, some definition of the word "agent" to be given. Did it include every one who in any way assisted the candidate? It was also stated that current expenses might be paid "by the authority of the election officer;" but the election officer could not be present at all times when payment of money might be necessary. Then, how was his authority to be obtained?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, it was proposed to omit the words "by the authority of the election officer." As to the agents who were appointed, the candidate would give in their names to the election officer at the time the appointment took place, and he did not see that it would be necessary to define them more particularly.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he was afraid that the difficulties stated by the noble Lord the Member for Totness had not been met. If they asked a candidate to name his agents in writing, the candidate was surely entitled to know exactly what was meant by the term. What was the definition of the word "agent?" Did it include persons who might be employed for general purposes, or merely those who were intrusted with the payment of money?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the word "agent" as employed in the Bill, meant an agent for the payment of money, and not a person who might be employed for general purposes. It meant one who would manage and direct the expenses of the election.

MR. BECKETT DENISON said, he thought that if the term "agent" meant only one who paid money, it should be so stated in the Bill. As it now stood, it might include every person who did anything whatever for a candidate. How, in such a case, was the noble Lord to state the names of all his agents in the City of London? It would be impossible to do so.

MR. HENLEY said, that it was rather hard to ask the Committee to pass a clause directing a candidate to make a declaration, when they did not know what he was to declare. He thought that they should have some more precise definition of the word "agent" than was contained in the clause. He did not see how this clause could be carried out in the case—not a very unfrequent one—in which a person was nominated without his knowledge. He would then be a "candidate," and as such would, by this clause, be compelled to inform the election officer of the name of his agent, although in fact he had none, and knew nothing about the matter.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would suggest that the words "if any" should be inserted after the word "agent." He did this in order to meet the case of a candidate not having an agent.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, that some provision should be made in this clause to meet the case, in which, in the absence of a candidate, or of his being put up without his consent, some party might be made responsible; he would suggest that such a responsibility be borne by the proposer and seconder of a candidate?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought that some provision should be inserted to enable some one, in the absence of a candidate, to do what he might and ought to do if present, otherwise the current expenses could not be paid.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he also thought that some provision was requisite to meet the case of a candidate nominated without his knowledge. It would, however, be impossible to insert words with that object in the present clause. He would undertake to frame a clause which, if assented to, might be inserted on bringing up the report.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, he wished to move the following Amendment—

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 8, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

"and no person being a candidate at any Election, or having been elected, who shall have made the declaration required by this Act, and shall in all things have well and truly conformed thereto, and shall not have been guilty of any contravention of this Act, shall be liable civilly or criminally, nor shall his Election be avoided by reason of any illegal act done by any other person than his agent or agents named and notified to the Election officer, according to the provisions of this Act, unless such illegal act shall be proved to have been done by or with his authority or sanction: Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect the jurisdiction of a Select Committee of the House of Commons over any Election which shall be shown to have been obtained by bribery or any other illegal act or acts or practices."

Mr. Hildyard

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must oppose the Amendment, the effect of which would be to make the law less instead of more stringent than it was at present, and to introduce an innovation into the law and practice of Parliament. It had hitherto been held that a candidate was responsible in a Parliamentary, although not in a criminal, sense, for the acts of his agent; and if that law were altered a wide door would be opened to bribery and corruption. He was convinced that the law with regard to questions of fact as to the existence of agency was at present well administered by Parliamentary Committees. A candidate who wished to commit bribery would never name an agent for that purpose, and the great check upon bribery now was, that the commission of that offence by a person between whom and the candidate a Committee believed the relation of agency to have been established, was sufficient to unseat a Member. If direct authority from the Member was required to be shown before he could be unseated for the acts of an agent, there was scarcely an instance in which the law might not be evaded. He did not believe that, under the present law, many hon. Members unduly lost their seats; on the contrary, where the hon. Member lost, a great many retained their seats unduly, as, notwithstanding bribery might be clearly made out, it was always very difficult to prove agency.

MR. BENTINCK said, before the House passed the Bill now before it, he thought that they were bound to attempt to apply some remedy to the very anomalous state of the law upon this subject of agency. At present the case of agency rested solely upon the caprice of Election Committees. He did not wish to make any invidious remarks, but he could quote cases in which the most unaccountable decisions had been come to in respect to agency. He knew, for instance, of one case, where a gentleman was unseated solely upon the ground that a man was seen in the same room with him who had been proved to have paid money as a bribe. There was not a tittle of other evidence against the candidate. Now that, he (Mr. Bentinck) submitted, was an anomalous and absurd state for the question to be left in. Under such circumstances, he thought that the Committee were bound, as a matter of justice, to meet the difficulty suggested by the provision of his noble Friend. If the Committee were not prepared to adopt the Amendment of his noble Friend, he hoped that some other clause would be proposed to deal with the difficulty.

MR. WALPOLE said, he doubted whether the hon. and learned Attorney General was right in opposing this clause. The proviso proposed by his noble Friend (Lord A. Vane Tempest) did not say that the party guilty of the illegal act shall not be called upon to answer for his offence, but that before the candidate shall be made responsible for this act of the alleged agent, it must be proved that he had given authority for the act, or that he had sanctioned it after it had been done. He (Mr. Walpole) did not think that the proposed Amendment was the introduction of any new law, but the revival of an old law which had been permitted to fall into a state of ambiguity.

MR. HEADLAM said, he thought that the Amendment would open the door for much fraud; and candidates would indirectly obtain all the advantages of bribery and corruption, without incurring the responsibility.

MR. AGLIONBY also opposed the clause, but expressed a wish that some words could be introduced into the Act of Parliament which would more clearly define the meaning of agency.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he should support the Amendment, on the ground that the seat of a successful candidate ought not to be avoided by the act of a person who might be a complete stranger to him, or, perhaps, even an enemy in disguise.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must oppose the Amendment, since there would be great difficulty in proving bribery, if it were to depend upon the admission that direct orders to bribe had been given to the agent or attorney by the candidate.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 143: Majority 32.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

House resumed; Committee report progress.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

COLONEL DUNNE said, he had given notice to move the insertion of a clause limiting the Bill to two years instead of five, but if he received an assurance from the Government that a Committee would be appointed to inquire into the whole matter, he would not press his Motion. What he complained of was the large amount expended in the collection of the poor rate.

MR. J. BALL said, that so far from there being a large amount expended, he had found that in those unions where the number relieved in a year was under 1,000, and in which there was the largest proportionate expense, the whole charge for officers of every kind, including clerks and collectors, did not exceed five farthings in the pound.

MR. I. BUTT said, this was a question of centralisation, and he appealed to the House whether it was fair to deprive them of all opportunity of discussion; he should move the adjournment of the debate.

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, he thought there was no necessity for that course, this Bill having been amply discussed in Committee. The attention of the Government would be directed to this subject during the recess, and after the recess they would be ready to assent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the powers of the Poor Law Commission. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dunne) seemed, however, to desire an investigation into the whole operation of the Poor Law in Ireland; but such an inquiry, which had already taken place to a considerable extent, the Government were certainly not prepared to grant. He (Sir J. Young) believed that the vast majority of the people of Ireland were satisfied with the general principle and operation of the Poor Law.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that during the last six or seven years numerous petitions had been presented to Parliament, complaining of the working of the Irish Poor Law, and especially of what were called the establishment charges.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 83: Majority 47.

Question again proposed:—Whereupon Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 97: Majority 76.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^o.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, to leave out the words "one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine," and insert the words "one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six,"—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words pro-

The House divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 37: Majority 45.

Bill passed.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL.

LORD BROUGHAM, in moving the third reading of this Bill, said, that its object was to extend to the Ecclesiastical Courts provisions of the greatest importance, and placing them in a position, with respect to the reception of evidence, similar to that of other courts. By an Act passed in the year 1840, the Court of Admiralty obtained power to examine witnesses and take evidence vis à voce. Previous to that time the practice in that Court, like that of the Court of Chancery, was to take evidence by written deposition, involving, to the frustration of justice, this absurdity, that one person saw the witness, heard him give his evidence, and observed his demeanour under examination, while another person had to decide on the value of his testimony, and to give judgment upon it. The procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts and Doctors' Commons was superior in one material respect to that of the Court of Chancery, for, whereas, in the Court of Chancery, each question was put and answered in succession, one after the other, the person who framed the second question being in perfect ignorance of what the answer might be to the first—a most absurd and clumsy course of proceeding—in the Admiralty Court, on the other hand, the examiner had the power of taking the allegation and plea, and, by making that a kind of guide to him in the conduct of the examination of the witness, could put such questions as were likely to elicit satisfactory answers on points contained in the allegation. This latter practice, although better than that which used to be followed in the Court of

Chancery, was still extremely imperfect as compared with viâ voce evidence. But by the Act of 1840 the Admiralty Court was armed with the power of altogether dispensing with written depositions, and of calling witnesses before it and examining them, as at Nisi Prius, by counsel on both sides, and then of deciding on the weight due to their testimony. By this change one of the most valuable and important changes ever effected had been introduced; and it was the object of this Bill to extend the same principle to all the Ecclesiastical Courts. He had made an inquiry into the working of the Act of 1840 in the Admiralty Courts. Now, one great difficulty in extending parole evidence to the Court of Chancery had always been, that, instead of there being an affirmative on the one side and a negative on the other (as at criminal law), upon which issue was joined, there were a vast number of allegations and statements of fact in the Bill which were denied in the answer, and on the whole matter, as it were, issue was joined. Now a question of salvage was just a case of that description. The question was, the merits of the salvor, and how much he was entitled to. But that involved the consideration of a vast variety of circumstances and particulars, such as the state of the weather, the state of the vessel, the conduct of the party salving, and that of the party salvaged. All these circumstances had to be brought before the court, and evidence had to be taken upon them to enable the Judge to make up his mind as to the merits of the salvor, and the compensation due to him. Now, since 1840, questions of that kind had been repeatedly brought before the Court of Admiralty, and been dealt with in the easiest manner. Sometimes, after the witnesses had been examined, cross-examined, and re-examined, the Judge at once decided the case upon their testimony, and upon any documentary evidence which might be adduced. At other times he postponed his judgment for a day or two; but even then he had an authentic record of the questions put to the witnesses and their answers, and his own memoranda of anything that struck him at the time as to their demeanour, to refer to before giving judgment. The Bill for which he now asked for a third reading would give to the Ecclesiastical Courts the benefit of this great and important change. Having referred to the mode of proceeding in the Court of Chancery, he would remind their Lordships of another course which was sometimes adopted, namely, the examination of witnesses before a Commissioner in the presence of the parties. This system, though an improvement upon the examination by written interrogatory, had not been so successful as the viâ voce examination which had been adopted in the Court of Admiralty. It gave rise to endless expense and interminable delay, and was, besides, open to the great objection that the Judge did not see the witnesses, but only read the depositions. He had recently mentioned to their Lordships a case of this nature, of which he had since ascertained further particulars. In that case a learned friend of his was engaged for eight or ten days in examining witnesses, at a distance of 200 miles from the court. At the end of that time the expense incurred amounted to 400*l.*, and the depositions covered 400 folios. His learned friend had informed him that he was convinced that, before the examinations were concluded, the expenses would have amounted to 1,200*l.* or 1,500*l.*, and the number of folios occupied by the depositions to 1,500. On the conclusion of the examinations, these depositions would be sealed up and would be transmitted to the Court of Chancery, in order that his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) might examine them and give a decision on the case. It was utterly impossible that any one, from reading such a mass of evidence as this, without having heard a word of it given, or seen the demeanour of one of the witnesses, could arrive at a distinct, useful, and trustworthy conclusion upon the case. He was aware that there might be difficulties in the way of introducing viâ voce examinations into the Court of Chancery, but he was convinced from experience, and his opinion was confirmed by what had occurred in the Court of Admiralty, that these difficulties were by no means insuperable, and he trusted that before long we should see this most important improvement effected. The country was much indebted to his learned friend (Dr. Phillimore) for the preparation of this Bill. That learned person was a distinguished civilian, and it was upon his experience in the Court of Admiralty that this measure had been founded. A right rev. Prelate had suggested the extension of the measure to Ireland; but he (Lord Brougham) had found that this could not be done without inserting in it a compensation clause, to introduce which this House had no power. In England the examinations of witnesses were taken by any proctor who might be appointed in each case; and on their part there could, therefore, be no claim for compensation. In Ireland, on the contrary, three or four proctors were selected, who were not allowed to practise, and upon whom was cast the duty of performing these examinations. If their offices were abolished, they would, therefore, be entitled to compensation; and this he thought was sufficient reason for not attempting to extend this Act to Ireland.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought there could be no difference of opinion as to the great importance and utility of this Bill. He had no doubt that it would be a great improvement on the present system, and he trusted that it would furnish an example which might be followed, even if not entirely adopted, in the reforms which were now under consideration in the mode of taking evidence before the Court of Chancery. The improvements which had been recently introduced were very great, but still they were not entirely satisfactory. But, as the noble and learned Lord was aware, there were great difficulties in the way of adopting a pure and simple system of voir dire examination. The Commissioners, however, were perfectly acquainted with the importance of some change being made, and it was very satisfactory to know that one of the most zealous of their body was the head of the Admiralty Court, in which this system, as the noble and learned Lord had stated, had been found to work so advantageously. It certainly would be a matter for congratulation if, during the recess, some mode could be devised of getting rid of the present enormously expensive system; but the noble and learned Lord must himself feel that simply to adopt a mode of procedure by which it would be necessary to have witnesses up from all parts of the country to be examined in the Court of Chancery—to have them detained in town, as they necessarily must be, day after day, while the cause was waiting to be brought on—would be materially to increase, instead of to diminish, the expense. It must be observed, however, that the Judges in the Court of Chancery had the power of calling for the witnesses and examining them voir dire if they thought fit, and also that, as there was in the Court of Chancery an appeal upon the facts as well as the law, the facts of the case must, under such circumstances, be fully looked into a second time by the Court of Appeal. He could assure his noble and learned Friend that the subject should have his most earnest attention.

Lord Brougham

LORD CAMPBELL rejoiced that this scheme was likely to become the law of the land. He had certainly, at first, grave objections to measures for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts, simply because he thought that those Courts had already been doomed, and that they would soon be allowed to die out. He had been told that the testamentary cases were to be removed to another tribunal, and that divorce and matrimonial cases were also to be removed from those Courts. It was also thought that the suits in Ecclesiastical Courts were to be altogether abolished. Unfortunately those hopes were now to be cruelly disappointed. It appeared that those Courts had a charmed life, and were immortal. Under such circumstances he thought that the present Bill would be a great improvement to the proceedings of those Courts.

LORD BROUGHAM said, the way to render unnecessary the bringing witnesses to London from all parts of the country, in order that they might be examined by parole in the Court of Chancery, would be to give to local courts power to inquire into the facts, and to return to the Court of Chancery a sort of special verdict, on which judgment should be pronounced. He hoped that this change would be speedily effected, and was convinced that without it there could be no complete and effectual improvement of the Court of Chancery.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

TOWNS IMPROVEMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that he would not at present detain their Lordships by entering into details as to the particular clauses of the measure, which would be better considered in Committee. The Bill was based upon the experience of the different local Acts which had been passed for individual towns, and the impression of those who originated the measure was, that it would be more advisable to have one general Act as applicable to towns generally than in every case to have to apply for a special and a local Act. The Bill was framed on the Irish and Scotch Acts, and he felt little doubt that the Bill would be found well adapted to carry out the improvements that were contemplated and required.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE moved as an Amendment that the Bill be read on that day three months. The noble Earl said, that his objections to the measure were, first, as to the general form of the measure; and, secondly, as to its general details. In respect to his first objection, he observed, that the learned Gentleman who drew up the Bill had availed himself for the whole machinery of the measure of the clauses of various consolidation Acts—the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, the Towns Improvement Clauses Consolidation Act, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; provisions from each of those Acts were introduced into the present Bill. Now, it should be recollected that those Clauses Consolidation Acts were passed for the sole purpose of facilitating the carrying out of private or local Acts; it was never intended that their provisions should be incorporated or made to form part of a public general Act. As the Bill at present stood, it was applicable to no less than 237 towns and villages in Ireland—to any town or village containing 1,000 persons. Now, its details were of a most complicated character, and it could not be supposed that the little shopkeepers in the small towns and villages, though respectable men in their way, could be sufficiently acquainted with the law referred to in this Bill to be enabled to carry out its provisions. Why, they would be confounded by the continual references which the Bill made to Acts of Parliament. How was it proposed that the Town Commissioners under this Bill were to be elected? Why, the Commissioners might be persons whose only qualification for the office was the occupation of a house rated at 12*l.* a year. What was likely to be the effect of this measure? There would, first, be a most complicated and difficult system of law to establish; and next, the appointment of efficient officers to work out its details. If this Act were adopted in small towns, the effect would be utter confusion. In the rural parts of Ireland the burdens had greatly decreased. Where he (the noble Earl) resided the rates had been greatly reduced. But if this measure passed, it would have the effect of creating great additional taxation as well as responsibility. The poor people in the towns and villages of Ireland would be induced to think that this was a simple piece of legislation, intended solely for their advantage; but when they attempted to put it in operation they would find that the main features of the measure were taken from the Consolidation Clauses Acts. He thought that the learned Gentleman who drew up the measure should have stated its provisions upon the very face of the Bill. He believed that thirteen towns had petitioned in favour of the Bill. He (the noble Earl) was quite willing that those towns should have the full benefit of it, but he objected to its application being made general. He considered it a great anomaly that there should be a different qualification for those who would have the power of voting for the application of the measure, and those who would have the right of voting for the Commissioners who were to act under the Bill. The qualifications for the former would be the occupation of a house rated at 8*l.*, and of the latter of a house rated at 4*l.* That difference appeared to him to be inconsistent with common sense. There was another extraordinary provision in the Bill. In the former Acts the rating to give the qualification to a Commissioner was 20*l.*, but in the present measure the qualification for such office was only 12*l.* He did not think that any necessity existed for the passing of the measure at the present moment; and, in the hope that the Government would introduce some better mode of dealing with the subject, he moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out “now,” and insert “this day three months.”

EARL GRANVILLE did not think that the objections taken by the noble Earl were of such a nature as ought to induce their Lordships to postpone the Bill. With reference to the question of qualification, he would be most ready to consider any Motion that the noble Earl might think it his duty to submit in Committee; and, as to the point relating to the magistrates, he begged to remind him that those magistrates could only exercise judicial functions for the purposes of the Bill. He hoped their Lordships would not consent to the Motion of the noble Earl, but read the Bill a second time and allow it to go into Committee.

THE EARL OF DESART complained that the Commissioners were to be armed with arbitrary powers, the exercise of which might subject those over whom they were placed to serious inconvenience and injury. He protested against the powers given to these Commissioners as an evasion of the rights of the people. It might be necessary to pass a measure for the promotion of such objects as the Bill professed to deal with, but this was not a step in the right direction, and he trusted, therefore, their Lordships would not give their assent to the second reading of a measure that seemed to him to be arbitrary, tyrannical, and inexpedient.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, they were not only conferring large powers on the Commissioners by this Bill, but were proposing a qualification that was much too low to secure an efficient class of men. He did not think that bringing in the Lord Lieutenant would be any check whatever to the evil consequences which he anticipated from the Bill. A new principle of election was introduced, to which he trusted their Lordships would not give their sanction. He was friendly to liberal institutions, but they must be careful how they promoted such schemes as the present. Among other powers given to the Commissioners, besides that of extending the area of taxation, was the power of purchasing land with or without the consent of its owner. This he regarded as in the highest degree objectionable.

LORD MONTEAGLE thought that they would do more justice to this subject by not resisting the second reading of the Bill, and by reserving their objections to be separately considered and disposed of, after fair investigation, in Committee.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON said, that by the present Bill they proposed to apply the same powers to large towns and to small villages, and he thought it hard to bring in a Bill containing a proposition of such a sweeping nature. He had not, however, fully considered the Bill, and conceived that the best course for them to adopt was that pointed out by the noble Lord (Lord Monteagle); but a still more preferable course would be to refer it to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF RODEN also concurred in the proposition of the noble Lord (Lord Monteagle). The principle of the Bill was one of great importance, and he trusted that in Committee the objectionable clauses would be obviated or omitted, and the measure rendered really useful.

EARL GRANVILLE trusted, after what had passed, their Lordships would consent to read this Bill a second time at once. With respect to the suggestion that it should be referred to a Select Committee, he thought that they were rather overriding that practice. A similar proposal was made with respect to almost every Bill that came before their Lordships' House. Now, a Select Committee was a very good thing in its way, but it was not a panacea for every possible evil; and with respect to the objections which had been raised against this Bill, they were all of them matters for discussion in Committee, and all of them matters which might very well be settled in the whole House. He thought that whatever alterations were made in the measure had better be made in the House, where the reasons for them might be given, than in a private room upstairs; but he confessed that the only objection which had made any impression on his mind, was that which had been mentioned by the noble Lord on the crossbenches (Lord Monteagle) and the noble Earl opposite the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (the Earl of Eglinton), relating to the compulsory power to take lands. That was a question which he was ready to admit appeared to him to be deserving of further consideration.

The Earl of DONOUGHMORE having consented to withdraw his Amendment, Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn: then the original Motion was agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

VACCINATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BRADY said, he would beg to suggest to the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington), who had charge of this Bill, the propriety of deferring its further progress, because our present system of vaccination was conducted on a mistaken principle. He thought it was not right that the time of the House should be taken up in legislating upon a subject which was not yet understood, especially with the certainty that it would be necessary to legislate again upon it next year. It was quite impossible that this Bill could be worked in its present form. So long as our vaccination system was administered under the Poor Law Board, and as the persons who were brought in contact with it were thereby stamped with the mark of pauperism, it was utterly impossible that the object which the House had in view could be attained. It was impossible, by the means embodied in this Bill, to secure an adequate supply of good lymph. He felt sure that if our present system were continued, the ravages of small-pox would be materially extended. By the first clause of this Bill it was not to come into operation until February next. He would, therefore, suggest that they should not now proceed with this Bill, but that previously to next Session the subject should be inquired into, and he had no doubt that a good practical measure might then be introduced. Under these circumstances, he would move that the Bill should be committed that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "This House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—instead thereof.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the principle of this Bill had been affirmed in the last Session of Parliament, and this measure was merely introduced to correct two errors in the Act of last Session. One was, that a wrong number of days was prescribed, at the end of which the child was to be brought before the medical man for examination; and the other was, that in the Act of last Session no sufficient mode of recovering the penalties was enacted. There were also two or three clauses inserted by the request of the Registrar General. He could not, under the circumstances, assent to the postponement of the Bill.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to:—Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. HENLEY said, he objected to throwing the expense of the vaccination system upon the poor rates. That was, in fact, to impose a new burden upon the land, which was already sufficiently taxed.

MR. BAINES said, that the principle of making the vaccination system a charge upon the poor rates had been affirmed in 1840 and 1841.

MR. HENLEY could see no reason why they should not attempt to redress an injustice, if one had been inflicted.

MR. BRADY said, that it seemed to him to be very undesirable, that the vaccination stations should be at the work-houses.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he wished to hear the opinion of the Government, not only upon the present Bill, but upon the Act of last year. Did they think that the principle which the House then adopted was a good one?

MR. BARROW said, he also thought it was undesirable to pass the present Bill. He had a strong objection to throwing additional charges upon the poor rates.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he wished to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board the view the Government took of the measure of last year, and in the absence of such explanation, he proposed to throw out the clause altogether, in order to throw upon them the responsibility of legislating on the subject.

MR. BAINES, in answer to the appeal made to him by the noble Member for Totness (Lord Seymour), as to his opinion of the Act of last year, said he was not present when that Act was passed, and he was, therefore, personally in no way responsible for it. But such an Act having been passed by the Legislature, he had felt it his duty to endeavour to carry it out in the sense which he understood the Legislature intended. For himself, he entertained doubts, whether it was the wise course to place the vaccination in connection with the Poor Law in any way; but Parliament having taken a different view, his duty was simply to carry out the law as he found it. With regard to the present Bill, the Committee was aware that the Act of last year contained a provision that the child should be brought to the medical man for vaccination on the eighth day, and imposed a penalty on the parent for neglect; but it had since been discovered that the eighth day was the wrong day, and that it should have been the seventh. To cure that fault, therefore, this Bill was necessary. With regard to the charge, the Act of last Session having received the sanction of the Legislature, it was better, in order to carry out that law, to place the charge upon the poor rate instead of the Consolidated Fund. If it was thrown upon the Consolidated Fund, it would be difficult to say what jobbery might take place, or what the extent of the expenditure would be, and therefore he thought it more desirable that the control should be with those who paid the money.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON begged to observe, that this clause had been introduced at the request of the Registrar General.

MR. BRADY said, he doubted whether the alteration of the Bill, from the eighth to the seventh day, was an improvement. He thought that in this climate the eighth was the proper day for bringing the child to the medical man.

VISCOUNT BARRINGTON said, that the opinion expressed by the right hon. President of the Poor Law Board amounted to a condemnation of the Bill. He would therefore recommend the postponement of the measure.

MR. FITZROY said, that as doubts had been expressed as to the alteration of the day, and, after the opinions expressed in favour of the withdrawal of the Bill, he should recommend the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) to consent to withdraw all the clauses but the second. Next Session the whole matter might be referred to a Select Committee, who might inquire how the Bill of last Session had worked.

MR. MICHELL said, that medical men all over the country declared that they were unable to carry out the provisions of the Bill of last year. He was opposed to it on constitutional grounds—as no parents ought to be compelled to have their children vaccinated.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, with respect to the course to be taken with the Bill, he could only say that it was not his Bill, having come down from the other House; but he thought legislation on the subject laudable. He did not feel justified in abandoning the Bill.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he did not object to the principle of the Bill, but only to the mode of carrying out the details. He would refer to the difficulty of carrying out the clause compelling the parent to take the child for inspection a certain day after being vaccinated. He would, therefore, propose to reject all the clauses except the second, so as to leave the question to be dealt with generally next Session.

MR. BRADY said, that small-pox was more prevalent than usual this year, and that arose from the Act of last Session absolutely operating to prevent medical men from vaccinating with the necessary facility.

MR. BARROW moved that the Chairman leave the chair, with the view of getting rid of the Bill.

MR. FITZROY hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press that Motion, because it was important that the second clause of the Bill which related to the penalties should be passed.

MR. BARROW said, that on the understanding that the Bill would be confined only to the second clause, he would not press his Motion.

Clause 1 put, and negatived; Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3,

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, if this clause was not passed, it would reverse the legislation of last Session enacting compulsory vaccination, which he thought desirable. He could not abandon the clause.

The clause was then put, and negatived, as were all the other clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported as amended.

EPISCOPAL AND CAPITULAR ESTATES MANAGEMENT BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. CAYLEY said, he wished to propose the following instruction to the Committee—

“That it is expedient in this Bill, renewing the Act 14 & 15 Viet. c. 104, to define more clearly the intention of the following words in the first clause of that Act, namely, ‘It shall be lawful for any Ecclesiastical Corporation, sole or aggregate, with the approval in writing of the Church Estate Commissioners, who shall pay due regard to the just and reasonable claims of the present holders of lands, under lease or otherwise, arising from the long-continued practice of renewal, to sell to any lessee, under any lease granted by such corporation, the reversion, estate, and interest of such corporation in all or any of the lands comprised in such lease, for such consideration, upon such terms, and in such manner as such corporation and lessee may, with such approval as aforesaid, think fit.’”

He thought it right that the attention of the House should be called to this question, and he, moreover, wished to call to the recollection of the House what had taken place many years since, when the present Lord Monteagle, then Mr. Spring Rice, introduced a Bill on the subject, and reminded the House that Parliament had decided that due regard should be paid to the just and reasonable claims of the present holders of land, whether under lease or otherwise. In the year 1832 the Real Property Commissioners recommended that a final settlement should take place between the Church and the laity on the basis of customary payments. In the Agricultural Committee of 1833, a plan was suggested in favour of the uniform settlement of the tithe question at the rate of 75 per cent; but the noble Lord the President of the Council stated that it had been the custom of Devonshire from time immemorial to pay only 40 to 50 per cent, and that it would be absolute confiscation to come down to the House, and say that the persons who had paid only 40 or 50 per cent should be called upon to pay 75 per cent. The noble Lord accordingly brought in a Bill in the year 1836 to settle the tithe question precisely on the basis of customary payments. After the year 1837 Parliament began to interfere between the landlord and the tenant, and the lessor and the lessee. The parties were previously competent to drive a bargain with each other; but when Parliament backed one party to stand out against the other, the other had no chance whatever, and that was the injustice of which, practically, the lessee had to complain. In 1850, when the Estates Commissioners Bill passed, which enabled the Bishops to transfer their material interests into the hands of the Estates Commissioners, and to accept in return a fixed income, he had asked his noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) whether that Bill would prejudice the lessees' case; and his noble Friend said "No, no." But the House would observe how it had very materially prejudiced it; for when once the tenure was changed, and the power to lease was transferred from a dying body like the bishop to the hands of an undying body like the Commission, the Commission might choose to say that they would not renew, and, consequently, the indirect effect of passing the Estates Commission Act had been to prejudice very materially the lessees' interests. That was not carrying out the intentions of Parliament as expressed in the Act of 1851, or providing that due regard should be paid to the just and reasonable claims of the holders of lands under lease or otherwise. The Bill of 1851 having passed as a permissive Act, he (Mr. Cayley) was in hopes that at the expiration of the three years his noble Friend would have brought in a compulsory measure in order to effect a settlement of the question. In 1851 the principle of the compensation of the lessee where loss was sustained by him was affirmed by Parliament, but it was done in a singularly vague manner, and no general discussion had taken place. If the noble Lord the President of the Council was referred to, to state the sum at which the amount of compensation should be fixed, he would have no fear of the result. For a period of 200 years successive renewals of church leases had been allowed, and such was the confidence felt in the continuance of the system that settlements in some parts had been made with reference to them. The tenure was peculiarly popular among the yeomanry of the country, as by it that class became virtually proprietors of the land, and in the diocese of Durham, where one or two cases of disputed title occurred, it was not the bishop or the dean who came forward to vindicate it, but the lessee, who, it was considered, was most interested in the question. Such entire reliance had been placed upon that custom in the diocese that nearly the whole of the town of South Shields had been built upon leasehold land. Another point to which he wished to call the attention of the House was, that the Estates Commissioners based their calculations on the lives actually in the leases. Now that rule would press very hardly upon the holders of leases, particularly of small properties; because, in consequence of the reliance which had been placed on obtaining renewals, the lives were frequently not in so favourable a state for the lessee as they might have been. After all, this came to a question of extracting more from the lessees than they had been in the habit of paying. The plan which the Government proposed in 1837 would have had the effect of taking 250,000*l.* a year more out of their pockets than they had previously been charged with. This, at thirty years' purchase, amounted to 7,500,000*l.* The Church Estate Commissioners, however, according to the system they had pursued, would take 12,000,000*l.* from them—really a very large sum to charge upon so limited a body of persons, especially when it was recollected that they had hitherto considered themselves as practically the proprietors of the land.

Mr. SPEAKER said, that such an instruction was unnecessary, because, under the title of the Bill, the Committee were empowered to entertain the question referred to by the hon. Member.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must appeal to the hon. Member to allow the House to go into Committee. He could then move any Amendments he wished.

Mr. CAYLEY said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Mr. H. G. LIDDELL said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the propriety of giving the places where funds arose from dealing with church property a prior claim to relief from them. This principle had already been approved by Parliament in dealing with the tithe rent-charge. At Hartlepool, Berwick, Newcastle, Leeds, and other towns in the north, the means of spiritual instruction were quite inadequate to the demand; in one large parish, containing 22,000 inhabitants, there was only one church and one parochial school, capable of instructing about 100 children. At Gateshead there was not church and school accommodation for one-seventh of the population. The clergy of Hartlepool had not, altogether, an income of more than 1,500*l.* a year, and the incumbent of one of the largest parishes in that borough had only 170*l.* a year. In several townships there were neither churches nor schools, and the natural result followed in the degraded condition of the juvenile population. He did not wish to throw any blame on the Estate Commissioners, but he did think that those places from which large sums of money were derived had a prior claim to relief from them. One object of ecclesiastical property was undoubtedly to provide for the spiritual wants of the people, and Parliament ought not to be indifferent to the purposes which that property was intended to meet. If the House assented to the introduction of an arbitration clause in the present Bill, they would undoubtedly facilitate the enfranchisement of church property. This would necessarily place large funds in the hands of the Estate Commissioners, and it was therefore especially necessary that the House should now recognise the claims of the places where the property so enfranchised was situated.

MR. AGLIONBY said, he thought that nothing could be so desirable as to have some good and clear guide with respect to what are just and reasonable rights to compensation on the part of the lessees.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1, 2, and 3 agreed to.

Clause 4,

MR. INGHAM said, he was convinced that some alteration in the machinery was necessary in order to ensure greater despatch in the transactions under the Bill. He would, therefore, suggest that there should be a body for arbitration, or set of arbitrators appointed, to get rid of the difficulty to which he referred, and would

consequently move the introduction of the following words to the clause—

“That the Bill be extended for two years, and that in every case where a treaty shall have been entered into under the provisions of this Act, for the sale, purchase, or exchange of any episcopal or capitular estate in England, or of any interest in such estate, it shall be lawful, by the consent of both parties to such treaty, to refer to arbitration the finding of the annual value of such estate, and of the value of the fee simple thereof, subject to the exceptions and reservations, if any, to be excepted and reserved thereout, and that such finding shall be adopted in computing the terms of such sale, purchase, or exchange, regard being had, in the final settlement of such terms in every such case, to the just and reasonable claims of the present holders of land under lease or otherwise, arising from the long-continued practice of renewal; and that in every such case one arbitrator shall be appointed by each of the parties to such treaty, and the two arbitrators so appointed shall, before they proceed in the matter referred to them, appoint an umpire or third arbitrator, and the proceedings upon such arbitration shall be conducted in like manner, and subject to the same rules and enactments as upon a reference made by consent upon a rule of court or judge's order. Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the parties to such treaty to appoint one and the same person to act as sole arbitrator; and in such case the valuations, acts, and award of such arbitrator shall have the same effect as valuations, acts, and award of the arbitrators and umpire, under the provisions herein contained; and in every case the costs of such arbitration and award shall be in the discretion of the said arbitrators or umpire, as the case may be.”

He considered that the clause did not interfere with the present voluntary character of the Bill, and he thought that the interests of the lessees would be better stated before a court of arbitrators, and more easily decided upon than in protracted negotiations with capitular bodies.

MR. GOULBURN said, that if the object of the hon. and learned Gentleman was to enable the dean and chapter, on one side, and the lessees on the other, to appoint arbitrators to decide between them, all he could say was, that it was now open to the parties to do so, and there was no objection in point of form, which prevented the dean and chapter, on the one side, and the lessee on the other, appointing joint or single arbitrators for the purpose of ascertaining what, in their view, was the value of the property. Any clause of this nature was, therefore, unnecessary, and absolutely a work of supererogation. But if the hon. and learned Gentleman meant that the Church Estates Commissioners were to be bound by the arbitration entered into between the two parties, the case was totally different, and the proposition was one to which that House should not accede. It should be borne in mind that the principle on which the House had sanctioned this dealing between the capitular body and their lessees was this, that there was a hidden value in the property which it was fair should be divided, not between those two parties, but between the body that was interested in it (the capitular body) on the one side and the general interests of the Church on the other. It was only out of the surplus which was to be derived after the arrangements had been made that there was any hope of deriving funds for the relief of that spiritual destitution which an hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. G. Liddell) had pointed out in such strong and just terms as prevailing in different districts within the county which he represented. The whole objection was that an arrangement should be made to suit entirely the objects of the two parties who contracted it, and it was necessary that it should be made with reference to the interests of the Church at large, for the purposes to which he had already alluded. The capitular body and the lessee might have a joint interest in depreciating the interest of the estate to the lowest possible amount. The capitular body would derive no advantage from the augmentation of the value, and the lessee, connected as he might be with the other, as agent or trustee, would have a manifest interest in depreciating the value of the property with which he had to deal. If the decision were made by two arbitrators, one of whom was appointed on behalf of each of those parties, it might occur that the interests of the Church, which were ultimately to be served, would only be injured. Before any opinion could be expressed on the clause it was necessary to understand whether the arbitrator's decision was to be subject to the uncontrolled revision afterwards of the Church Estates Commissioners, or whether it was to be held as one that should be binding and compulsory upon them.

Mr. INGHAM said, that the proposed clause contained nothing to interfere with the power of the Church Estates Commissioners to pronounce a final decision on these questions.

Mr. GOULBURN said, that in that case the apprehensions which he had expressed with respect to the clause were removed; but he did not know whether the Committee would be disposed to agree to a clause merely to sanction that which the two parties might do at present. The only objection he saw to the proposed clause was, that in its working it was likely to excite dissatisfaction with the proceedings of the Church Estate Commissioners in cases where they set aside the award of the arbitrators.

Mr. AGLIONBY said, the explanation of the hon. and learned Member the mover of the clause was certainly exactly the reverse of that which he expected, for he understood it was intended to provide something definite in the way of arbitration. That might have been the subject of discussion, but, as explained by the hon. and learned Gentleman, the clause would be not only unproductive, but mischievous, by causing much useless irritation and heart-burning between the lessees and the Church Estates Commissioners. As he read the clause, he understood that the award of the arbitrators would be binding on the Commissioners, for, although it came before them for confirmation, if it did not bind them, it would be of no utility whatever. There could be no doubt that, however liberal the arrangement might be, under the Act of Parliament the lessee would lose some years' valuation, and regard ought to be had to his interest. The clause, as it stood, did not seem to confer any benefit upon him, and he hoped the hon. and learned Member would either give some further explanation or not press it.

Mr. INGHAM said, at present there were no means of knowing how the sum charged was calculated. What he wished by this clause was to have an arbitrator, not for the purpose of fixing the sum to be paid, but of ascertaining the value of the fee simple, the rent, and other particulars which might form the basis upon which the calculations would be made by the authorities when they came to consider the amount to be paid, and which amount would, of course, depend on the value of the lease and the consideration to be given to the lessee beyond his term, the whole matter being eventually submitted to the Church Estates Commissioners. At present, they had no power to reduce the amount, however excessive it might be.

Mr. EVELYN DENISON said, the present was a permissive Bill, and the great advantage of the proposed clause was, that it did not interfere with its permissive character. But his hon. Friend the Member for Coker-mouth (Mr. Aglionby), would turn it into a compulsory Bill. Now, he asked, would that be preserving its character, and would they keep within its title and direction if they introduced a compulsory clause of that nature? The object of the hon. and learned Member for South Shields (Mr. Ingham) was to establish some machinery for the purpose of bringing the parties together, and he begged to ask whether it would be consistent with the opinions of the noble Lord the President of the Council, that an arbitrator should be appointed by the Church Estates Commissioners to act on behalf of the Church generally; and, as that could not be done without the assistance of Parliament, it would get rid of one of the objections that had been urged?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that Parliament having adopted this plan for the enfranchisement of capitular estates, it was desirable to carry it into effect; his hon. Friend who spoke last said with great truth, that the intention of Parliament was, that this Act should be voluntary, and it was advisable to maintain that principle. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn) had stated correctly that it would not be sufficient that the bishop or the capitular body on the one hand, and the lessee on the other, should each appoint an arbitrator who should choose an umpire, because it might be that the interests of the two parties alone would be consulted, and that of the Church neglected; for, although there might be many instances in which the lessee and the chapter might have no interests in common, in other cases large estates might be transferred without proper regard to the general interests of the Church. His hon. Friend the Member for Malton (Mr. E. Denison) had said this was a question of giving great facilities for arrangement between the lessee, the ecclesiastical body, and the Church Estates Commissioners, and he (Lord J. Russell) thought it was desirable that such facilities should be given, and considered that the suggestion the hon. Member had made would tend to produce a just and fair settlement of the question. He did not know whether the exact words drawn out by his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General would answer the purpose, but he proposed to insert after the word "treaty," the words "with the approbation of the Church Estates Commissioners," and, after the words "in every such case one arbitrator shall be appointed," to omit "by each of the parties," and insert instead, "by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the other by the lessee or the intending purchaser." That seemed to him a very fair proposition, and he should like to know the opinion of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge on it. It was with great pleasure he had observed during the discussion that justice had been done to the Church Estates Commissioners, who, it must be admitted on all hands, had manifested a very fair and impartial spirit in the working of the Act.

MR. GOULBURN said, he doubted very much whether the adoption of the suggestion of the hon. Member for Malton would facilitate transactions of the kind they were now considering. He could quite understand that a capitular body would be willing to enter into negotiations with their lessees, when they were to be conducted by each party nominating an arbitrator; but he feared they would not be equally ready to do so if they knew that, the moment they commenced a negotiation, another body would send down an arbitrator. He did not think that the Committee had any reason to be dissatisfied with the progress that had been made in the enfranchisement of church property, seeing that in the last two and a half years, 3,000,000*l.* of property had undergone that process. Every one knew what would be the course of proceeding under this clause. In all cases of arbitration, the arbitrator of one party fixed the price as high as possible, and the arbitrator of the other as low as possible, and then the umpire took the medium. Now, no doubt, in arbitrations under this clause, the lessee would fix the value of the property as low as possible; but if the Church Estates Commissioners fixed the price as high as possible, he (Mr. Goulburn) would be asked by some hon. Member how they came to fix so exorbitant a value upon the property; and it would be no answer to that complaint to say that they had done so because they knew the umpire would take the medium between the highest and the lowest price. The Commissioners would thus be placed in a very difficult and invidious position.

MR. MULLINGS said, he thought the object of the clause was, to give some protection to the lessee, but if it were true that the latent value which was said to be in the property was to be applied to the funds for decreasing spiritual destitution, what became of the lessee's interest in the renewals? He thought the clause as it stood might be easily carried out, and he did not see, because extreme cases might occur, in which lessees attempted to depreciate the value of the property, that they should be debarred from a fair consideration of their rights arising out of the long-continued practice of renewals. The lessees had held those estates in continued succession since the enabling Acts of Elizabeth, and all the improvements in the property for the last 200 years had been made by them : it was not fair, therefore, that they should be subjected to the control of the surveyor appointed by the Church Estates Commissioners and be placed under his veto. Such a proceeding would not be in accordance with the intentions of the Legislature, conveyed in the Act of 1851.

MR. CAYLEY said, it was not correct to say there was a latent value in the property, for, although an additional amount might be obtained by the Church Estates Commissioners if they compelled the lessees to sell separately, which they would have to do at a disadvantage, yet until that occurred, whatever latent value existed was enjoyed by the lessee.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he concurred in thinking that much injustice had been done to the lessees, and that the only question was, whether they should adopt or reject the addition to the clause proposed by the hon. and learned Member. He trusted the Committee would, without further discussion, accept it in its amended form.

MR. HENLEY said, he did not think the words that had been introduced by the Solicitor General would give the Church Estates Commissioners the appointment of one of the arbitrators.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he would beg to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the words of his Amendment—

"In every such case, one arbitrator shall be appointed by the Church Estates Commission and the other by the lessee or intended purchaser."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn) was under a misapprehension in supposing that the value was to be ultimately settled by arbitration.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE—DR. REID.

MR. G. DUNDAS said, he begged to move for copies of the correspondence between the Board of Works and Dr. Reid from the 1st of June, 1852, to the 10th of February, 1853. He was desirous of bringing this question before the House, believing it to be due to the character of Dr. Reid, that some explanation and inquiry should be made with regard to his most unwarrantable dismissal from the position he held in connection with the House; for which he had abandoned an honourable and lucrative profession. He was not biassed in Dr. Reid's favour by any personal feeling, but his opinion of the case had been gathered from documents from which he should give extracts bearing on the case, and he trusted that he should be able to establish such a case of hardship as to induce the House to grant an inquiry into its circumstances. He would shortly state, with regard to the antecedents of Dr. Reid, that he was for many years a practical chemist in Edinburgh, and bore a reputation as a lecturer on chemistry, and he had made a number of successful experiments in ventilation in his own lecture-rooms. In 1834, after the Houses of Parliament were destroyed by fire, and the new ones projected, the question of the ventilation of those buildings came under consideration, and in consequence of the evidence given by Dr. Reid, he was desired to make further experiments, and the temporary House of Commons was placed under his care and ventilated in such a manner as to call forth from Lord Duncannon, then Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, in a letter written by him, an opinion that the experiments of Dr. Reid were most satisfactory. Dr. Arnott, about the same time, had given an opinion in favour of Dr. Reid's system. In 1840 Dr. Reid entered into an engagement to ventilate and warm the new House of Parliament, and the nature of that engagement had been much misapprehended. Dr. Reid understood that his services would be required until the new buildings were finished; and nothing less would have induced him to give up his lucrative occupations in Edinburgh. But the engagement as interpreted by the Treasury bore a very different aspect to that in which Dr. Reid viewed it. He (Mr. Dundas) believed the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Molesworth) differed from the view of that engagement taken by Dr. Reid, and that he interpreted it to extend only to such time as the Houses of Lords and Commons remained untenanted. [The hon. Member here read portions of a correspondence between Dr. Reid and Mr. Mills, tending to show that the engagement was supposed to extend to the management of the whole building.] Dr. Reid's system was a large and comprehensive one, and embraced the whole pile of buildings. In 1844 his duties were extended to the superintendence of the lighting of the House. The Duke of Newcastle, then Lord Lincoln, and the other Commissioners of Works at that time, expressed the highest opinion of Dr. Reid's capabilities; and urged that, as he had been so successful in warming and ventilation, he should also be intrusted with the lighting of the House. However, misunderstandings arose between Sir Charles Barry and Dr. Reid. He (Mr. Dundas) would say little about them; but would content himself by stating two instances of misunderstanding between them, which he thought would place Dr. Reid in a different position in the eyes of those who now thought he was to blame. He had no desire to depreciate a gentleman who had produced a building like the Houses of Parliament; but he must say, that he regretted that he had not lived at a period some hundred years antecedent to the present time, when very different views were entertained with regard to the comfort and usefulness of buildings like these. The first misunderstanding arose in consequence of the many changes made by Sir Charles Barry in the great central tower. All Dr. Reid's air-passages and channels were connected with the central tower, and the alterations proposed by the architect in that tower entirely confused all Dr. Reid's operations. In 1845, in consequence of the disagreements between the architect and the ventilator, a conference was proposed with the view of settling their differences. This conference, in Dr. Reid's view, partook of the nature of a private conversation; but some time afterwards Sir Charles Barry sent in to the Board of Works a paper which he called "Minutes" of what took place at the conference. The accuracy of those Minutes was, however, repudiated by Dr. Reid. In 1852, when Lord John Manners was Chief Commissioner of Works, he recommended that Dr. Reid be appointed for life; but Dr. Reid found it impossible to accept this offer, subject to those thwartings which had been practised upon him. Difficulties occurred, and Dr. Reid received notice that, on the 1st of November, 1852, his services would no longer be required. He was, however, directed to get his arrangements ready before the meeting of Parliament in November. He set to work with great energy, and employed a great many men. Up to this time he had had very little control in directing the arrangements to ventilate the House. Four days, however, before the opening of Parliament, his office was taken possession of, his works put a stop to, the young men whom he had been training up were dismissed, and the whole matter placed in the hands of a man whom he had no confidence in whatever. Dr. Reid threatened to go to law to assert his rights; but an arbitration was proposed, and after some delay he consented to it. When the reference had been gone into, however, the arbitrators were informed that if they gave any decision which could not be supported in a court of law, they would subject themselves to heavy penalties. The result was, that he received only a small sum compared to what he was entitled to. Sir John Forbes, one of the arbitrators, stated that if it had not been for the restrictions placed on the arbitrators, he should have awarded a much larger sum. On these grounds he trusted that the House would agree to the production of these papers.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That there be laid before this House, Copies of all Correspondence, Documents, and Communications between the Board of Works and Dr. Reid, from the 1st day of June, 1852, to the 10th day of February, 1853:

"And, of the Evidence taken last year at the Arbitration between the Government and Dr. Reid."

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he thought this a very extraordinary motion, and one which the House should not be asked to entertain. The question had been settled last year by an arbitration which Dr. Reid consented to, and a Vote of the House was passed in consequence for the sum of 3,250*l.* When he (Sir W. Molesworth) came into office, he found that his predecessor had put an end to Dr. Reid's engagement with the House of Commons. Dr. Reid complained of injustice, and demanded compensation; and it was agreed that the matter should be referred to the decision of two arbitrators, one appointed by Dr. Reid, and the other by the Government. Dr. Reid demanded compensation to the sum of 10,000*l.* in all. The arbiters, however, awarded him 3,250*l.*, and that sum was paid to him. The reference lasted no fewer than thirty days; the evidence, of which the hon. Gentleman now wished copies, covered 5,000 folio pages; and the cost of supplying those copies would be not much short of 1,000*l*. If the hon. Gentleman wished to read the evidence in question, he (Sir W. Molesworth) would afford him every facility for doing so, if he would call upon him at his office. Having said this much, he thought he need not further occupy the time of the House.

Motion negatived.

CLAIMS OF MR. STURGEON.

MR. BOWYER said, that pursuant to notice, he would beg to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the claims of Mr. Edwardes (as representative of William Sturgeon) on the funds allotted by the French Government at the peace to compensate for confiscation of the property of British subjects. Between the years 1778 and 1793, Mr. Sturgeon, a British subject, expended very large sums of money, amounting in the whole to upwards of 26,000*l*., upon the erection and stocking of a very extensive manufactory for the fabrication of porcelain and delf at Rouen, in Normandy. Mr. Sturgeon was undeniably a British subject, and in 1793 his property was confiscated by the Revolutionary Government, simply because it was that of a British subject. By the treaties of Paris of the 30th of May, 1814, and of the 20th of November, 1815, and the conventions entered into in pursuance thereof, very large sums of money were provided by the French Government for liquidating the claims of British subjects in respect of losses incurred by the confiscation of their property; and by the 59th Geo. III. c. 31, entitled—

“An Act to enable certain Commissioners fully to carry into effect several conventions for liquidating claims of British subjects and others against the Government of France;”

it was provided (inter alia) that parties dissatisfied with the award of the Commissioners should have a right of appeal to His Majesty in Council. Mr. Sturgeon, however, was one of a number of claimants who did not present their claims to the Commissioners within the time limited by the conventions; but there was a Treasury Minute, made on the 2nd of May, 1826, to allow further time to those parties to put in their claims, and the Commissioners were thereby required to investigate those claims on the same principle in all respects as they had done those which had been preferred in due time. Under that Minute, Mr. Sturgeon's case was investigated by the Commissioners. He claimed

22,000*l*., which, together with simple interest, computed from the time of the confiscation to the 24th of June, 1826, amounted to 43,586*l*.; the Commissioners, however, awarded him only 5,000*l*., which sum, after the deductions of 2 per cent, as authorised by the Act of Geo. III. was paid to him. The reason why so small a sum was awarded to Mr. Sturgeon arose out of his inability to produce his deeds, books, and papers, which were proved before the Commissioners to have been seized and destroyed by fire during the revolution, and from the Commissioners not having given due weight to the secondary evidence produced in support of the claim. It was material to observe that the Commissioners admitted the validity of Mr. Sturgeon's claim. The question adjudicated upon by them, however, was merely that of the amount. Mr. Sturgeon remonstrated against their decision, and made several applications to the Treasury; but he failed in obtaining any legal redress, because at that time there was no right of appeal. Another Minute of the Lords of the Treasury, dated 8th of June, 1830, stated, among other things, of “those whose claims, not having been presented within the time limited by such convention, have been subsequently admitted to adjudication under a Minute of this Board, and have been, on adjudication, either only partially allowed or disallowed altogether.” “With respect to the second class, as their admission to participate in the advantages of the convention was an act of pure bounty on the part of His Majesty, they cannot, strictly speaking, have any right to an appeal from the decision of the tribunal to which His Majesty thought fit to assign the task of distributing his bounty. But as, in admitting those parties to share in the benefits of the convention, it was my Lords' intention to admit the satisfaction of those claims, as far as they were found to be just, without any objection as to the time of their presentation, my Lords do not see any inconvenience likely to result from giving to such of them as may wish to prefer an appeal to the Privy Council against the decision of the Commissioners in their respective cases, a power to prefer that appeal, provided that such appeal be lodged within a definite period.”

By a Minute of the Lords of the Treasury, dated 15th of March, 1833, it was stated—

“The only claimants who would have had a right of appeal under the proposed Bill are those whose cases were considered under the authority of the Minute of this Board of the 2nd of May, 1826, and were disallowed, or only partially allowed, by the Commissioners. It appears, however, that the opinion of the Privy Council may probably be obtained upon these cases, which will be few in number, supposing even the whole to claim the right of having the decision of the Commissioners reviewed by that tribunal, without an Act of Parliament for that purpose.”

The Minute then went on to provide that if there should ultimately turn out to be a surplus, after payment of the claims which should be admitted by the Privy Council upon appeal, the fourth class of claimants mentioned in the Minute of the 8th of June, 1830 (who were claimants in respect of losses at Bordeaux, and the subject of a distinct convention, whereby a specific and distinct sum of money, though insufficient, was provided for their satisfaction by the Government of France), should receive out of that surplus a certain portion of their demands, which the particular fund had been insufficient to satisfy. Now, what he, on the part of Mr. Sturgeon, contended was, that that money was wrongfully distributed to the Bordeaux claimants, and that it ought to have gone in satisfaction of such claims as those of Mr. Sturgeon. Besides, no notice whatever was addressed to Mr. Sturgeon, or to any person acting for him, of the liberty to appeal to the Privy Council, whilst such notice had been given to every other person similarly situated. In 1853, Mr. Edwardes, acting as the representative of Mr. Sturgeon, petitioned the Queen in Council for leave to appeal from the award of the Commissioners. The appeal was heard on the 31st of July, in the same year, and dismissed. In the course of the argument, Lord Justice Knight Bruce intimated that the Court might be willing to adjourn the case, to give the petitioner the opportunity of applying to the Lords of the Treasury to allow their Lordships to hear the case on the merits; but their Lordships ultimately decided that they had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, being of opinion "that the merits, if any, could only be brought forward before them at the instance of the Lords of the Treasury." An application was subsequently made to the Lords of the Treasury to have the appeal heard before the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but they declined to comply with it. No laches could be imputed to the petitioner. It was not till 1833 that Mr. Sturgeon had the right to appeal, and then, after the right to appeal accrued under the Treasury Minute, he had no notice of the right of appeal. In July, 1842, upon an application from Mr. Sturgeon, the Treasury answered that arrangements had been made to distribute the whole of the fund—this, in fact, amounting to an intimation that there was no money. Now, assuming that there was no money in 1842, there was, at least, money in 1833, when Mr. Sturgeon ought to have had notice, and when, if he had had notice, he would have made his appeal. It was, then, the fault of the Treasury that the petitioner had no opportunity of bringing forward his claim in 1833, when there were funds in hand to meet it. Besides, to this plea of nulla bona it was a very sufficient answer to say, "You have given away our money to the wrong persons"—namely, the Bordeaux claimants. The petition did not proceed in 1842, because it was not until 1850 that the petitioner was able to prove, by the discovery of a private Treasury Minute, that he had no notice of the right of appeal in 1833. The petitioner now came to that House as a last resort. From what he (Mr. Bowyer) knew of the case, he believed that the Committee which was now asked for would have a very short labour to perform, and that they would come to the conclusion that Mr. Edwardes was wronged in not being allowed to appeal, and that he ought to be allowed to appeal to the Privy Council.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL seconded the Motion, believing that reasonable ground had been shown for inquiry.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the claims of Mr. Edwardes (as representative of William Sturgeon), on the funds allotted by the French Government at the Peace, to compensate for confiscation of the property of British subjects."

MR. J. WILSON said, he thought that the House ought to pause before they allowed the time of a Committee to be taken up in inquiring into a case from which there was so extremely little chance of anything practical issuing. Mr. Sturgeon was stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman to have made his claim to the Commissioners under the convention of 1815, which provided a fund for the losses of English subjects living in France during the revolution. Now, the House must recollect that that convention and fund were applicable solely to cases in which confiscation of British property had been made by the French Government. Mr. Sturgeon's claim had received the careful consideration of the Commissioners, and it was not the fact, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had stated, that the Commissioners admitted his claim; on the contrary, the Commissioners never did nor could admit it. Mr. Sturgeon declared that the whole of his property at Rouen was plundered and destroyed, and the fact was, that it had been plundered and destroyed by a common mob, and the petitioner had no claim whatever upon the fund which the Commissioners had to administer. From that day to the present Mr. Sturgeon had been unable to furnish any statement of the property he had lost, but, besides this, he (Mr. Wilson) repeated that this was a case which did not come within the meaning of the convention, and in which the Commissioners had no power to act. There was, however, no question that Mr. Sturgeon had suffered a considerable amount of loss, and in 1827 the Commissioners, looking to the whole circumstances, resolved to take into their merciful consideration the case of a gentleman of such high character and respectability; and, notwithstanding the fact that, properly speaking, he was shut out from any participation in this fund by the nature and character of his loss, they did recommend the Treasury, as a settlement in full of all demands upon them, to grant Mr. Sturgeon 5,000*l.* out of the money at their command. He would ask the House whether at this period of time, the claim having been settled in the manner which he had described, it would be wise and prudent to institute an inquiry into a question of this kind? The House must remember that this fund was now entirely exhausted, and that any claim of this nature must be satisfied out of the common taxes of the country. Under all the circumstances, he hoped the House would not agree to the appointment of this Committee to spend its time hopelessly in raising a matter which had long been settled.

Mr. BOWYER, in reply, said, that the property of Mr. Sturgeon had been both confiscated and destroyed, and that the destruction of the property had taken place after the confiscation. The claim of Mr. Sturgeon was, therefore, no doubt one which came within the operation of the convention.

Mr. MALINS said, he should support the proposition, and he believed that high authorities had decided in favour of the claim. With regard to the assertion, that there were no funds available, he thought that, if the fund which had existed for settling these claims had been expended for the benefit of the public, the public would not object to funds being raised to defray a just claim.

THE SHIP "THETIS"—CAPTAIN DICKENSON'S CLAIMS.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT, in moving for a Select Committee, stated, that on December 5, 1830, H.M.S. Thetis, then on her passage from Rio Janeiro to England, was wrecked at Cape Frio, on the Brazilian coast, having on board treasure to the value of 810,000 dollars. The commander in chief of the station, Admiral Baker, having proceeded to the scene of the wreck, returned with the firm conviction that the freight could not be saved, nor any of the stores but such as might be drifted upon the coast. Captain Dickenson, then in command of H.M.S. Lightning, one of the squadron, earnestly importuned the Admiral to allow him to attempt the recovery of the treasure. The Thetis had been wrecked under a line of almost perpendicular cliffs, of considerable height, and exposed to the heavy swell of the South Atlantic Ocean. She had gone entirely to pieces, and, with the force of the sea, the stores and treasure were driven beneath large masses of rock, at a depth of water varying from six and a half to twelve fathoms. Admiral Baker permitted this enterprising officer to proceed to Cape Frio in the Lightning; no better proof can be given of his constructive talent than the fact that the diving-bell and air-pump, with other mechanical appliances, were due to his ingenuity, and that he formed an enormous derrick, twelve feet longer than the shears in Portsmouth Dockyard, from which to suspend his diving-bell, out of twenty-two fragments of the spars collected along ten miles of coast. He then commenced his work, and had raised 100,000 dollars, when he was acquainted by Admiral Baker that he had received instructions from the Admiralty, of date August 11, 1831, by which it was clearly to be understood that the public service was not to be put to any expense by the endeavour to save the treasure from the wreck of the Thetis, beyond the attendance of the ship employed on that service, and the use of the crew when the service of the station admitted of it. In consequence of this letter Captain Dickenson was refused the assistance of further public stores; two alternatives were thus presented—the one forthwith to abandon the enterprise, the other to prosecute it at his own risk; to his credit he chose the latter, and thus was driven to the necessity of expending a sum of nearly 700*l.* at his own cost. In the face of disease, the hazard of storms, and liability to numberless accidents, he continued his operations, by which 588,801 dollars were recovered of the merchant's treasure, and of the public stores to the value of 2,000*l.* after a trying service of fourteen months. The King's stores actually issued to the Lightning, and expended by her from January 1, 1831, to March 10, 1832, when the service was transferred to the Algerine, were, in actual value, 1,064*l.*, while the stores lost or otherwise expended amounted only to 375*l.* Many of the former, such as anchors, cables, &c., having suffered little or no wear, were reissued to the squadron. It appears that the actual amount of treasure which had been raised from the bottom of the ocean was 588,801 dollars by the Lightning, and about 161,000 dollars by the Algerine—making a total of 750,000 (of the 810,000) restored to the owners and the country under circumstances of the most forbidding difficulty, and these dollars netted the sum of 157,000*l.*, of which 54,000*l.* were awarded as salvage; but the salvors received only about 29,000*l.*—12,000*l.* having been incurred in expenses, and the Admiralty having demanded, for wages, victuals, naval stores, and wear and tear, the sum of 13,872*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* From the foregoing statement it will be seen that the sum actually paid to the salvors, for eighteen months of perilous services, amounted to 28,200*l.*, less agents' charges. It has been shown that public stores, to the value of 2,000*l.*, had been recovered, and that the cost of the stores used amounted to 1,054*l.*; the gain, therefore, was in favour of the public. The Lightning had been withdrawn from the above service on occasions when required by the senior naval officer on the station, and at all times was kept prepared for any service which might have demanded her employment. The charge, therefore, for victuals and wages, amounting to 10,626*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*, was most unfair, and the charge for naval stores and wear and tear, amounting to 3,207*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* equally unjust, as the ship was lying at the anchorage of Cape Frio, and suffering no wear and tear at all except that which would have been incurred had she been on any other part of the station; in fact, the ships were engaged in a way conducive to the honour and credit of the country. This employment was not, in any degree, detrimental to the public interest, and they were acting in pursuance of Admiralty orders. This sum, then, of 13,833*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* Captain Dickenson claims for himself, the officers and crews employed on this arduous service, being the salvors, as evidently no charge was contemplated by the Admiralty letter of August 11, 1831, and it was an unjust deduction when first demanded by the Admiralty in December, 1832, and actually paid on September 13, 1834, to the Treasurer of Her Majesty's Navy. In the Marine Bill, brought in last Session, the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty, with great justice, introduced a clause inhibitory of the advance of any Government claims for wear and tear of stores in case of salvage, or any other expenses attendant on the same. I therefore appeal to the First Lord of the Admiralty to reverse the claim of 1832, and in justice restore the 13,672*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, which, without precedent, as far as I am advised, were unjustly deducted from the reward and hard earnings of a very meritorious and unparalleled service. The Board of Admiralty will, by this act, redress an injustice committed in 1832, by following out the enlarged view taken in 1853, when the officers and men employed in that arduous enterprise will no longer be disheartened—no longer be smarting under a sense of wrong by what they consider to have been an arbitrary deduction. With what consistency could the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty answer me some evenings since, that he considered it to be inexpedient to reopen this question, because an adverse decision had been awarded by successive Boards of Admiralty, and that a limit must be set to the advancement of claims, when common right requires the redress of a wrong, only deepened by the lapse of years, to which the right hon. Baronet alluded, while he himself, by his clause in 1853, has openly acknowledged that he considered such a charge, in cases of salvage, contrary to justice? I would earnestly impress upon the House that I ask for no grant of public money for past services, but am merely making a renewed application for the repayment of money unjustly deducted from energetic officers and men, and paid over to the account of the Treasurer of the Navy on a claim which I—and I think the House will agree with me—have shown to have been utterly destitute of foundation. I am sensible of the indulgence with which the House has listened to the statement I have made in submitting this Motion for a Select Committee, and I can assure hon. Members that no circumstance less than an enthusiastic love for my profession, and the firm conviction that I advance a claim of stern justice, would have induced me to have undertaken a duty I so imperfectly have performed.

SIR GEORGE TYLER said, he would second the Motion, as he believed that a case could be made out which required justice to be done. The zeal, ability, and ingenuity of Captain Dickenson had tended to save the sum of 157,000*l.*, and it could be shown before the Select Committee, if the House should accede to the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend, how great that zeal and ability had been. The Admiralty had made a large deduction from the amount awarded to the salvors, on account of the wear and tear of the ships employed in the service, and the wages of the men; but the whole of the operations had been conducted with the consent of the commanding officer on the station, and the ships were ships employed on the station, and therefore their crews would have had to be paid whether these services had been performed or not. He, therefore, trusted that the House would grant the Committee asked for by his hon. and gallant Friend.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the Claims of Captain Dickenson, R.N., on behalf of himself, the Officers, and Crews of Her Majesty's Vessels employed on the subject of Salvage, &c., connected with the recovery of Treasure in the Wreck of Her Majesty's Ship Thetis, off Cape Frio, on the Coast of Brazil."

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he felt convinced that he needed not to assure the gallant Admirals, the mover and seconder of the proposal before the House, that he gave them full credit for the motives which had led them to bring this subject before the House, and also that, if he could agree with them as to the justice of the claim, he would be the last person to oppose the Motion; but he was bound to say, that he had come to a conclusion different to that which had been arrived at by the hon. and gallant Admirals. The subject was by no means a new one, for he had first become acquainted with it some twenty-three years ago, and as to the facts of the case there was no dispute. The Thetis, having on board a large amount of treasure belonging to merchants, was lost, under circumstances in which accident was more or less mingled; but, at the same time, in the opinion of the Board of Admiralty of that day, there had been considerable, if not culpable, neglect. The Admiralty, feeling that there had been a great amount of loss incurred by private persons on account, to a certain extent, of the conduct of their officer, thought it right to consent to the unusual course of allowing the few ships on the station to be employed in attempting to recover the treasure; but, contrary to the expectation of the Board of Admiralty, fourteen months had been occupied in the task. He did not mean to speak in a tone disparaging to the exertions of Captain Dickenson on that occasion, and, as he had stated, he had acted under the consent of the Board of Admiralty; but it had been decided, after these ships had been employed upon so unusual a service for the space of fourteen months, to place a check upon their being further employed, by making a deduction for the wear and tear of the ships and boats, which had been very considerable. Various suits had been instituted by the salvors against the deduction made by the Board of Admiralty, and they had all been defeated, and he wished to remind the hon. and gallant Admiral, that the deduction to be made was not fixed by the Board of Admiralty, but by the Admiralty Court, after a full and careful consideration of the facts of the case. He was of opinion, that if the money ought to be paid, Captain Dickenson ought not to receive one farthing of the money, and that if any one was entitled to the money, it was the merchants whose treasure had been lost. What he had stated on a former occasion, that, after the case had been frequently decided, some limit ought to be put to these claims, he could only now repeat, and on this particular question there had been repeated decisions. Under the law, Captain Dickenson had not a shadow of claim to this 13,800*l.* If it were a question at all—though he denied that it was—the question lay between the Government and the parties whose treasure was lost; and, therefore, entertaining these opinions deliberately and decidedly, he could see no necessity whatever in instituting any further inquiry. The facts were clear, and investigation had already taken place, and consequently, though feeling the highest respect for Captain Dickenson, who, in an honourable position at Greenwich Hospital, enjoyed the rewards?

his past services, he felt bound to resist the Motion.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he entirely disagreed with the right hon. Baronet, who thought that this was a question between the Government and the merchants. He regarded the case as one requiring investigation. It was all very well to say that Captain Dickenson was housed at Greenwich Hospital; but in that position he was placed for his general services, and not for exertions made in the Lightning, in reference to this particular transaction.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, that the performances of the Lightning, her captain, and crew, in bringing up this treasure from a great depth, were the admiration of the whole Navy at the time. He thought the House ought to decide in favour of the Motion, in order that a Committee might see whether there was not justice in this claim. As to the gallant officer being in Greenwich Hospital, he trusted that that circumstance would constitute a title to consideration rather than otherwise. The gallant officer was there because he was old and worn out in Her Majesty's service, and not because he was commander of the Lightning.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, that having considered this case more than once, he had come to the conclusion that Captain Dickenson had no claim. He did not mean to detract from Captain Dickenson's merits, for he concurred in everything that had been said with respect to them, but he was bound by the law as laid down, and the Judge himself informed Captain Dickenson that the money was not his, but the salvor's, if anybody's.

MR. WILKINSON said, he considered that no sufficient ground had been shown for conceding the Motion, besides which, he deprecated the growing habit of making that House a court of appeal against the decisions of the ordinary tribunals of the country.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I am happily persuaded that nothing which has fallen from the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty, or from the gallant Admiral the Member for Gloucester, has tended in the slightest degree to weaken the impression of the statement made by me. The right hon. Baronet has repeated that successive Boards of Admiralty and Treasury have decided against the claim I advance, and the gallant Admiral has adduced an opinion to the same import as held by the late Sir Thomas Hardy when at the Admiralty. I therefore, with the permission of the House, will read a letter addressed to Captain Dickenson by Admiral Sir Charles Napier, then a Member of this House, in contradistinction to the foregoing statements.

"July 28, 1842.

"My dear Sir—I have much pleasure in informing you that your claim is favourably looked upon both by the Admiralty and Treasury. I have spoken about it to Sir George Clerk, and I last night mentioned it publicly in the House.

Yours truly,

"CHARLES NAPIER."

The Court of Admiralty may, for aught I know to the contrary, have admitted the demand made by the Admiralty, but this I right well know, that on the appeal to the Privy Council a very different view was taken. In this there can be no dispute, that the efforts made to recover the treasure were marvellous in their origin and successful in their results—that of 810,000 dollars hopelessly sunk in the ocean, 750,000 were recovered, and the human being lives not who, in justice, could deny the fair claim to one-third part of that amount to the salvors. As to the underwriters they were most essentially benefited, for at one time the depreciation was to the extent of 75 per cent, and certain I am, did not party prevail, I should be followed into the lobby by almost every hon. Member now in the House.

The House divided:—Ayes 40; Noes 41; Majority 1.

SLOOP "STAR"—COMMANDER

F. P. WARREN.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the return for which he was going to move was one of considerable importance as regarded the management and discipline of Her Majesty's Navy. He was induced to bring forward his Motion in consequence of a statement which had appeared in the public papers giving an account of certain cases of flogging and cruelty on board Her Majesty's sloop Star, commanded by Commander Warren. It was said that nearly all the crew of the Star had been flogged, that many petty officers had been disgraced to able seamen in order that they might be put in a position to be flogged, and that a considerable number of able seamen had been reduced to ordinary seamen. He, on a former occasion, asked the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether the statement was correct or not, when the right hon. Baronet said that only a few punishments had taken place on board the Star, and that those punishments were inflicted in a case where some seamen had stolen a cask of wine and got drunk upon it. He (Mr. Williams) had since that statement received a communication from the crew of the Star, and they indignantly denied the charge, and he was sure the right hon. Baronet had been deceived. He would place his information against the information of the right hon. Baronet, and was ready to go into an inquiry with perfect confidence of being able to show that the right hon. Baronet had been entirely misled. The right hon. Baronet had refused to give the return asked for by the Motion, upon the pretence that the House of Commons was not a fit place for having anything to do with either the discipline or the management of Her Majesty's Navy. The House of Commons had done more for the Navy and the Army than any Board of Admiralty or any Commander in Chief had ever done, by exposing the cruelties that had been practised in both services. What was the consequence? The practice in the Army was to inflict 1,000 lashes. That was the maximum punishment, and it was contended that they could not inflict a single lash less without bringing the Army into a state of insubordination. Well, a Motion was made for abolishing flogging in the Army, and what followed? Why, the Duke of Wellington reduced the number of lashes from 1,000 down to fifty. That was done entirely in deference to the opinion of the House of Commons. It was just the same with respect to the Navy. 1,000 lashes was the punishment in the Navy, and these were inflicted with a cruelty that would disgrace a cannibal. Well, he himself brought forward and exposed cases of cruelty in the naval service over and over again; and what had been the consequence? Why, the punishment had been brought down to forty-eight lashes in the Navy. According to returns presented to the House, the number of men flogged in the Army in 1845 and the first six months of 1846, was 341, who received 38,500 lashes, being an average of 112 lashes to each man; the number of men flogged in the year 1852 was forty-five, who received 1,900 lashes, being an average of not quite forty-six lashes to each man. In that same year there were 101 regiments in which not a single stroke on the back of any man was inflicted. In the Navy, in 1842, 2,107 men were punished, who received 71,024 lashes; in 1852, only 578 men were flogged, who received 17,500 lashes. Why did the right hon. Baronet refuse to give the return he asked for? Did he mean to say that, after the House had placed in his hands 13,000,000*l.* to expend on the Navy, and that without a single word of objection, they were not entitled to the information that return would give? If the statement made respecting the Star was correct, great mismanagement must have taken place, and the House ought to be informed of it. But the right hon. Baronet at last thought fit to remove Commander Warren from the Star. What did the crew say? They said they were ready to shed their blood in the service of their Queen, but they objected to have their blood shed by the cat-o'-nine-tails by this Commander Warren. He was not surprised that the Government should have removed that man from his ship, for many desertions had taken place in consequence of his treatment of the crew. And what were the crimes for which these brave men were flogged? He had a list of some of them, among which were "telling untruths," "foul language," "disrespect," "insolence," "fighting," "quarrelling," "irregularity," "bad language," "smoking at his post," "absent without leave," and "negligence;" these were the sort of crimes for which these noble fellows had their flesh torn from their bones. It was a disgrace to the country and to the age. There was no flogging in the French army or the French navy. Our fleets and our armies were now joined with the fleets and armies of France, and what must the French think of us when they heard the groans of brave men when suffering under the lash? They must look upon us as degraded beings. He was quite convinced the sympathy of the House would be against the system, and would support him in the Motion he now begged to submit to the Chair.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, a Return of the number of Petty Officers, Seamen, and Marines, respectively, who were flogged on board Her Majesty's sloop Star, while under the command of Commander F. P. Warren, stating the alleged offence, the number of lashes inflicted on each, the number who were flogged more than once, and the number of lashes inflicted in each flogging; also, the number of Petty Officers disgraced, and of Able Seamen reduced to Ordinaries."

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he had thought that he was under some obligation to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lambeth on account of the courtesy which had induced him on more than one occasion, at his (Sir J. Graham's) request, to postpone this Motion, and he had not been slow in thanking him for that attention to his request. But he certainly had hoped that the delay would have led the hon. Gentleman to make a dispassionate statement, and that he would have made that statement, when calling for inquiry, perfectly accurate. He would not go through the various cases which the hon. Gentleman had introduced into his statement. The hon. Gentleman had said that there was a time when 1,000 lashes were inflicted in the Navy. He (Sir J. Graham) denied the accuracy of that statement altogether. The hon. Gentleman had also stated that 13,000,000*l.* had been placed at the disposal of the Board of Admiralty. Now, the hon. Gentleman might be excused in a matter long since past; but he certainly ought to be accurate as to a circumstance which took place during the present Session of Parliament; but 13,000,000*l.* was not the amount. Then, the hon. Gentleman hinted, that there was a fondness on the part of the Board of Admiralty for corporal punishment. So far from that being a correct state of the case, the Board of Admiralty was against corporal punishment in every case where it was possible to be dispensed with. The very statement which the hon. Gentleman had adduced proved the fact, for he had shown that within the last twelve years, so far from any fondness having been evinced for that kind of punishment, there had been a constant disuse of it, both in the Army and the Navy, so that that species of punishment had, within a few years, been brought down to a smaller amount than was ever known at any former time. Then the hon. Member wished to be informed what number of petty officers, seamen, and marines were flogged on board Her Majesty's sloop the Star; and yet the hon. Gentleman himself stated that a petty officer could not be flogged. The terms of his Motion would, however, lead the public to believe that that punishment could be inflicted on them. The hon. Gentleman then said—taking credit to himself, which he (Sir J. Graham) was not desirous of denying to him—that in consequence of some question which he brought before the House, the Board of Admiralty had instituted an inquiry into the case of the Star. So far from that being the fact, however, an inquiry was instituted by the Board into that case before the hon. Gentleman's question was put. Again, the hon. Gentleman said, that in consequence of that inquiry, which he imagined was instituted by reason of his question—which he (Sir J. Graham) denied—Commander Warren was removed by the Board of Admiralty from the command of the Star. Now, Commander Warren was not removed at all. He was not removed from the command of that ship. On the contrary, the Board of Admiralty was prepared to allow Commander Warren to go out in command of the ship Star, and it was only in consequence of his own solicitation, on account of ill health, that he was not now in command of that ship. The hon. Gentleman further stated, that there was a great unwillingness on the part of the crew to serve under Commander Warren; whereas, the fact was, that two-thirds of the crew had expressed their perfect willingness to go with him to any part of the world. The hon. Gentleman also added, that numerous desertions had taken place from the ship. He would not speak positively, but his belief was, that not more than two desertions from the ship had occurred since what had taken place in that House on the subject. But, on the last occasion, he (Sir J. Graham) had to appeal to the House against instituting itself into a tribunal, or court of review, in reference to the decisions of the lawfully constituted authorities on the subject of the discipline of the Navy, and he then stated that it was not usual for that House, on ordinary occasions, to institute itself into such a tribunal. The hon. Gentleman had referred to a private conversation held between himself and the hon. Gentleman, in which he (Sir J. Graham) stated his objection to the case being brought before the House. He (Sir J. Graham) had not come prepared to hear the hon. Gentleman state to the House the substance of a private conversation; but, nevertheless, publicly he was ready to repeat what he had said privately to the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman must have misunderstood him, if he thought he had said, that it was not one of the functions, nor the high privilege of the House of Commons, to lay down principles for the guidance of the Executive in every branch of the Government. If the House of Commons should lay down the principle, that corporal punishment should cease in the Navy, then, though he might demur altogether from such a decision, still, if it were deliberately pronounced, after debate, by a full House, his decided opinion was, that the Executive must yield to that decision. But, on the other hand, if, in anything, in laying down a principle for the guidance of the Executive, the House should interfere with the authority of the Executive in matters of discipline and regulation, his opinion was, that it would be fatal both to the Army and to the Navy. In this particular case of the Star, an inquiry was first instituted by the Board of Admiralty; an eminent naval officer was directed to investigate the case, and it was afterwards referred to another, who fully reported on the facts. That Report was carefully considered at the Board of Admiralty, at which were present himself, three admirals, and one naval captain, and they all came to the conclusion that there had been indiscretion and misconduct on the part of the commanding officer, but not of such a character as subjected him either to be tried by court martial, or to be superseded. The commander had the opinion of the Board read to him, and he was then admonished to be more careful in future. With respect to the crew, it was shown that there had been much want of discipline, much insubordination and drunkenness among them. It was true, that at Rio de Janeiro, four men had been flogged on one occasion, and, although the hon. Gentleman had denied the statement, he (Sir J. Graham) would repeat that those punishments arose out of the circumstance that a cask of wine was broken open, and that four sailors were drunk and grossly insubordinate on that occasion. They were accordingly punished, and, in his opinion, were properly punished. Similar cases of insubordination and intemperance were on other occasions punished, but it was a gross exaggeration to say that two-thirds of the crew had been punished. It was quite erroneous to say that petty officers had received corporal punishment on board that ship. He should be very sorry if the House, in a matter of discipline which had been carefully reviewed by the proper authorities, should erect itself into a tribunal or court of appeal in this special case. If the House should desire that corporal punishment should not be inflicted in any case, he hoped that they would at least allow that justice had been administered in a merciful manner by the Executive, and that they would not do anything that would tend to weaken that authority which was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of order, discipline, and subordination in the Navy. He, for one, was fully aware that corporal punishment was most painful either to witness or to inflict. As he had already stated, the cases in which it was inflicted were very few, but it was absolutely necessary, when a vast body of men were congregated in a narrow space under circumstances so peculiar, that, in order that authority might be upheld in the hands of one man, punishment must be brief and decisive. At the same time, that authority was so limited that it could hardly be abused without detection; for, as he had on a former occasion stated to the House, that although the service required prompt punishment, yet the rule was, that corporal punishment should not be inflicted till after the lapse of twenty-four hours—that there should be a warrant for the execution of the punishment in which the facts of the case justifying its infliction should be recorded, which warrant should be transmitted to the Board of Admiralty. Each case was submitted to the Board, and he was sure the House would not believe that the Board of Admiralty was so wanting in feeling and humanity as not to look into, or that there was any disposition on their part against looking into, all these cases. He could assure the House it was a most painful duty, but he trusted that it was a duty which, for the honour of the laws and for the safety of this country, more especially in a time of war, the Executive would never neglect faithfully to discharge. He hoped, therefore, the House, on the whole, would be content with the statement he had made, and not agree to the Motion, nor interfere with the arrangements which the Board of Admiralty had already effected. The ship had gone to a distant station, and the matter was at an end.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he was led to believe, from a letter of Admiral Dundas, which he had seen, that the best way of abolishing flogging would be to discontinue the supply of rum in the Navy. Sir John Ross had found that he could do very well without it in the Arctic regions.

MR. W. WILLIAMS, in reply, said, the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty, instead of meeting the question, had had recourse to special pleading. He (Mr. W. Williams) knew that petty officers, as such, could not be flogged; but the moment they were disrated they could be flogged, and this had been done for the purpose. He did not ask for any change in the discipline of the Navy; all he wanted was a statement of the extent of punishment in the Star. The right hon. Baronet said that Commander Warren had not been removed; but he had requested that this Motion might be postponed until the Admiralty had determined what should be done, and he understood him to say that Commander Warren had been removed.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: I did not say that; I said he had resigned.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that was merely a gentle way of letting him down.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, he must deny that any petty officer had been disgraced for the purpose of being flogged. Such a course would be contrary to the rules of the service.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PRINTING (HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT, &c.).

MR. J. GREENE said, he begged to move for a Select Committee to consider the most efficient mode of providing for the printing required for the Houses of Parliament and the public service. There were at present two modes of supplying this printing work—namely, one under the control of the Stationery Office and the other by what were termed the Parliamentary printers, who received 20 per cent for printing Parliamentary papers. He thought it right the printing and stationery of the House of Parliament should be placed under the surveillance of the House itself, seeing that they amounted to some 80,000*l.* a year. He had no doubt a saving of 40,000*l.* annually could be effected under these heads. He did not speak without information on the subject, as he had embarked much money in a printing speculation some time since, which, had it been supported, would have resulted in cheapening, as well as facilitating, the art of printing, which was now very imperfectly understood by the great bulk of society, and even by men who had large capitals embarked in the business. By the system to which he was referring, he undertook to demonstrate that no less than 6,000 letters could be composed in a hour, whereas only 1,000 could be composed at present. He undertook to demonstrate that that which now cost a shilling, could be done under the new system for one farthing. In fact, the 5,000 letters which now went to make what was called a "galley," could be composed or "set up" under this system at a charge of 7½*d.*, though the cost of such at present was 3*s.* 10*d.* These were not mere assertions; he should demonstrate them, and that the saving would be some 40,000*l.* a year, which, in a time of war, with taxation pressing heavily on the community, ought not to be overlooked. He undertook to give the Foreign Office a good and useful printing office, which it had not at present, and also to ensure them a system which, on occasions requiring confidence, could be managed by their confidential clerks, who would be enabled to compose and print confidential communications, in any language, in the briefest possible time, and at the least possible expense to the country. He (Mr. Greene) was not anxious to have anything to do with the composition of the Committee; let Her Majesty's Government nominate it, and he would be ready to carry his statements into proof. He, therefore, thought he was not asking too much at present, when the result was certain to be the demonstration of economy, simplification, and expedition in the printing department of both Houses of Parliament.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to consider the cheapest, most expeditious, and most efficient mode of providing for the Printing required for the Houses of Parliament and the Public Service."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question was one of very great importance, involving considerations much more serious than those already brought under the notice of the House. There were, in fact, two questions before the House of an entirely different character. The first was, as to the printing required for the Government and Houses of Parliament, and whether it was performed in the best manner. Now, as respected the printing done for the Government, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) of course, could not speak of that limited part which was of a most confidential character, and which could not be considered on ordinary mercantile principles. But with respect to the ordinary printing of the Government, as far as he was aware, he believed the best arrangements which the market permitted were made for that purpose. As regarded the printing of Parliamentary papers, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not informed, but he had every disposition to believe that considerable economy could be effected. However, it was not a matter that belonged to the Executive Government to consider; but his belief was that if a Committee were appointed very considerable advantage might be expected to result, as he had no doubt that portion of the public service might be more advantageously and economically performed than at present. Having arrived at that opinion, he should think it but right to set upon it on the proper occasion. At present he did not think there would be any advantage in appointing a Committee to inquire into the subject. The Session had now arrived at a period so advanced that it was plain no Select Committee could make progress with so important a question in the time that yet remained before the Session terminated. However, it was a question of time, and should be considered of during the recess. But even if the Government should not move in the matter, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should be glad to see the House undertake an inquiry into a matter so entirely within its own control and cognisance. However, he believed the Motion of the hon. Gentleman raised other considerations—considerations of delicacy and difficulty, of which, perhaps, he was not aware. The hon. Gentleman was himself interested in a trading enterprise of great importance, which, according to his own representation, tended to economy and expedition in the important process of printing.

MR. J. GREENE said, he begged to state that he formerly was interested in the matter, and had embarked a large sum of money; but that he was not pecuniarily interested at present.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he certainly inferred, from the hon. Gentleman's previous statement, that he had an interest in the proceeds of that money so embarked. If that were so, that consideration of itself would, in his opinion, raise many subjects for doubt as to why a Committee of Inquiry should be sanctioned by that House, on the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. The House would require to exercise great caution before appointing such an instrument of inquiry into the enterprises of a commercial character, in which one of its own Members had a pecuniary interest, and in which the apparent object was to turn the discovery to such purpose that it might be employed by himself. Even if such were not the case, there were other grounds on which it would not be possible to accede to this Motion. The hon. Gentleman called the attention of the House to the application of a new mechanical process in the art of printing, the effect of which would be to reduce the expense of setting up a galley of 5,000 letters from 3s. 10d. to 7½d.; as also to simplify and expedite the art of printing generally. The question then resolved itself into this, whether it was a fit matter for that House to undertake to determine upon the comparative excellence and cheapness of different mechanical processes, or to leave the question to the open market, where the capital and enterprise of the country afforded a better means than that House possessed of deciding the matter? They were on secure ground in going into the open market for the best and cheapest; but they would be on dangerous ground if they, the stewards of the public money, undertook to examine into these matters, and to decide which was the best and cheapest, in defiance of the judgment of those engaged in trade, and who speculated on improvements of that description. Ought not the proprietors of the morning newspapers to take an interest in a system which would reduce the expenses of printing from 1s. to a farthing, as also accomplish in an hour what now required six hours? There might be something of a spirit of monopoly in the present system of printing; but if the valuable invention referred to by the hon. Gentleman combined all these advantages of time, economy, and a reduction of expenditure of some 4,800 per cent, why had it not been availed of sooner? It would be wrong, in his opinion, to make that House an organ for experimenting on questions of the kind. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) did not undervalue the statement of the hon. Gentleman; and, if the attention of the trade had not been previously directed to the subject, he felt glad an opportunity was afforded the hon. Gentleman of submitting his statement to the House. If the hon. Member could do as he alleged, he would be a greater benefactor to mankind than Faust and Gutenberg, and bronze statues would soon be raised in his honour. In conclusion, he wished it to be understood that the Government were most desirous to adopt any plan by which the Government printing would be more economically performed. If any hon. Member was interested in the pecuniary result of an enterprise of this kind, it was a serious matter for him and for the House to consider how far they would be justified in granting an inquiry of this kind. He hoped the House would not accede to the Motion of the hon. Member.

MR. OTWAY said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that in any affair of this nature, if a Member had a pecuniary interest, it was matter for grave consideration whether he should in any way possess the advantage of the sanction of that House upon his undertaking; but he thought that when such an important saving was in question an inquiry should be conceded.

MR. GEACH said, he perfectly concurred in the principles laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the guidance of that House, but he could not see what distinction there was between the case of printing and that of the manufacture of small arms. The right hon. Gentleman had stood up in that House on a former occasion to advocate the Government's becoming manufacturers of arms on a very large scale instead of going to the public market, where the means of producing arms were as extensive as the means of executing printing. He hoped the Report of the Committee of which he (Mr. Geach) was a Member would prevent the right hon. Gentleman from persevering in the course on which he had entered. With regard to the Motion, he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that it was not desirable for the Government to undertake what was proposed by the hon. Member for Kilkenny. He could not help remarking, however, that he believed that, if the invention for perforating postage stamps had not been referred to a Committee of that House, it would never have been adopted. He was satisfied that a much larger saving might be effected in the printing of postage labels; but in almost all the Government offices there were people holding permanent appointments who were obstructive of anything like improvement; and it required a Committee of that House, composed of persons who were accustomed to business, and who would not be put aside by a mere statement of difficulties, to do anything effectual. He hoped that next Session the right hon. Gentleman would call in the assistance of a Committee with regard to Government printing and avail himself of the services of Members of practical experience.

MR. J. WILSON said, the hon. Member who had last addressed the House having alluded to the manufacture of small arms, he begged to inform him that the Government had carried on the manufacture of small arms for many years; but with reference to the case alluded to, he was prepared to say that if they could have found fifty or sixty manufacturers of them upon improved principles, they never should have thought of turning manufacturers themselves. The only reason why the Government thought of undertaking the duty was, the difficulty of finding persons willing and competent to perform the work they required to be done. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Geach) expressed an opinion that the Treasury were willing to promote economy in every branch of expenditure, but that there were permanent officers in every department who obstructed all improvement. He could not assent to this statement. He was bound to say that it was not the fault of the Treasury that inquiry had not been made into the expense of public printing before. More than a year ago Mr. McCulloch and Sir Charles Trevelyan pressed the subject upon his attention, but, owing to the pressure of Parliamentary business, it had been found impossible hitherto to take it up. He had, however, given preliminary instructions for a thorough investigation during the recess, and if the subject should not be concluded during the recess, then there would be no objection to a Parliamentary Committee.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, it was his opinion that economy would be materially promoted by the appointment of a Committee; and he hoped the inquiry would be taken up in earnest at an early period next Session.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he must complain that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated the subject derisively, and that he had not given sufficient care to the main subject of discussion. Attention had been called to a mechanical contrivance by a person of great scientific skill, to which his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Greene) had lent aid by supplying funds to work it out, and the result of which would produce enormous improvement in the art of printing. His hon. Friend had pledged himself to establish this fact to the satisfaction of the Committee. When a Member of that House made such a statement, he contended that it was deserving attention. The printing for the two Houses of Parliament cost, he believed, 120,000*l.* a year, and his hon. Friend said he could effect a saving of one-half. He (Mr. FitzGerald), therefore, submitted that this was a matter well worthy of inquiry. Besides, he urged that the invention, if practicable, would be found to produce the greatest effects upon education. He had seen the contrivance himself, and certainly it appeared to be of great simplicity. He should support the Motion.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that if the hon. Member who had brought forward this Motion had confined himself strictly to the terms of it, there might have been no great objection to it; but he had very candidly stated that his object in obtaining the Committee was to discuss the merits of a particular patent. Upon this point, however, he thought that the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been complete. It was not the duty of that House to inquire into the merit of a particular patent, because, if it were available for anything, no doubt it would be taken up by the trade to whom the House offered its printing for competition. There could be no question that the general expense of printing for that House was excessive and might be curtailed, but this was very much owing to the enormous amount of returns which were moved for. An hon. Gentleman, or one of his constituents, thought that a particular matter ought to be inquired into, and he forthwith moved for what was called an unopposed return; that was to say, he went to the Secretary of the Treasury, and said, "If you will not give me this I shall make a Motion, perhaps occupy the whole evening and prevent going into Supply." The Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it was to expedite business, was of course driven to say, "Well, then, take your unopposed return." The fact was, that accounts and descriptions of everything under the sun were printed for that House under the name of unopposed returns, and this it was that occasioned the great expense of printing.

LORD NAAS said, he must protest against the doctrine that under no circumstances was a patent a fit subject for inquiry by a Committee of that House. On the contrary, he held, if any hon. Member made out a case showing that a patent might be turned to the public advantage, that it was the duty of that House to inquire into it.

He would remind hon. Members that some years ago a Committee of Inquiry into the postal communication with Australia entered into the whole question of the screw as a propeller moved by steam; and he believed that the appearance of the screw was materially encouraged by the investigations of that Committee. The Committee now proposed might, it seemed to him, produce somewhat analogous benefits, and he believed it would, for having seen the invention in question, he must say it appeared to him one of a valuable public character.

MR. LUCAS said, he should support the Motion. The proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Greene) did not rest upon the merits of the invention, but upon the existence of an abuse admitted by the Treasury. He had had some little experience in printing himself, and, therefore, he might safely assure the House that the invention recommended by his hon. Friend embodied improvements of the most ingenious and admirable character. And although he would not venture upon any prophecies as to its ultimate success, yet he felt sure that there never was a system that more fully justified inquiry and examination than that brought forward this evening.

MR. HADFIELD said, he considered the proposed inquiry to be invaluable; and though it might not be brought to a close that Session, yet the House would, by consenting to the Motion, be laying the foundation for a complete investigation next year. As far as regarded the merits of the invention itself, all he would say was, that the Bible Society, a body well calculated to speak upon such a subject, were enamoured with the project.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he felt it his duty to oppose the Motion, and for the reason that he did not think the House of Commons ought to be made the channel for advertising inventions. On more than one occasion the House of Commons had been found puffing schemes which traders would not take up, and when they had been finally rejected as useless, the inventors had come down upon them for compensation. They had lately an instance of that in the case of postage stamps. And how did that end? Why, in the House of Commons having to pay 4,000*l.*, and their being made the laughing-stock of the commercial community. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Lucas) spoke much on the excellence of this invention; then let him try it himself. Was he not a proprietor of a newspaper? And when he succeeded in realising his theories, it would be quite time enough for the House of Commons to take them up. They were told also that the Bible Society entertained a high idea of the project, and that it was admirably adapted for their purposes. Then let the Society carry it into effect. The Bible Society required a great deal of printing to be done, and at a cheap rate; they were, therefore, the best persons to test the experiment. No doubt the House of Commons might print a great deal too much, and considerable reformation was needed on that head, but at that period of the Session it would be ridiculous to set about an investigation of that kind, and he should, therefore, strongly oppose the Motion.

Mr. J. GREENE, in reply, said, he must deny that it was possible for private individuals to test the value of the experiment equally well with the House of Commons. The Treasury themselves had admitted the great necessity of reform in this branch of the public expenditure, and as no steps had been taken to remedy the evil it was evidently not safe to leave the matter in their hands.

IRISH LOAN FUND SOCIETIES.

Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the management of the Loan Fund Societies in Ireland. He begged to call attention to two Acts of Parliament, passed respectively in the years 1836 and 1843, for the regulation and management of those societies which were placed under the control of a Loan Fund Board, and certainly these enactments seemed to be sufficient for the security of the money that was lent. His attention having been called to the circumstances of two loan fund societies in the county he represented, he had looked to the abstract of accounts transmitted to Parliament, pursuant to the Acts to which he had referred, and they seemed fair enough so far as they went; but they were so exceedingly meagre, as to leave great room for imposition. He afterwards attended at the loan fund office, to look more particularly into the accounts, and he found that the figures in several columns were exceedingly garbled. It appeared that some of the persons who had borrowed money from them were men of straw, or had gone to America, and that the persons who professed to be their securities were not to be found. It appeared, also, that a great part of what had been paid off by the borrowers was never actually stated to have been paid off, and no doubt there had been dishonesty in some instances on the part of the clerks, and most culpable negligence in other instances. The result was, that the treasurer, out of his own private resources, had to refund a portion of the money to the poor people, who received a dividend of 8s. in the pound. He thought that, for the sake of similar societies still remaining in Ireland, they should ascertain the amount of security in existence, and what amount of security the Government could force the treasurer to give.

Mr. FAGAN seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the management of the Loan Fund Societies in Ireland."

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, he thought there could be no objection to the appointment of a Select Committee, as proposed by the hon. Gentleman; but it was not a question, strictly speaking, in which the Government had anything to do. Many years ago, persons who were in the habit of lending small sums of money to the industrious poor, thought it would be a good thing to obtain facilities for the recovery of those sums, and Acts of Parliament were passed for the purpose, but no Government security was given. A great many persons, at the time those Acts of Parliament were passed, entertained great doubts as to the policy of them, and whether in reality those charitable institutions would be of advantage to the industrious poor; and if doubts were entertained when those Acts were passed, it appeared, from experience, that nothing could be more prejudicial to the interests of the poor than those loan funds; but other persons entertained different opinions. According to this loan fund system, it was impossible to avoid making bad debts. A sum of money was borrowed at five per cent, and lent out at nine per cent, leaving only four per cent for the payment of expenses and the covering of bad debts. They, consequently, found it necessary to keep the money always out on loan, and when they could not get good borrowers they must take bad ones, and in many of them bad debts were contracted where there was the greatest vigilance and accuracy of management. But in the two loan fund societies to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, there was no accuracy at all. The gentleman who had the management lost about 550*l.*, and the debenture holders were also losers, but there was a severe loss inflicted on the gentleman to whom he referred, who seemed to be perfectly single minded, and to have been actuated by the most charitable motives. In conclusion, he begged to say, that there was no objection to the appointment of the Committee.

MR. FRENCH said, that in 1831 a Bill was brought in by him to limit the interest paid upon the contributions to five per cent, the surplus (if any) to go to charitable purposes. Under that system 17,000*l.* was paid over to charitable objects in one year, and the system went on satisfactorily until the famine in 1847. He thought the Government had acted wisely in granting the Committee.

MR. F. SCULLY said, he concurred in the propriety of appointing the Committee, but he thought it well to consider how far the Loan Fund Board could be placed on a more satisfactory footing.

Motion agreed to.

TICKET-OF-LEAVE SYSTEM.

LORD NAAS said, he would now move for

"Copies of Correspondence that had taken place between the Irish Government and the magistrates of the county of Donegal, relative to the liberation on ticket of leave of Miles Sweeny, a man convicted of a Ribbon offence in 1851."

He begged to assure the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, that in making this Motion he did not intend the slightest hostility to the Government; but he thought it desirable at the outset of a new system that the public should know the exact principle upon which those tickets of leave were given. The circumstances to which he was about to allude happened in a remote district in Ireland, and occasioned a considerable degree of alarm amongst the magistrates and the well-disposed inhabitants of the particular county in which the event occurred. It appeared that a man of the name of Miles Sweeny had been convicted in 1851 of an agrarian offence. In about two and a half years afterwards this man was released, and sent back to the same district in which it was found he had pursued a most lawless course. Many years ago Sweeny's father was evicted from his farm. Sweeny then occupied a cottage in the neighbourhood, and a man of the name of Starrett succeeded him in the farm, and occupied the house which had previously belonged to Sweeny. Twelve months before the commission of the outrage referred to, Sweeny threatened to disturb Starrett's position in a most lawless way; and intimated to the latter, that unless he was compensated in respect to some claim which he had set up, he would revenge himself on Starrett. On the 5th of April, 1851, Sweeny, with a party of followers, broke into Starrett's house, declaring, upon their entrance, that they had come there for justice. They thereupon beat Starrett very severely, and from the effects of the injuries which he received he died shortly after the trial; and his mother was so severely treated on the same occasion that she was never likely to recover from the effects of her injuries. In addition to the commission of those dreadful outrages the party of Sweeny stole everything they found in the house; and they took away a horse, which they subsequently killed to prevent detection. There was great difficulty in obtaining evidence in consequence of the lawless state of the country; but Sweeny was ultimately brought to trial, was convicted at the summer assizes in 1851, and was sentenced to ten years' transportation. Since then that part of the country was greatly disturbed, there being no less than forty agrarian outrages between the spring and summer assizes of last year. Two baronies were proclaimed, and a third stipendiary magistrate was sent down there, together with a number of extra police, at the charge of 1,500*l.* a year upon those baronies. At the summer assizes in 1853, Chief Baron Pigott delivered a most impressive charge, and said that seldom in the course of his judicial experience did he know the country to have been in so lawless a state as part of the county Donegal was at that time. To show the state of the country at the last summer assizes, a most daring outrage was perpetrated under the eyes of the Judge himself. A man was about to be tried for a Ribbon offence, and while the Judge was sitting in the court, and the grand jury were going through their business, in the presence of the police, the grand jury, and the Judge, a party of Ribbonmen entered the town, and carried away the principal witness upon the trial. The Judge was so struck by this extraordinary proceeding that he adjourned the assizes, but returned in a fortnight afterwards to try the perpetrators of this outrage, who in the meantime had been captured by the magistrate. The complaint now made in respect to this man Sweeny was this—that notwithstanding the lawless state of the country and of this Ribbon system, this man Sweeny, who was notoriously a bad character, was in a short time after his conviction and sentence of transportation sent back, with a ticket of leave, to the place of his birth—where he was, no doubt, now pursuing the same course of lawlessness and crime. A strong remonstrance was drawn up by the magistrates, and sent to the Lord Lieutenant, together with resolutions, setting forth the great encouragement to outrage which the enlargement of this offender gave, and protesting against the ticket-of-leave system. The resolutions agreed to were these—

“We, the undersigned magistrates of the county of Donegal, with the most anxious desire to carry into effect the wishes and decisions of the Government, as well as the law of the land, crave leave to lay before your Excellency the very great increase of difficulty thrown in the way of our duty, by the plan at present adopted, of granting ‘tickets of leave’ to convicts, whereby they may return to the scenes of their former crimes.

“In this county two prisoners of the name of Sweeny (Miles and Shane), brothers, were tried at the summer assizes, 1851, for burglary, assault, and robbery, upon a man named William Starrett, from which assault, and its consequences, the man subsequently died. The cause of this outrage was agrarian, the enforcing from Starrett a compensation for land given to his father, from whence the Sweenys or their father had been evicted many years before.

“They were convicted, and sentenced to ten years’ transportation. Miles Sweeny has now been at large in this very district since the winter of 1853.

“We, the undersigned, with the utmost respect, submit for the consideration of your Excellency the great encouragement this man’s enlargement gives to the Ribbon confederacy—a system organised expressly to protect landholders against the laws, and so prevalent now in this country, as your Excellency is aware the greater part of it is proclaimed, and not only to afford encouragement to evil-doers, but to impart increased terror and dismay to the well-disposed, and to render it still more hopeless than it has hitherto been to obtain information or assistance to bring offenders to justice; and we very earnestly pray your Excellency that, in the solitary instances of conviction on offences arising out of ‘Ribbonism’ the prisoners may not be allowed ‘tickets of leave’ to return home, which are considered, and indeed cannot be distinguished by an ignorant people from, a pardon; and are, therefore, calculated to render the law still more impotent than it is in all such cases.”

Lord Naas

He (Lord Naas) quite concurred with these opinions, and thought that it was most desirable to know whether it was proposed by the Government to grant these tickets of leave to persons convicted of agrarian outrages. They ought also to know whether they were to be given, in the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, as a mitigation of punishment, or whether they were to be granted as rewards for good behaviour in prison. He certainly did not think that tickets of leave should be granted as a sort of quasi pardon or mitigation of punishment. It was certainly possible that the liberation of this man might have arisen from one of those mistakes which would inevitably arise sometimes; and in that case nothing more could be said about it. But he could not but think that the inhabitants of this district, so long the scene of agrarian outrage, ought to receive an assurance that these perpetrators should not receive tickets of leave, or at any rate that they should not be permitted to return to the scene of their former crimes.

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, there was no objection to give this correspondence, though he must observe that there was nothing in the papers which came before the Irish Government to show that the man in question was convicted of a Ribbon offence. He was sorry to say that the county of Donegal was not in a good state, that disturbances prevailed there, that a district had been proclaimed, and that it would be necessary to continue that proclamation. He apprehended that the ticket-of-leave system which had been recently introduced in place of transportation was now on its trial, and that such tickets would only be granted when the behaviour of the convicts in prison was such as to give a fair prospect that if let out they would not endanger the peace of society. Those remarks had, however, no reference to the present case. The man Sweeny having been convicted of a burglary and a violent assault, was sent to Spike Island, where he remained until two or three months ago. The Lord Lieutenant then received a petition from his wife, stating that he was in bad health, and praying for his release. This petition was referred to the medical officer of the Spike Island prison, who reported that the prisoner was in fact labouring under a dangerous disease, which would be greatly aggravated by continued confinement. That report was sent to the Judge who tried the case, and he having stated that he thought it was proper that under the circumstances the man should be released, the Lord Lieutenant ordered the liberation. Nor did he (Sir J. Young) believe that any Government would keep a man in prison at the risk of his life, when he had been sentenced to a punishment much less than death. He might again remark that there was nothing in the paper that came under the notice of the Government to show that Sweeny had committed a "Ribbon" offence.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to move that the consideration of the Lords' Amendments to the Oxford University Bill be taken into consideration to-morrow se'nnight. In making this Motion, I will take the opportunity of making a statement relative to the business of the House. My attention has been called to a Resolution of the House of Lords of May 2, which is to the effect that no Bills coming from the House of Commons be read a second time, except Bills of Supply, after the 25th of July, unless they be measures of peculiar urgency, or are brought in in consequence of recent circumstances, which must be stated to the House. I am not now quoting the words, but that is the substance of the Resolution of the House of Lords. Well, I do not know that we can much complain that, after the 25th of July, there should be an unwillingness on the part of the House of Lords to consider new measures, but at the same time there is some difficulty in making the business of this House accord with that Resolution. I have thought it best so to arrange the business of this House, that the measures that we can send to the other House shall be sent up by Monday next. There is one Bill more especially which is of the greatest importance to the three kingdoms—the Bill with respect to bribery and corrupt practices at elections. This House has given a great deal of time to that Bill, and I hope it will go through this House without much more discussion. But there are two important points still to be considered—namely, whether this House will sanction in any way, or will withhold its sanction from, any expenses for refreshment or allowances for travelling, and likewise whether any declaration shall be made by Members, either at their nomination or in this House. Still, I hope that we may settle this question, and fix the Bill for a third reading, so that it may arrive in the House of Lords in time. That Bill stands for twelve o'clock to-morrow; and if we do not get through the consideration in Committee of the whole of the clauses, I shall propose to take it again at the evening sitting, and to proceed with it in such a manner that, possibly on Friday, or at the latest on Monday, we may send it to the House of Lords. There are various other Bills of considerable public importance that it will be necessary to take before Committee of Supply, which I had proposed to take on Friday. I will take care that they are placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow, so that the House may know what Bills are to be first proceeded with. With this statement, I move that the Order of the Day for considering the Lords' Amendments of the Oxford University Bill be now read, in order that it may be postponed until to-morrow se'nnight, and I think that the consideration of any other Bills coming down from the House of Lords had better be postponed, in consequence of the Resolution of the House of Lords to which I have called attention.

Motion agreed to; Consideration of Lords' Amendments deferred from to-morrow till Thursday, 27th July.

CHURCH TEMPORALITIES, &c. (IRELAND)—ADJOURNED DEBATE (THIRD NIGHT).

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Question [13th June]—"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the Laws relating to the Temporalities of the Church in Ireland, and to increase the means of religious instruction and church accommodation for Her Majesty's Irish subjects."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. KENNEDY said, that, notwithstanding the impracticability of considering a measure of such importance at this advanced period of the Session, he considered it right that an opportunity should be afforded to the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Serjeant Shee) of answering the statements that had been made, and he therefore thought he had discharged his duty by moving the adjournment of the debate on the previous occasion.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, he considered he was entitled to call the attention of the House to any subject in which a large constituency were interested, but more especially when he had been charged with such misstatements and exaggeration, he was bound to vindicate himself. He should proceed at once to reply to what had been stated by the opponents of the measure. The House would recollect that when he introduced this question he stated the object was to transfer a portion of the surplus income of the Irish clergy of the Established Church to Commissioners composed of Presbyterians and Roman Catholics, for the purpose of employing it in a manner similar to that in which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland employed a large portion of their revenue—namely, in rebuilding, repairing, and furnishing places of worship for the Presbyterian and Catholic communities. He proposed that the accounts of such Commissioners should be laid before the House annually, and that they should be appointed by the Crown. He had also gone into various statistics, and quoted the opinions of Dr. Paley and Bishop Warburton, that the Established Church of Ireland had failed in its object, and he had submitted that, there being at the most only 882,000 members of that Church out of a population of 6,500,000, it did not effect the object of civil utility, on which alone, according to the opinion of Bishop Warburton, a Church establishment was justifiable. He had also quoted the opinions of Lord Brougham, Lord Grey, Lord Campbell, the noble Lord the President of the Council, and the right hon. Baronet the Colonial Secretary, that the present state of the Church Establishment in Ireland was indefensible. In reply to that, the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland (Sir J. Young) said, that the opinions in question only applied to the state of the Irish Church at a very distant period, and not at the present day; but he (Mr. Serjeant Shee) would remind the House that those opinions had all been given after the settlement of the Irish Church in 1833; and that in 1836 Lord Morpeth brought in a Bill on the subject which differed in no material respect, except the manner in which the surplus revenue was proposed to be appropriated, from the Bill which he now asked leave to introduce. In a question of such importance, he asked, could the House blame him, representing as he did a constituency of 150,000 souls, of whom 8,000 alone were Protestants, for wishing to bring in a Bill on the matter, when he found the whole of the ecclesiastical revenues of his diocese in the hands of the clergy of those 8,000 persons; while the clergy of the members of his own creed had neither houses to live nor churches to worship in, unless they provided them out of their private resources? What was he there for if he had not a right to bring this shameful grievance before the people of England? And he believed that when they were informed of it, they would be the first to correct the abuses he complained of. What he asked was, whether they would maintain their Establishment in dignity and honour, and not whether they would in any great degree deprive it of its funds? This was the first time that an attempt had been made to bring this subject before the House, without in any way exceeding the liberty given to the Roman Catholics by the oath which they took on entering the House; for the proposition which he made to them was quite consistent with the maintenance of the present Established Church in honour and dignity. He was astonished that, after the description he had given of the state of things in Ireland in moving for leave to introduce this Bill, there should be any objection to allowing him to lay it on the table; for that step did not in the smallest degree pledge them to an approval of its principle. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) had accused him of overrating the income of the Irish Church. He would, however, prove that he had done no such thing. He had stated that the permanent revenue received by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was 95,000*l.* per annum, and that there was also an additional revenue of 15,000*l.* per annum not of the same permanent character. Now, this was actually quoted from Archdeacon Stopford's book, and he had it on better authority even than that, for it was stated in the last Report of the Commissioners themselves. Then, again, he stated the income of the archbishops and bishops at 68,000*l.* That also was taken from a paper which must have been supplied by the Ecclesia-

tical Commissioners themselves; and he had a return made by the archbishops and bishops, stating their net income, after making the most ludicrous deductions, such as insurance on their houses, interest at 5*l.* per cent on account of money expended on their houses, poor rates—only fancy that!—and various other small deductions, at 64,430*l.*; therefore he could not be considered to have been very far wrong in stating it at 68,000*l.*, because he did not admit the justice of the deductions in question. Then, again, he had stated the parochial revenue of the Irish Church at 438,000*l.*, and there again he based his calculations on the figures in the Archdeacon's book, who, he must say, had shown great courtesy in the controversy, and behaved in a manner very different to that which had been misrepresented of him. He might also justify in the same way his statement of 12,000*l.* for the revenue of dignitaries, and 9,000*l.* for prebendaries, &c. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman said he was wrong in his surplus; now, he could show that he was quite right. In addition to the 95,000*l.* now disposable by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as permanent income, there was a sum of 15,000*l.* a year not considered as permanent, but which presented a prospective increase up to 18,000*l.* or 20,000*l.*, and there was also a sum of 35,000*l.* put down by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for expenditure in church requisites, such as surplices, candles, bibles, prayer-books, &c.; and he must say, that considering the indifferent manner in which the churches of Roman Catholics—the bulk of the population—were furnished, they ought to blush and be ashamed of such a charge. They might economise that item, and also effect a considerable saving by reducing the income of the archbishops of the Established Church in Ireland to 4,000*l.*, and that of bishops to 2,500*l.* annually, which he thought, considering the small proportion of the Protestant population, would be amply sufficient. At present the aggregate amount of their incomes was 64,000*l.*, and some of them had more patronage than the Lord Chancellor; for, as they well knew, in Ireland the Crown exercised very little patronage comparatively. He spoke with great respect of those eminent prelates, who were not at all disliked in Ireland, who lived at home and were personally very charitable; still he submitted, that the sum he had named would be amply sufficient. They could also save 50,000*l.* a year upon the various benefices in certain dioceses of Ireland without depriving any one of the means of religious instruction. There were 395 benefices in those dioceses, the population of which, before the famine, was 998,000 Catholics and only 16,700 Protestants of all denominations. The income derivable from them was between 80,000*l.* and 90,000*l.* The churches were very close to each other, there being often five or six within a circuit of three or four miles. In the diocese of Cloyne, where there were sixty-five churches, he had ascertained, by having them actually counted, that the number of attendants of all ages, on Easter Sunday, was under 4,000 out of a population of 250,000. By ferming the churches into unions—which could be done with great facility, and with no inconvenience as far as church accommodation went—the sum he had mentioned might be saved, and they could still pay the clergymen, on the average, 400*l.* per annum, and give them a house to live in. Such was the plan which he wished the House to adopt, and which he believed would tend to the benefit of the country. He was, indeed, quite aware that it would not be acceptable to the Irish country gentlemen, who were in favour of the continuance of the Established Church in its present condition and with its present abuses, because they knew that they were now certain to get a good living, or, perhaps, a bishopric for one of their sons. He would prove to the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland, that the sum he had mentioned could be economised beyond all question. In 1848, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners made a return of the benefices which, by the death of the incumbents, had become subject to the tax imposed under the Church Temporalities Act, and also of those which had not so become subject, and he found that 283 were not liable to the tax. Some of them had enormous incomes, and the surplus above 300*l.* a year was 56,000*l.*, the whole of which might be saved. Then, again, with respect to the expenses of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, a saving might be effected. The members of that Commission were Bishops, and received no salary; yet, he found that, while the amount of money dealt with by the Commissioners was 992,000*l.*, the expenses amounted to no less than 127,474*l.*, or 12*½* per cent, which he considered intolerable. If this Bill should pass—and he firmly believed that, before long, either this Bill or some similar measure would be adopted—he proposed that the charge of 35,000*l.* now paid for the sacramental elements should be defrayed by the rich Protestants of Ireland. He further proposed that 30,000*l.* should be paid annually to the Catholic Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 10,000*l.* a year to the Presbyterian Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and that 5,000*l.* a year should be placed in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant and the Irish Privy Council, to be distributed among other Protestant communities. There would still remain a sum of 169,000*l.* to be hereafter realised on the death of the present prelates and incumbents of the Protestant Church, and he proposed that this sum should be divided into six parts, three-sixths being placed at the disposal of the Catholic Ecclesiastical Commissioners, two-sixths remaining in the hands of the present Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland, and the other sixth being paid over to the Presbyterian Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with the view of building churches for the Irish Presbyterians, by whom such accommodation was greatly required. Very large sums of money had been expended upon the churches of the Establishment, and it appeared from the Reports of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners that a sum of 35,000*l.* or 36,000*l.* a year would be amply sufficient to keep those churches in repair for the future. Even after that deduction, however, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the Established Church would still have in their hands an annual income of 60,000*l.*, which he thought would afford ample means for the augmentation of small livings. He thought he had now disposed of the objections of the right hon. Secretary for Ireland, and he must express his astonishment that that right hon. Baronet, on the part of the Government, should have opposed the introduction of this Bill, and should have said that the present arrangement with respect to the temporalities of the Established Church in Ireland was final. If the right hon. Baronet entertained that opinion, he would find himself very much mistaken, and if the present Administration persisted in such an idea there would soon be an end of their Government. He would tell the Government that the doctrine of finality with reference to this question would not do, and, for his own part, he would endeavour by every means in his power, consistently with the solemn oath he had taken at the table of the House, to put an end to the shameful grievances to which he had called attention. It was quite true that no Government could stand which had the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) for their Attorney General, for he, far more than Lord Derby, was the cause of the downfall of the late Government. Still he remembered that the leader of that party in the House of Commons (Mr. Disraeli) had once stated—he had, it was true, given no proof of his intention to carry such a policy into effect—that the only way to deal successfully with Ireland was to set this question at rest. But let that be as it might, it was impossible that the present Government could continue to hold office on the principle of upholding the present Irish Church. By so doing they deprived themselves of the support of himself and of many other hon. Gentlemen, who, while sympathising with them on almost every other subject, were prevented, by their policy on this, from enlisting themselves in the ranks of their supporters. The late Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. G. A. Hamilton), whose absence on this occasion he regretted, had made some very severe criticisms upon his speech, and had accused him of misstatements and exaggeration. The hon. Gentleman said that he had stated that the episcopal and parochial clergy in the diocese of Ossory shared among them a revenue amounting to 60,000*l.*, while the Parliamentary returns showed the revenue to be only 50,307*l.* The hon. Gentleman, however, made several deductions, the justice of which he (Mr. Serjeant Shee) did not admit, and he found that he had actually understated the revenue, which amounted to about 61,500*l.* The hon. Gentleman had also taken exception to his statements with respect to the income of the episcopal and parochial clergy of the diocese of Cashel, which he (Mr. Serjeant Shee) had stated at 42,000*l.*, and, on further investigation, he found the actual amount was 42,611*l.*, the hon. Member (Mr. Hamilton) having made deductions which he (Mr. Serjeant Shee) contended ought not to be allowed. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the diocese of Limerick. He (Mr. Serjeant Shee) stated the episcopal and parochial revenue at 31,500*l.*, while the hon. Member said that it appeared from the returns to be only 26,215*l.* In this case, however, the hon. Gentleman made deductions which were not justifiable since the passing of the Rent

Charge Act, and he (Mr. Serjeant Shee) found that the actual revenue was 31,880*l.*, instead of 31,500*l.* The hon. Gentleman further charged him with a misstatement respecting the revenues of Armagh, Clogher, Down, Derry, and other dioceses, which he (Mr. Serjeant Shee) had estimated at 170,000*l.* annually, while the hon. Gentleman said that those revenues, according to the returns, amounted only to 139,686*l.* He found, however, that, including the episcopal and diaconal incomes, which were omitted by the hon. Gentleman, the actual revenue of these dioceses was 172,023*l.* annually. The hon. Gentleman also said that he had represented that the cost of churches in the diocese of Ossory had been 105,000*l.*, whereas the Parliamentary return showed that it had only been 99,559*l.*; but the hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten the cost of churches built by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners since 1836 and 1837, when the return to which he had alluded was made. He found that, since 1836, seventeen new churches had been erected in the diocese of Ossory, at a cost to the Commissioners of 16,000*l.*, so that he ought to have stated the expenditure at 115,000*l.* instead of 105,000*l.* The hon. Gentleman had fallen into a similar error with regard to the churches built in the dioceses of Cashel and Limerick. He found that the actual cost of churches in the diocese of Cashel had been upwards of 54,000*l.*, instead of 51,000*l.*, as he had before stated. With regard to the diocese of Limerick, he was ready to admit he had made a mistake. He had stated the cost of new churches in that diocese at 53,098*l.*, and the hon. Member for Dublin University (Mr. Hamilton) said it was only 45,935*l.* He (Mr. Serjeant Shee) found on a more accurate investigation that the actual cost had been 51,421*l.* The right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) had thought fit to comment upon some of the remarks which he (Mr. Serjeant Shee) had made in bringing his Bill under the notice of the House. That right hon. and learned Gentleman was the bitter and irreconcilable foe of the great body of his countrymen. He considered that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a man who rendered it impossible for hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition benches to conduct a Government; for he believed they might have had some chance of remaining in office if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not been a Member of their

Administration. He thought that the best thing those hon. Members could do would be to give the right hon. and learned Gentleman an intimation that, at the earliest opportunity, he would be placed upon the bench, where, no doubt, he would administer justice with the impartiality which distinguished both Protestant and Catholic Judges in Ireland. The possibility of a Government of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman might be a Member was, however, out of the question, for the whole body of Irish representatives would oppose any Government which gave the right hon. and learned Gentleman a seat in Dublin Castle. The hon. and learned Gentleman then proceeded to reply at some length to the charge made against him by Mr. Napier that he had founded his arguments upon the population returns of 1834, as if, during the twenty years which had subsequently elapsed, there had been no change in the numbers of the Irish population; and referred to a pamphlet which he had published upon this subject to show that in every case of reference to population he had stated the increase or decrease in the population of the districts to which he alluded. The statements which he had made with respect to the attendance of Protestants at divine worship in their churches on Easter Sunday, 1853, were borne out by the facts of the case. Under the Church Temporalities Act, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had enormous funds for building churches, and they had actually built ninety-eight new churches, and repaired fifty-nine, but none of these was at Achill. Therefore he inferred that the statements of the Bishop of Tuam relative to the increase of Protestantism at that spot were founded on hallucination. With regard to another charge of misrepresentation, he had never stated that the Bishop of Cloyne had an income of 3,000*l.*; but he had stated, as was the fact, that he had an income of 2,498*l.* The right hon. and learned Gentleman, again, charged him with misstating the income of the Archbishop of Armagh; but that most rev. Prelate himself returned his gross income at 16,299*l.*, and his net income, after all possible deductions, at 14,634*l.*, the amount he had named. It was not honest to endeavour to disparage a man who came forward openly to bring questions of this kind in a fair manner before the House. It was absurd to pretend that the Church Establishment could be subverted by a measure which left to every archbishop an income of 4,000*l.* a year, and to every bishop one of 2,500*l.* He was astonished at the manner in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had dealt with this case, and could only express his wonder that any one who was capable of doing so should ever have been Attorney General, or that any one who aspired to be Attorney General again should think of dealing with the case in such a manner. Whatever the meaning of the oath taken by Catholics might be, it was their duty and interest to observe it faithfully; but he could not admit that the construction placed upon it by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was the correct one. He did not believe it would be for the advantage of the community, that the Church Establishment of Ireland should be thrown down; for if it were, the Roman Catholics would be deluged with an army of proselytisers, who would publish all sorts of blasphemies against their religion, instead of having resident amongst them a body of amiable and well-educated gentlemen, who, though not agreeing in religious sympathies and opinions with the population generally, never failed in seasons of distress to stretch out a helping hand of charity to the sufferers. In every book he had published on the subject, he had avowed these opinions, and his hon. Friends near him differed from him because he had done so. His belief was, that they would not be well advised, if they sought the destruction of the Church Establishment through the means lately suggested; and they ought to be glad to connect themselves, he would not say as stipendiaries, but through the medium of an Act of Parliament with the Government of the country. For these reasons he regretted very much the proposals lately made for giving up the endowment of Maynooth. His conviction was, that there could be no hope of good government in Ireland, nor of any good understanding between the two countries, or of carrying on the system of public policy by a Liberal Administration, until Members representing Catholic constituencies were satisfied on this great question of the Irish Church. It was to promote this consolidation of the Union, for the purpose of getting rid of all distrust, animosity, and dissension, and of producing, so far as was consistent with the maintenance of the Established Church, religious equality in every benefice in Ireland, that he proposed this Bill. He was in the hands of the House as to whether there should be a division or not. He was quite willing to divide, and did not care about being in a minority, for his hope was hereafter to count the men who came over to him. He trusted in the good sense and justice of the people of England, that they would not long tolerate this great abuse.

MR. NAPIER said, in explanation, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had professed to state the incomes of the bishops and clergy of Ireland as they stood under the Church Temporalities Act; but, according to that Act, the deductions to be made from the income of the Archbishop of Armagh amounted to 6,000*l.*, and, therefore, the hon. and learned Serjeant had stated the income of that Prelate at 6,000*l.* more than the proper amount, as appeared on the face of the return.

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, that fact was no doubt stated in a note, which note also appeared in the printed copy of the speech as circulated.

MR. FREWEN said, he could speak from his own knowledge as to the numerous attendance in two churches lately built in Achill, and it was his belief that if more Protestant churches were supplied in Ireland, congregations would be found to fill them.

MR. COGAN said, that as a matter of courtesy, he would, if the House divided, vote for the introduction of the Bill, but he must, at the same time, express his conviction that the measure would continue unacceptable to the great body of the liberal Roman Catholic Members. He much regretted that the noble President of the Council should have enunciated the proposition that the question of the Protestant Church in Ireland had been finally settled. Finality upon all such matters was a term which the noble Lord might well have learned to avoid; and he must warn the noble Lord that it was not by any such propositions he could hope long to retain the support of a large body in that House who at present rendered him their aid. The noble Lord would do well to bear in mind that there were many Members of that House who supported Ministers, not so much from love to them, as from hostility to their antagonists over the way, and the noble Lord would act wisely in not overtaxing the patience of those who for such reasons supported him.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the hon. Member who had just resumed his seat had addressed his observations to the Government, who, on the present occasion, were represented by empty benches. The hon. Member had said, that the conduct of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who was Attorney General for Ireland under the Government of Lord Derby would have prevented Liberal Roman Catholics supporting that Government; but he was happy to say that in the estimation of the people of England, the brightest part of the Administration of Lord Derby was the conduct of the Irish Executive. The hon. Member had, with great good sense, deprecated the course taken by the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Serjeant Shee). The misstatements which had been made showed that there were those who, with terms of peace on their lips, sought for nothing less than the overthrow of the Established Church in Ireland. They were seeking to effect that at a time when the population of the country had been reduced, and when, as admitted by the hon. Member for Cork, the Roman Catholics were not much more than a half of the population. [Cries of "No, no!"] He believed that the hon. Member had said that they were five-eighths. It appeared that nearly 2,000,000 of Roman Catholics had gone to the United States, the greater part of whom had in that country abandoned the Roman Catholic faith. [Cries of "No, no!"] That, however, was the statement of Priest Mullins. He wished to know, therefore, whether the present was a proper time for the hon. and learned Serjeant to propose the suppression of nearly 400 benefices of the Established Church? [Mr. Serjeant SHEE: The consolidation of 395 benefices]. The diminution by consolidation of 395 benefices. Surely that was interfering with the Church of Ireland. Moreover, it was a notorious fact that the Roman Catholic people in the west, as stated by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Frewen), were joining the Protestant Church, and were becoming sensible of the blessings which it conferred on Ireland. Those blessings could not be denied, and yet hon. Members were trying to undermine an Establishment, the merits of which were daily acknowledged by the accession to it of hundreds of thousands of the people. Surely, then, hon. Members could not deny that conversion was going on rapidly in the west of Ireland, that the Roman Catholic population had enormously diminished, and that the number of persons belonging to the Established Church in Ireland was now much greater than it was when they were returned at 800,000. If there was any feeling of liberality among Roman Catholics—if they were not actuated by a blind desire to assail the religion of their fellow-countrymen—the last thing they would attempt to do would be to seek to deprive their fellow-countrymen of the benefits of a Church which hundreds of thousands of them had made the Church of their choice, and which had conferred such blessings on the country.

MR. BOWYER said, he was prepared to vote for the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend, because he thought he ought at least to have an opportunity of laying his Bill before the House. At the same time he objected to its principle, because he could not understand how any Roman Catholic Member could bring in a measure respecting the Irish Church which had not for its object the getting rid entirely of that abuse and standing nuisance in the country. He would not go into the question of the oath, because that was a subject which savoured somewhat of casuistry, and was rather a matter for individual conscience. At the same time he could not conceive that the oath could ever have been intended to fetter the Members of that House in their legislative capacity, because that would be entirely unconstitutional. The whole question had been fully discussed with regard to the coronation oath. It had been very cogently argued that the King, having sworn to maintain the rights of the Established Church, could not consent to a measure affecting its privileges. That consideration pressed much upon the conscience of George IV., but he was told by his gravest advisers that his oath did not bind him in his legislative capacity. The same principle applied also to Members of Parliament. It had been always maintained that one Parliament could not bind a future one; nor could one part of the Parliament bind the rest. By parity of reasoning it followed that the whole Parliament could not bind any Member of it. He thought, therefore, that the invective of hon. Members on the other side was not justifiable. Besides, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the other Prelates had all taken an oath not to consent to the alienation of the property of their respective sees; yet they did consent to a measure which had that effect. It had been wittily remarked by Sydney Smith, that he could not make it out how the Archbishop could have assented to such a measure; but he had found out that his Grace had only taken the oath by proxy. That the unfortunate attorney who had taken the oath for the Archbishop and had received his fee for doing so, had since consulted many eminent divines, but that they had all assured him that he must suffer the pains of eternal fire for the Archbishop; that he had therefore been daily going to Lambeth Palace with the fee in his hand to entreat the Archbishop to take it back, and to relieve him from the responsibility he had so incautiously assumed, but that his Grace had refused to do so, and had left him in his miserable plight. He (Mr. Bowyer) did not wish to charge the right rev. Prelates with perjury; because he did not think that this oath was ever intended to bind them in their capacity of Members of the House of Lords. But he did ask for Roman Catholics the same interpretation of their oath as Members of the House of Commons. If he were to bring in a Bill to reform the Church of Ireland, it would be one to abolish it altogether; because that Church, though established originally by force, and since bolstered up by law, was in no true sense of the word a national Church. He was far, however, from coveting the wealth of the Establishment either in England or in Ireland. The Roman Catholic Church was in a far wholesomer condition than would be the case if it was possessed of State patronage; and her bishops with incomes of 400*l.* or 500*l.* a year were as learned, as active, and as saintly as any bishops in the world. The hon. and learned Serjeant said he wished to improve the character and position of the Established Church by taking away what appeared to him to be a blot; but he (Mr. Bowyer) thought that the Protestants were the best judges of that themselves. He did not wish to interfere with their affairs, just as he had wished the Protestants not to interfere with the monastic institutions. With regard to this Bill, he could not concur with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Shee) in the principles upon which it was founded, because he thought that no measure relating to the Established Church in Ireland could satisfy the people of that country, if it did not deal root and branch with that injustice, that abuse and scandal, and completely settle the question. Now, the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend would not settle the question, and could not, he believed, satisfy the people of Ireland. Nevertheless he should vote for the Motion of his hon. and learned

Friend for leave to bring in the Bill, which he thought was a measure framed with great ability and with the best possible intentions, and which deserved full consideration on the part of that House.

Mr. BRADY said, he rose to contradict a statement made by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), which would lead the House to believe that the people of Ireland were fast becoming Protestants, and were daily and hourly forsaking the Roman Catholic religion. So far from this being the case, the fact was that for one Roman Catholic landed proprietor who existed in Ireland twenty years ago there were at present twenty.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read.
House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Sheriff or Magistrate may send vagrant children to school, unless security is found for their good behaviour).

Mr. MAGUIRE said, that these schools were viewed with the greatest suspicion by the Roman Catholics, of whom there were not fewer than 100,000 in Glasgow alone, and 250,000 in the whole of Scotland. He had been desired by one of the highest dignitaries of the Church to which he belonged to oppose the further progress of the Bill. It must not, however, be supposed that he was averse to the principle of reformatory schools; on the contrary, he believed that the plan was one of the wisest and most benevolent that could be devised for the reforming young criminals, who were often rather the victims of accident than of their evil passions. The statement which he was about to make referred chiefly to the school at Edinburgh. In 1847, the Rev. Dr. Guthrie published in the newspapers an eloquent address; calling upon persons of all denominations to unite for the succour of this unhappy class. That appeal was most successful; it was responded to by Catholics as well as Protestants; but the cloven foot of fanaticism soon made its appearance. A demand was made to know the principles on which the schools were to be conducted; and the Committee, after much pressing, admitted that the reading of the Bible was to be accompanied with such comments and explanations as were fitted for Protestants. Dr. Guthrie himself admitted that of the 297 children in the school, one-half were Catholics; and this declaration of the Committee excited the greatest astonishment and displeasure, not only amongst Catholics, but also among the supporters of the schools generally. The late Lord Jeffrey, amongst others, addressed a remonstrance to the Lord Provost, showing that a large portion of those for whom the schools were designed were by this measure practically excluded from their benefits. This description of the Edinburgh schools applied to all similar schools, whether in Glasgow, Paisley, or elsewhere. The Edinburgh United School was conducted on an entirely opposite principle. There the faith of the Catholic children was respected; religious instruction was given to Protestants and Catholics separately, and they were each allowed to attend their own places of worship. Let the promoters of this Bill adopt the same principles, and every Catholic gentleman would say, "God speed your blessed work." In Dr. Guthrie's school half the children were Catholics, but they were supplied with food, and this secured their attendance. The attempt was made to educate them in a sort of nondescript faith called "the great Catholic faith," which was neither one thing nor the other. When the children left school, they were at liberty to choose their creed; but it was easy to see what would be their choice, looking at the parties by whom they had been trained. This was nothing but a miserable attempt at proselytising by sweeping the very streets. Unless a provision were introduced into this Bill for protecting the faith of Catholic children, he should continue to oppose it. It was said the Catholic children might go to some other school; but there were no other schools; perhaps the Edinburgh United School was the only one in Scotland to which Catholics could send their children. Let the Government take security for protecting the faith of the Catholic children in these schools; he had no confidence in the promoters of this Bill, and recommended that it should not be proceeded with this Session.

MR. M'MAHON said, he should move the insertion of words which would give the magistrate the power to make inquiry of the children as to the condition and residence of the parents previous to their being committed to the reformatory school.

MR. DUNLOP had no objection to the insertion of the words, and which were proposed in the Bill first introduced, but were struck out upon consultation with some of the promoters of the Bill.

MR. LUCAS said, he thought that a case of greater oppression could not be conceived than that a magistrate should be empowered by Act of Parliament to send a child to Dr. Guthrie's proselytising school, where it should be kept till the age of fifteen under the penalty of whipping and imprisonment.

MR. DUNLOP said, that the Bill would, undoubtedly, give the magistrate the power of sending a child to Dr. Guthrie's school; but he did not consider that to be a proselytising school. He had to add that he meant to introduce a proviso under which the magistrate would be obliged to send the child to any particular school selected by the child's parents or guardians wherever there might be more than one school; and he had no doubt but that Roman Catholic schools would be established in all towns in which Irish labourers were found in considerable numbers.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he feared that there was some further object in view than appeared on the face of this Bill. He certainly thought that it would be very easily perverted into nothing but a scheme to kidnap the souls of young children. Such a scheme could never lead to any good whatever. Irish children were not to be turned into Protestants in that manner; they might, while young, appear to be perverted, but, in the end, it would be found that their minds were filled with a farrago of religions, and that they were, in truth, of no religion whatever. A little knowledge of ethnological science would, however, show that their work in this respect would be perfectly useless; for they might as well attempt to operate upon a young gipsy as upon a young Roman Catholic child.

MR. LUCAS said, he wished to ask whether, under the Bill, Roman Catholic children could be sent to Dr. Guthrie's school, which was admitted to be a proselytising school?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that it appeared to be entirely forgotten that the very large proportion of the children who would come under the operation of this Bill were of no religion whatever, and it appeared to be trifling with a great question to argue its effect upon the children of the Roman Catholic religion. Nothing could, in his opinion, be more fair or reasonable than the proviso of the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) to give to magistrates the power of sending children to any school which the parent or guardian might prefer. If Roman Catholics thought proper to follow the laudable example of Dr. Guthrie, and establish Roman Catholic Reformatory Schools, there was a wide field open for the exercise of their philanthropy, and he would advise them to adopt such a course.

MR. J. O'CONNELL said, he felt greater distrust than ever in this Bill, after the observations which had fallen from the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. The Irish Members had not opposed the Government Bill on this subject for England, because the Government had promised to add a clause providing for Catholic children on the third reading. That promise had not been kept; why, it was for the Government to say. He trusted that the Irish Members would not allow themselves to be misled in that way again.

COLONEL BLAIR said, he must deny that the object of the Bill was to tamper with the religion of Roman Catholic children. Its real and its only object was to reclaim destitute and helpless vagrants. The course which the Roman Catholic gentry ought to take in that matter was to accept the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock, and to build schools to which children of their persuasion would be sent. He (Colonel Blair) wished to ask the hon. Member for Greenock whether he had any objection to change the age fifteen years to fourteen years?

MR. DUNLOP said, he had no objection to make the change.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he regretted to find that the opposition to this Bill was founded on such grounds as would prevent any attempt to provide for the reformation of a mixed population. Surely the Roman Catholic Members would not prefer that the children of that persuasion should remain plunged in crime, rather than that they should come in contact with the Members of another religion. He could hardly believe that any person would rather see the children exposed to the perils which now beset them than to the chance of a modification of their religion. It would be different if they said, "We do not wish to oppose you, but we desire certain safeguards." If they had met the Bill in that spirit, he felt certain that the promoters would have done everything in their power to satisfy them. Those Gentlemen incurred a fearful responsibility who sought to defeat the present attempt to rescue the children in the large towns from their present state of crime and misery. He was sorry to find the good intentions of the promoters of this measure frustrated. They had had many difficulties to contend with, and it was too bad, when they sought to take a wretched infant from the streets, to be told that their object was to proselytise him. Men actuated by such a motive would not have made the sacrifices they had.

MR. LUCAS said, he must assert that his party had met the matter in a fair spirit. When the question first arose in the Middlesex Industrial Schools Bill, they had attended the Committee, and proposed an arrangement which they thought would be satisfactory to all parties. The clause introduced into the Bill to carry out that agreement was rejected by the Lords. When the Bill came back the bigotry of the majority of the House prevailed, and the Lords' decision was acquiesced in. They were prepared to adopt the same arrangement in the present Bill; the promoters had it in their power to obviate all objections. He had some time since suggested an Amendment to the hon. Member for Greenock to the effect that all the schools under the Act should be registered; if a school was intended for children of one denomination only, it should be stated, and those of any other religion should not be sent there. If a clause to that effect was inserted, all opposition would cease.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, it was unfair to represent the Catholic Members as being bigots, and against the education of these children. All they wished was, that the schools should not be perverted from their proper and legitimate objects.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to ask the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate whether, in his opinion, the Bill gave any guarantee for the protection of Catholic children?

MR. SERJEANT SHEE said, it appeared to him that they were disputing about nothing. The main principles of the Bill were conceded. He knew Scotland, and was aware that there existed a necessity for these schools. He would suggest that the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) and the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Lucas) should come to some arrangement.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he wished the hon. Member for Greenock would read the proviso.

MR. DUNLOP said, the proviso was this, that if the parent or guardian of any child should express a preference for any one school of two or more within the jurisdiction of the sheriff or magistrate, the child should be sent to such school.

Mr. LUCAS said, that the proviso did not in any way obviate his objection. He did not wish the Catholic children to be sent to schools to be made Protestants, and the proviso did not meet this difficulty; it might if there were Catholic schools established in every district in Scotland, but such was not the case. He would not accept any Amendment but that which he had already stated.

COLONEL BLAIR said, he would remind the hon. Gentleman, who was so much afraid of proselytism, that a large number of Catholic children attended the parochial schools in Scotland, but there were no instances of their changing their religion.

Mr. BRADY said, that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had not answered his question.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was not aware that there was any provision in the Bill to guarantee the children of Catholic parents against becoming Protestants.

Mr. BRADY said, that, under such circumstances, it was his impression that no Catholic Member would be justified in allowing the Bill to go further.

Mr. DUNLOP said, that those hon. Members who had opposed the Bill had said that they had done so from a paramount sense of duty; but where was their sense of duty when the Government Bill was carried through every stage?

Mr. F. SCULLY thought the present Bill was a most extravagant one. He had been for some years a Member of the House, and he never saw a more wicked attempt to destroy a large class of his fellow creatures. If the Bill was worth anything, why was it not taken up by the Government, and its provisions extended to Ireland?

House resumed.

ADMIRALTY COURT BILL.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he would now beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the process in the High Court of Admiralty. The measure had received the sanction of the Judge of the Court; the matter was urgent, and on the second reading, he would state the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. FERGUS said, he objected to the introduction of the Bill. The Lords of the Admiralty were carrying matters with too high a hand, and he would not agree to give them any more power. A seizure had been made of some vessels in Scotland, which he was advised was clearly illegal. He saw that one of Her Majesty's ships had been sent to the Clyde to seize the property of one of his constituents, because he refused to surrender it without a guarantee against future claims. Under these circumstances, he could not consent to give any further power to the right hon. Baronet and his Colleagues till the matter was arranged.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he did not think the hon. Gentleman was aware of the nature of the Bill he (Sir J. Graham) wished to bring in. It did not seek to enlarge the powers of the High Court of Admiralty. The Act which the hon. Gentleman complained of was an Act exercised by the Government on their own discretion, and not under the authority of the High Court of Admiralty. But this Bill had nothing to do with that subject. It was a Bill to enlarge the power of the High Court of Admiralty merely to the extent of enabling it to appoint Commissioners in the country to take affidavits, similar to the power possessed by the Court of Chancery. That provision was required by reason of a doubt having been expressed in a court of law as to the efficacy of an affidavit taken by a Commissioner of the Court of Chancery in a matter cognisable by the High Court of Admiralty. That was the first provision of the Bill. The second was to legalise affidavits taken before our consuls and other authorities in foreign countries; the third provision was, to allow suits to be instituted without the arrest of the ships—this was a provision intended for the benefit of commerce; and the fourth and last provision of the Bill was to substitute stamps for fees.

Leave given; Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir James Graham, Admiral Berkeley, and Mr. Osborne.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND.)

EARL GRANVILLE laid on the table the Report, with evidence, appendix, and index thereto, of Select Committee on National Education (Ireland).

THE EARL OF EGLINTON said, he could not allow the Report to be presented to their Lordships without saying a few words upon it. As he understood that it was not competent for Members of that House to make a protest upon any subject connected with a Committee, he would take this opportunity of expressing his entire dissent from, and disapprobation of, the Report which his noble Friend had laid upon the table. It appeared to him that the fact that twenty-one Members of their Lordships' House, most of them men of considerable Parliamentary experience, and even official knowledge, having sat for forty-one days upon this subject, having examined some of the most intelligent witnesses who could be produced in Ireland, and having obtained evidence which he believed would fill larger blue books than had ever yet been laid upon their Lordships' table—the fact of such a Committee not having been able to come to any decision on a subject so important as that intrusted to their charge appeared to him to involve such a degree of absurdity, if not a total dereliction of duty, that he felt himself called upon to take this opportunity of washing his hands of the whole transaction. He could not conceive anything more unsatisfactory to Ireland, or less gratifying to the feelings of the Members of the Committee themselves, than the decision, if decision it could be called, which had been come to.

EARL GRANVILLE thought it rather an unusual course, on the presentation of the Report of a Committee, for a noble Lord who was one of the minority in that Committee to get up and state over again his objections to the conclusion at which the majority had arrived. If his noble Friend's opinion were so strong on this point, he was surprised that he had not moved certain Resolutions or recommendations in the Committee himself. And when his noble Friend said that the decision of the Committee would be unsatisfactory to Ireland, he (Earl Granville) begged to say that he believed the great majority of the people of Ireland were in favour of the present system of national education pursued in that country; and he was convinced that they would rejoice to find that no Report had been made by the Committee subversive of that system.

THE EARL OF DERBY could not but think that the noble Earl had made a most unjust attack upon his noble Friend; because, in point of fact, his noble Friend had brought down certain Resolutions which he intended to move in the Committee. He himself (the Earl of Derby) had also brought down certain Resolutions, not for the purpose of subverting the system, but of amending it in certain points; and the noble Earl opposite, who was Chairman of the Committee, brought down a string of Resolutions which it was expected the Committee would discuss, and to the great majority of which he (the Earl of Derby) was prepared to give his entire assent. He was, however, taken entirely by surprise, as were also most of the other Members of the Committee, by the announcement on the part of the noble Earl that, after having prepared something like thirty or thirty-five Resolutions, to the greater portion of which there was no objection, he did not intend to move any one of them, because certain Amendments of them had been given notice of. In consequence of suggestions from other noble Lords, the noble Earl withdrew his own Resolutions, and divided the Committee on the question whether his noble Friend (the Earl of Eglinton) or himself (the Earl of Derby) should be permitted to offer any Resolutions. A majority of nine to seven decided in favour of the noble Earl; and he thought it was rather hard, therefore, for the noble Earl to come down now and reproach his noble Friend with not having moved any Amendment to the Report.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that the Resolutions of his noble Friend (Earl Granville) were mere suggestions, and not Resolutions. They were submitted in that sense to himself (the Marquess of Lansdowne) with an intimation that they were not intended to be moved as Resolutions unless they were likely to meet with the general assent of the Members of the Committee. It was subsequently found, however, on further consideration, that there was no prospect whatever of these Resolutions receiving general concurrence, or of their having the very desirable effect of reconciling divergent opinions upon this important question, and they were therefore withdrawn. Under these circumstances, he could not conceive how any other course could have been taken than that of reporting the evidence to their Lordships, and thus enabling the House and the public at large, both in England and Ireland, to form their own opinions upon the matter from the materials thus afforded to them.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, the course adopted on this occasion by the Committee was precisely the same course as that taken in 1837 by both Houses of Parliament on this very subject; and of the Committee of the House of Commons in 1837 the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) was a member and an ornament—as he must be a distinguished member of any assembly to which he belonged;—and on that occasion the noble Earl himself was an acquiescing party in the decision of that Committee, which was to report the evidence they had taken to the House of Commons, unaccompanied by any specific recommendation of their own.

THE EARL OF DERBY explained that he had no desire to enter into a discussion of the general question. He had only risen to complain of the unjust censure passed by the noble Earl (Earl Granville) upon his noble Friend (the Earl of Eglington), whom he had charged with not bringing forward any Resolutions in the Committee, when, in point of fact, his noble Friend did come down with Resolutions, but was out-voted by an adverse majority.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said: My Lords, before this discussion closes I must beg, as a Member of the Committee by whom the evidence now upon the table of the House was taken, to say a few words, in consequence of observations that have fallen from the noble Earl opposite the Chairman of the Committee, and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) beside him. It was with the utmost surprise that I heard the noble Earl speak of the national education system in Ireland as being popular, for certainly there is nothing in the evidence to justify such a remark; but, on the contrary, much from which to draw an opposite conclusion. The Committee sat for, I believe, above forty days; the most competent witnesses from every part of Ireland were examined, and it is most due to the noble Earl to acknowledge the ability, patience, and unremitting attention he gave to the conduct of the inquiry, animated apparently by a sincere and earnest desire, not only of eliciting facts and opinions regarding the actual operation of the education system, but also of examining suggestions for its improvement, and for freeing it from such well-founded objections as had hitherto hindered its acceptance with the great majority of the Protestants, and especially with the clergy of the Established Church. No one upon the Committee I should have thought could be more aware than the noble Earl how unsatisfactorily the system had worked, how little it had received of support from the educated classes in Ireland, and how much it was objected to, not only by those who had been restrained by conscientious motives from joining it, but also by many who had been most zealous in endeavouring to give it effect. In order, however, that there may be no mistake upon the subject, I beg to give notice that, unless the question be taken up by some noble Lord more competent to do justice to its importance, I shall early next Session move that the evidence and other documents now upon the table of the House be referred to a Select Committee to be reported upon with reference, among other points, to its acceptance by the people of Ireland, and the amount of support it has received at their hands, from whence your Lordships will be enabled to form some judgment of its alleged popularity. So far from being popular in the country, I know, and we have it in evidence from all parties, that the result of the labours of the Committee have been anxiously looked for as likely to be productive of important modifications of the system; and well assured I am that the decision unfortunately come to of reporting evidence, unaccompanied by any expression of opinion, will be viewed with the utmost dissatisfaction by every well-wisher to the cause of national education in Ireland. The observation of the noble Marquess to which I wish to call your Lordships' attention shows the great practical inconvenience that may arise from the refusal of the Committee to consider the evidence, and to discuss suggestions that different Members had prepared as arising out of it. The noble Earl (the Chairman) had prepared and communicated to the several Members of the Committee a series of recommendations regarding details in the working of the system which it was reasonable to suppose would have been submitted for discussion, and in this expectation the Committee assembled at their last meeting on Monday last; some of the noble Earl's suggestions it might have been desirable to recommend for adoption, but some, I do not hesitate to say, were both objectionable in policy and at variance with the bearing of evidence. The Committee, however, had no opportunity of discussing them, for the noble Earl never moved their adoption. "But," says the noble Marquess, "they will not be thrown away, for they will be communicated to the Commissioners of National Education, who will, no doubt, give immediate attention to them." Now, I protest against any such course being taken. The noble Earl, as a Member of the Government, stands in a position of some authority with the Commissioners, and, having had the chief conduct of the late inquiry, his recommendations would, of course, have peculiar weight with them; but it would be a most unfair proceeding to give, as an ascertained result of the late investigation, suggestions that the Committee have not had opportunity of discussing, some of which, I again affirm, are neither justifiable in policy nor consistent with the evidence that is upon the table. I, therefore, hope that no proceedings will be taken until the evidence shall have been analysed and fully considered. I agree with the noble Earl the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in lamenting that this duty was not performed by the Committee, and that the just expectations of the public upon a subject so important to the interests of the population of Ireland must, for the present, be disappointed by the miserable and impotent conclusion of an inquiry upon which so much labour and expense had been bestowed. I yet hope, however, that as the evidence will now go before the public, and its publication will be accompanied with an analytical index, the work of the Committee will not be altogether without beneficial results, for, if read, the evidence cannot fail of removing much of that prejudice, by which the system of national education in Ireland has been so long upheld in the minds of the English people, and of commending to the sanction and adoption of Parliament and of the public such modifications as may render it, what it is not at present, just, efficient, and comprehensive.

COURT OF CHANCERY BILL.

On Motion that the House go into Committee on this Bill,

LORD BROUGHAM desired to state for their comfort and encouragement, a circum-

stance which had taken place in the morning, at the time of the transaction of judicial business. His noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, himself, and a noble Lord whom he did not see in his place, had before them a cause which illustrated the bad state of the law as to the Court of Chancery before the recent amendments were made in it, and they were thus enabled to judge of the salutary effects likely to be produced by them. It appeared that a Bill was filed in 1803, and now, at the end of fifty-one years, the suit was not finished; for whatever might be the result of the appeal in hearing which their Lordships had been engaged that morning, the suit must go back to the Court of Chancery for some, he hoped but a short, time. In the course of this suit persons had gone to India, and had come into existence, and had ceased to exist. It appeared that two persons had been born into the suit, and that one, at least, of them had died. Though debts had been paid, yet their Lordships had been unable to discover that during the fifty-one years any of the parties to the suit had ever received a farthing, while 7,000*l.* or 8,000*l.* had been paid to professional persons engaged in the proceedings. If the late improvements of the law had not been so long delayed, a great portion of this protraction of litigation would have been avoided. If the Masters' Office had been abolished, and other improvements made concurrently with that abolition had been effected, he would not say that the whole mischief would have been prevented, but a considerable mitigation would have taken place. The Bill now before their Lordships had for one of its objects the prevention of delays, arising from the abatement of suits. Had its provisions been in force, much of the delay in the suit to which he was referring, and in many other suits, would have been avoided. He thought his noble and learned Friend on the bench behind (Lord Lyndhurst) would be ready to state, that in his second Chanceryship, he had to deal with an order which had been made by his predecessor, Lord Hardwicke, and he (Lord Brougham) had himself to deal with an order made by Lord Kenyon when Master of the Rolls. He thought, in what he had stated, their Lordships would see reason for proceeding with the amendment of the law; but he should not deal fairly with them, did he not state that he was firmly convinced that there could be no effectual remedy for the evils incident to the Court of Chancery until the practice of taking evidence videlicet was introduced into that Court, in which we had at present a most inauspicious division of labour. Political economists had doubted whether a division of labour had the effect of producing the amount of goods produced; but no one had ever doubted that it improved the quality of the work. The division of labour in the courts of equity, however, which gave to one man the office of hearing and seeing the witnesses, and to another that of deciding upon their testimony, might increase the quantity of work done, but it made its quality essentially bad—it made it absolutely very nearly worthless.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR confirmed the statement of his noble and learned Friend as to the circumstances of the case to which he had referred, and added, that he rejoiced to think that it was perfectly impossible that anything of that sort could now occur.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 33 (Declaration of Member).

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he proposed to substitute for the declaration originally contained in that clause the following—

"I (A B) do solemnly and sincerely declare, without any equivocation or mental reservation whatever, that I have not knowingly made, authorised, or sanctioned, and that I will not at any time hereafter knowingly make, authorise, or sanction any payment on account of my election otherwise than through the election officer, save as excepted and allowed by the 'Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854.'"

The first object of the alterations which had been introduced into the declaration, by the insertion of the words "now or hereafter," was to prevent a candidate, some time after his election, repaying money which had been expended—perhaps without his knowledge—for purposes of corruption, by a friend or partisan. The other alteration was in the insertion of the words "otherwise than through the election officer," instead of "other than allowed by law." The object of this change was to make it more clear that the candidate or Member would not make any payment except through the election officer. Then, if he abided by that declaration, he could not bribe except through the election officer, which was of course out of the question.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he did not see any material difference between the two declarations, except the word "hereafter," inserted instead of "now." Neither did he see any necessity for a second declaration, of which he found notice was given.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the intention of the word "hereafter" was to render subsequent payments, even years after an election, impossible. If the party adhered to that declaration he could not, consequently, bribe at all, except he bribed through the election officer, which would be impracticable.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that the Committee had two questions to decide in reference to this clause. First, whether they should sanction the principle of calling upon a Member to make a declaration at the table of the House that he had been guilty of no misconduct at his election, the consideration of which might be postponed until they came to decide finally upon the clause. And the other question was, if they decided that there should be a declaration, what the form of that declaration should be. In his opinion, if they had a declaration at all, the one proposed was most inadequate for its purpose. Take the case of a candidate who was opposed by the son of a peer, or wealthy commoner, a declaration from his opponent that he had paid no money, except the legal expenses, would not secure him against the exercise of undue influence by the wealthy relations of such opponent. The declaration, to be of any real value, should be considerably wider in its application than was proposed by either of the forms suggested; it should go to the extent of declaring that no payment had been made either by the candidate himself or by any person on his account.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the case suggested by the right hon. Gentleman was expressly provided for by another clause, which rendered it illegal for any person, whether friend, relation, or stranger, to pay any money whatever towards the expenses of any election except through the election officer.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he was anxious to have the opinion of the Chairman of the Select Committee (Mr. Walpole) on the Amendment. He concurred with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) that it would not be well to extend the declaration so as to make the candidate declare that he did not know of any payment being made by others. He thought if they had a declaration, it should be as simple as possible—such as a man could make without doubt or hesitation, and, therefore, he preferred that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) to the one suggested by the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk. He admitted that there were difficulties in the way of any declaration whatever; but as he believed it would tend to prevent the extension of corrupt practices at elections he should support the clause.

MR. WALPOLE said, that he should have preferred the declaration as it originally stood in the Bill to the one now suggested. When this question had been previously mooted, it had been always said that any declaration must necessarily be vague, inasmuch as the law was not defined. Now they had defined the law and limited the expense to certain payments recognised by the law, and the candidate was required to declare that he had not knowingly made, authorised, or sanctioned, nor would he thereafter make, authorise, or sanction, any payment on account of his election, other than that allowed by law and paid through the medium of the election officer; that was, that he had not done, authorised, or sanctioned, and would not do, authorise, or sanction, any act of bribery, or any act that could come under the title of undue influence. In this way they had the means of ascertaining every payment made, and this was the object of the declaration. His only doubt was, whether they should adopt the declaration in the form proposed, or in the more limited form of simply declaring that no payment had been made by the candidate except through the election officer. For his own part, he objected to making a man make a declaration as to any act done by other persons, of which he might know nothing.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would suggest a verbal Amendment in the declaration—instead of “any payment other than that,” to insert “any payment other than those,” which was agreed to.

MR. HILDYARD said, he thought the declaration should be confined to facts, and that the candidate should not be required to declare upon a matter of law, which he must do if called upon to say that he had paid only the legal expenses. It might so happen that a candidate making a payment in full confidence that it was legal, had afterwards reason to suppose that it was not legal, it would be hard to call upon him under such circumstances to make a declaration at the table of the House in the form proposed.

LORD SEYMOUR said, that, according to the clause, this declaration was to be taken twice—on the day of nomination and at the table of that House. Now suppose a Member were abroad when elected, or that he was elected for two places, how would it be possible that he should make this declaration on the day of nomination? Then with respect to the words “authorise or sanction any payment on account of my election,” their interpretation must depend entirely upon the conscience of the man taking them. There was no doubt that a county Member, in that capacity, paid many subscriptions and contributed to many objects. Having done so, he could not, if a man of conscience, come and take this declaration. But he feared that the effect of imposing it would be to harden men's consciences, and that Members would be obliged to come to an understanding amongst themselves that these payments should not be considered as made “on account of my election,” although there could be no doubt that they were made with a view to strengthen the position of a candidate or Member at his election. Now he thought that such an understanding would be quite discreditable, and would be injurious to the character, not only of that House, but of every gentleman in the country.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to know who was to tell what were the payments to be made on account of an election? There was no definition of these payments. He preferred the amended declaration to the original one, as it contained more certainty; but that declaration would, nevertheless, preclude from any payment except through the election officers, though such payments were authorised in another part of the Bill. The great difficulty in the case, however, was the definition of what were payments on account of an election.

MR. WALPOLE said, he had no wish to press words of his own; all he wished was to get the best form of words; and he should, therefore, support the Amendment as more to the purpose than his own declaration.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he was opposed to any declaration whatever; but he certainly thought that the amended declaration was still more objectionable, because more stringent and more difficult to take, than the one originally inserted in the Bill. He must say that he thought it very impertinent to put the words "without any equivocation or mental reservation whatever" to any Member of that House. It amounted to making him say, "I declare so and so, and upon my word I am not telling a lie." The fact was, that these words were originally inserted in oaths in order to guard against the effect of certain opinions supposed to be held by Roman Catholics, but from which he did not think there was now the slightest danger. No one would think of asking or making such a declaration in private life. If the opinion of the House was with him, he would move the omission of these words.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, that a common mode of corrupting voters was to lend them money, or to promise to lend them money, and this practice ought to be met by the declaration, if indeed, which he doubted, it was desirable to have any declaration at all.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought that the Amendment was more specific than the original declaration, and was therefore preferable to it. He certainly thought that when they imposed a bribery oath upon the electors they would not persuade the country that they were in earnest unless they also called upon the elected to purge themselves. If they had a declaration, he thought it ought to be made as solemn as possible, and therefore he saw no objection to the retention of the words "without mental equivocation or reservation." He thought, however, that the words "on account of my election" were fairly open to objection, because it was difficult to say whether many payments that hon. Members were called upon to make were or were not "on account" of their election. He would, therefore, propose to alter them to "on account of the expenses of my election." Those words could not be held to cover the subscriptions which Members were called upon to pay, or the other expenses which they incurred during the continuance of a Parliament.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he did not think that the words "without any equivocation or mental reservation" added any sanction whatever to the declaration. He thought they were simply insulting, and that it was quite sufficient to call on hon. Members "solemnly and sincerely" to declare. He should persist in his Motion for the omission of the words in question.

MR. HILDYARD said, he also thought that it was desirable to omit the words in question. He considered that this Bill was not framed as if they were legislating for gentlemen, but on the supposition that, unless language of the most stringent nature was employed in every part of it, Members of that House would be always exercising their ingenuity to evade the obligations imposed on them by law. He must say he did not think it wise in the House to hold itself up to the country in such a light.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not think it was open to them to object to the retention of these words on the grounds stated, namely, that because the House had already, on another occasion during the present Session, determined to retain them in the oath administered to its Members. He thought, however, that the objection urged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. V. Smith), that these words were originally introduced into the oath as a measure of precaution against persons who held certain doctrines, and that there was now no necessity for their retention, was well founded. He did not think that an inclination to make mental reservations was one of the prevailing sins of our times. Persons might break their oaths knowingly, but he did not think that any sect entertained the opinion that by a mental reservation they could make a false statement with a safe conscience. He thought it was quite sufficient to make a man say that he "solemnly and sincerely" declared.

MR. NAPIER said, that the words "without equivocation or mental reservation" were not in the oath taken by Members generally. They were only a part of the oath taken by Roman Catholics, who held the doctrines against which they were intended as a security.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL replied by reading, amidst considerable laughter, the oath taken by Members generally, Protestant as well as Catholic. It concluded by a statement that it was taken by the deponent "without equivocation, mental evasion, or any reservation whatever."

MR. NAPIER said, he never objected to the omission of these words from the general oath. He only wished to retain them in that taken by the Roman Catholic Members.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that both himself and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) were quite ready to consent to the omission of these words.

The words, "without equivocation or mental reservation" were accordingly struck out of the declaration.

MR. BENTINCK said, he must urge on the Committee the necessity of defining the legitimate expenses of an election before proceeding further with the Bill. Unless that was done all discussions on the question were only so much lost time.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would suggest that payments excepted in the schedule of the Bill, as made under a penalty less than forfeiture of the seat and invalidation of the election, should be referred to in the declaration.

MR. AGLIONBY said, he regarded the words "at any time hereafter," as surplusage. The candidate swore "I will not make," and that was sufficient.

The words "at any time hereafter" were then struck out.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not like the insertion of the words "on account of the expenses of my election." Bribery was not one of the expenses of a Member's election, and this addition to the declaration would be no protection against bribery.

MR. HILDYARD said, it was notorious that Members incurred considerable expense in providing for the registration. These were expenses "on account of a Member's election," and so were subscriptions to charities, races, &c. What Member subscribed to these objects before he became a candidate, or when he ceased to be a Member? And to make such a declaration would require a great deal of mental reservation and equivocation. Unless a Member determined not to give one farthing which he would not otherwise give towards election expenses, charities, and races, he could hardly say that he had not and would not pay any money "on account of his election." It ought to be clearly understood whether such contributions as he had described were to pass through the accounts of the election officer.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that in consequence of some doubts of the nature expressed by his hon. and learned Friend, he had framed a provision, of which he had given notice. That provision was to the effect "that no expenses of or relating to the registration of electors, or any subscription or contribution made to or for any public or private or charitable purpose, shall be deemed election expenses."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he viewed with the greatest apprehension the effects of agreeing to such a declaration as this. Its effect would be, either to keep out all scrupulous men from seats in that House and to let in men of easy consciences, or else it would introduce a generally lax mode of taking this oath, which would have the worst possible effect on public morality, and lower the tone of that House as the first assembly of gentlemen in the country. The declaration was full of ambiguity. If they asked a man of honour to take an oath, they should take care no two men of honour could differ in the construction of it. But would any man say that any man of honour and conscience would not take that oath as it now stood in fear and trembling? This was a position in which no conscientious man ought to be placed. If the Amendment to insert the words "the expenses of" before the words "my election" were agreed to, then the oath would be nugatory and would open the door to a wide field of bribery. If the words "on account of my election" were retained, then he did not know what they meant, and they introduced ambiguity where the Committee were bound to avoid it. A Member of the Government usually had some little patronage at his disposal. Suppose he gave some little places to those who had voted for him. Was that bribery or not, or was it "on account of his election?" Payment by means of places was as much bribery as the payment of money, and was a Member of the Government who had procured a place as a messenger or some small place in the Customs for one of his supporters to be told he was a perjured man? Would not a Member who was asked for a place ask himself, if this declaration were agreed to, "Why do I give this place to this man?" Members commonly acted from mixed motives. They knew the voter, perhaps, to be a worthy man, and they believed he would discharge the duties of the situation in an efficient manner. But would they not ask themselves, "Am I sure that I should give this man a place if he did not happen to be a voter of the borough or county that I represent?" This was only one of a hundred questions of this character, and he protested against putting men of honour to the moral torture of coming to the table and swearing that they had not done, and would not do, a quantity of things that it would require a casuist to say they were not doing. He had been too long a Member of that House, even if there were no other motive, not to be very anxious about its character. The character of the House of Commons was one of the most precious possessions of the people of this country. But there was no better mode of degrading the character of Parliament than by passing a declaration which would have the effect of keeping out men of scrupulous consciences. He doubted very much whether the declaration would have any effect in preventing bribery. The subject had been a good deal discussed in that House, but all former Parliaments had invariably shrunk from imposing a stringent oath of this character upon Members coming to the table of that House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not know a more efficacious mode of maintaining the character of that House than by preventing Members from taking their seats who had been guilty of bribery, nor did he know any better mode of accomplishing this object than by imposing a declaration like that in the Bill. An honest man would have no objection to take it, and, if it kept out those who had been guilty of bribery, so much the better. He could not understand how the declaration could keep out any scrupulous man who knew he had been guilty of no corrupt practices, and, as a Member of the Government, he certainly could not read the clause in the same way as the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed them. Was it the opinion of any man who understood the English language, that payment on account of an election meant getting a man a place? Both were equally corrupt, but inasmuch as there were mixed cases, where the corruption was not the same, where the degradation of the voter was not the same, where the public service was to be done, there should be mutual concession, and Government should be allowed to distribute its patronage among those who did the work, unless, indeed, they used it in the manner of direct influence. It certainly was not included in the declaration. There might have been some difficulty with regard to the money expended in registration cases and charities, but that was to be removed entirely by a clause which it was proposed to introduce, and, although it was extremely desirable they should look closely into the terms of a measure of this kind, yet they ought not to be over-scrupulous, but leave everything to a fair remedy. He was astonished to hear his right hon. Friend (Mr. V. Smith) take the course of argument he had against the declaration, for he (the Attorney General) believed there were scores of men who would have little hesitation in committing bribery if there were no such declaration, but who would hesitate to do so if they had to come to the table of the House and make such a declaration as that proposed. They might feel little remorse for practising bribery, but if, after having resorted to corrupt practices, they should come to that House and make a solemn declaration which should afterwards turn out to be untrue, they would find they would lose the esteem of society, and that consideration would prevent them from becoming guilty, as it would enable them to make the declaration boldly and without fear of contradiction.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had not been successful in disposing of the powerful observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere). He did not understand that speech to be directed against the whole principle of a declaration, but in opposition to a vague and uncertain one. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had not convinced him that there ought not to be a declaration, for he believed, unless they did have one, this Bill would lose its value entirely. But he had conclusively established that it should be so clear and specific that men of honour could take it without danger to their consciences. He (Sir J. Pakington) had endeavoured to correct one objection, but after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman he would not press the adoption of the words the insertion of which he had moved, but would suggest to the noble Lord the President of the Council that, as it was so important they should come to some decision as to what course they would take, it would be better to withdraw the present terms of the declaration, to which so many objections had been taken, so as to reconsider its form and decide upon it on bringing up the report. By adopting that course they would see whether the declaration could not be directed specifically against bribery, and at the same time put in terms to which every conscientious man might assent, after which they might add words to the effect, that they would not pay the legitimate expenses of the election except through the election officer.

MR. AGLIONBY said, he understood the right hon. Member for Taunton to object to the premature introduction of a question upon the declaration at all, and to suggest that they should first of all amend the clause, and then put the question whether the declaration should stand or not. It seemed to him the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) had completely misunderstood the whole scope of the right hon. Gentleman's argument, as in his (Mr. Aglionby's) opinion that right hon. Member objected most strongly to any declaration whatever. For his part, he hoped that in any Amendment of the declaration they would make it as clear and specific against bribery as possible, but he must express a strong opinion that, unless they insisted that a declaration should be made by Members of Parliament, the Act would not be worth a rush. They had most stringent clauses with respect to bribery and treating, and it would be a total dereliction of duty if they shrank from introducing the test of a declaration, which he considered absolutely necessary. An hon. and learned Member had asked, what was to be done with respect to registration expenses and subscriptions to local charities? The hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) said, he thought that objection was completely answered by the exception of such expenses, but, in his opinion, nothing could be more inconclusive. There was nothing to prevent people making use of those registration expenses and charitable subscriptions as a means of securing their election. He considered such a practice would be wholesale bribery; the introduction of the proviso was, in his opinion, the worst part of the Bill, and rather than have it he would vote against the measure altogether. At the same time they were bound not to criticise words too minutely, but to do everything which would tend to put down the pernicious system of bribery and treating. After all the arguments they had heard, and the many difficulties they experienced in their attempts to put down bribery by enactment, he ventured to say that, sooner or later, hon. Members would come to the conclusion which he had formed long ago—that the only true remedy for bribery and its concomitant evils was vote by ballot.

MR. J. BALL said, as the Bill stood there was a simple test which it was very undesirable to remove, in order to substitute another which would prove a trap for consciences. With regard to what had been said of charitable subscriptions, he really did not think the practice of subscribing to a Member's plate, at the county or borough races, would be so important or so universal as to interfere with purity of election.

LORD LOVAINE said, he considered the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton unanswerable. They were told they were to make this declaration, and not to view it with too much astuteness; in fact, he supposed they were to view it by the light of a lawyer's conscience. Every speaker on the question had given a different interpretation of the clause, and he disliked quite as much a lawyer's casuistry as any other. In his opinion, if they adopted it at all, they should make the form of the declaration as positive as possible, leaving no means of equivocation; but it would be far better to take the advice of the right hon. Member for Taunton, and discard it altogether.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, that if they were to admit a very large expenditure connected with the registration, racing subscriptions, charitable gifts, and matters of that kind, the declaration might assume a very doubtful and uncertain character, but otherwise he did not conceive it would have any particular bearing upon such cases. It was clear that the many noble institutions spread all over the face of the country ought not to suffer through a declaration of this character, and it was impossible for any one to represent a place out of the metropolis without entering into what might be termed local interests. But the question was by no means settled, whether the clause itself would be adopted, and it would be time enough to consider any Amendment after the principle had been affirmed. He believed their differences on this question were irreconcilable, that it was no mere quibble upon words, but a substantial difference of opinion. They must either take the declaration in its strict sense, or not at all; otherwise, it would be a great burden upon their consciences, occasioning them much trouble and distress of mind, such as no one had a right to inflict upon hon. Gentlemen in that House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he was rather sorry that the principle of the clause should have been so much argued, before the clause itself. At the same time, an important question had been raised by his right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere), and he could not refrain from replying with some feeling of misgiving to the objections urged by his right hon. Friend, as he had himself for many years been opposed to the introduction of any oath or declaration with respect to this subject; and that objection was a good deal founded on the nature of our laws regarding bribery. But when he heard the objections that had been made, he was obliged to ask the question whether the House of Commons, in passing a Bill of that kind, carefully considering all its provisions, really intended to make a law which should be effective or not? Because, if it was intended to be operative and effective, any Member of the House who should come in, having obeyed its provisions and conformed to its enactments, could have no difficulty in subscribing to a declaration of this kind. He would not have knowingly violated the law, or knowingly have been guilty of contempt of an enactment, to which, perhaps, he himself might have been opposed. But if, on the other hand, it was not the intention that any candidate or future Member should obey the provisions of this law, they ought not only to abstain from passing this law, but rather take the course of repealing those which now existed on the subject. If, however, their intention was to punish men who received bribes, which, perhaps, they intended to apply to the wants of their families, insufficiently clothed and fed, was it not inconsistent to say that Members of Parliament or candidates who bribed should not be subjected to penalties provided by the law for such an offence? Still, a declaration or oath which it was intended persons should take should be one that was capable of being clearly understood, and one which should be in conformity with the general sense and conduct of those who were to take it. For instance, the declaration it was formerly incumbent on officers of the Army to take, that commissions should not be sold or purchased below a certain price, was generally understood as not necessary to be observed. That was imposing a declaration which never ought to have been imposed, and he considered that it would be useless to enact the present law unless it were to be effective. But, it appeared their intention was that expenses incurred in elections were to be paid in conformity with the law, and that when a candidate believed certain payments were for bribing and treating, he should not make such payments, they being in direct contravention of the law. The proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) was a very specific proposal, because it went directly to the effect, that all payments made on account of an election were to be made through an election officer, who was to declare whether or no such payments were payments which he authorised and was ready to pay, or whether he did not allow them. It appeared to him to be a declaration which every man, as far as in his power and according to his conscience, who went into that House, obeying the law, could safely make, and, indeed, he did not see how any person who had obeyed the law could object to make such declaration. There could be no doubt that a general impression existed throughout the country that the expenses of elections had been the great means of corruption, and that there had been practices very scandalous and degrading, and injurious and derogatory to the character of the House, which ought not to be persisted in. It was very true that men might get elected in consequence of bribery and in violation of the law; and perhaps there never was a law passed yet but some men tried to evade it: still that would not be the case with men of any influence and character who were worthy Members of that House—they would be able to take the declaration with a safe conscience. They were told the character of the House would suffer if this declaration were imposed; but they might depend upon it, nothing could be worse for the House than when they came to question whether or not they should pass severe penalties against voters, and attempt at the same time to exempt the Members of the House from any inconvenience. He quite agreed with his right hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) that the words proposed by the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Pakington) "expenses of the election," were open to objection; and it did seem to him that, in order to specify as far as possible what it was they intended, it would be better to keep to the language in the former part of the Bill, which defined the expenses the candidate might pay, and provided for the sending in of the accounts to the election officer. With regard to what had been said about subscriptions to county balls, races, and charities, those charges were clearly not referred to in this clause; but, certainly, it would be in the power of an Election Committee of that House, upon a petition presented to them and an examination of the facts, to decide how far payments on that account could be considered bribery and corruption. He did not, however, think that the present declaration would have reference to such charges so as to prevent a Member from conscientiously taking it.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. HILDYARD said, when he first spoke he had put a question to the hon. and learned Attorney General with respect to certain payments, and he was told that they were to be excepted from the operation of the clause. In his simple judgment, they had by such a course not only rendered nugatory the whole operation of the Bill, but had actually pointed out to the electors how it could be evaded. He now came to another matter. The hon. and learned Attorney General had told them that the declaration would not apply to giving places corruptly. That was a very ominous statement, coming as it did from a Member of the Government and one of the law officers of the Crown. If it was necessary to have a declaration to put an end to corrupt practices, why did it not embrace that particular case? On looking to Clause 3, they found a definition of bribery, which included the agreement or contract for "any valuable consideration, office, place, or employment, before the election;" but, in the next section of the clause, which had reference to the receiving of the bribe after the election, those words were left out; and now the Attorney General said this declaration was not to include them; so that, in point of fact, while they made the declaration operative against every one else, it was to be ineffective against the great bribers, the Government. He challenged his hon. and learned Friend to point out any provision affecting them in the Bill, and, although it might be said that, if the patronage were taken away the Government could not be carried on, the hon. and learned Attorney General admitted it would be as base to bribe by means of an office or place as by money. If they were to have such a declaration, let it sweep the decks clear and include the Government. In order to test the opinion of the Committee upon this point, he should move the addition of such words as would carry out his view of this part of the question.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 21, after "1854," to insert the words—

"And have not knowingly given nor will give any office, place, or employment to any voter or any other person in consideration of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any Election."

MR. HENLEY said, he did not think the part of the clause was reached where the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member could be proposed. The Committee was discussing a declaration which all admitted was not right in its present form, and yet no one had proposed anything which could render it more comprehensible. He agreed with the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) that no declaration should be put that the House did not understand. He denied, however, the noble Lord's further statement, that penalties were not imposed upon Members as well as upon voters; on the contrary, penalties, or rather oaths, were taken off voters, and were proposed, in the form of this declaration, to be placed upon Members. With all due deference to the noble Lord, he thought the words proposed by the noble Lord would be more objectionable than those of the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) which had been withdrawn. He did not think the clause should be persevered in without further explanation.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he thought the time was come to decide upon the principle of the declaration. He denied the proposition of the noble Lord that there were no penalties on the candidates. There were, on the contrary, not only pecuniary penalties, but disabilities enough to terrify any man. Let them look not only at the pecuniary penalties, but to the disabilities they incurred. The first time the Member contravened the Act he was subjected to exclusion of seven years, and the second time for life. On a comparison of penalties, he found that there was an enormous difference against the candidate, as contrasted with the voter. But they were arguing the question of declaration, and not of penalties. He contended that the declaration would be utterly useless and futile for any good purpose, and would be only the means of placing the Member in a very invidious position, if, after having made the declaration, a petition, which might after all turn out groundless, were presented against him. Time was when it was usual to take the word of an hon. Member who rose in that House for the truth of his statement, but now, he supposed, the next thing would be that their time would be occupied in receiving and discussing petitions, accusing hon. Members of having spoken falsely. It was intolerable that they should waste so much time in discussing Amendments to a declaration which no one would adopt. The declaration itself was nothing more than the stringent oath embodied in the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly), but dwindled and refined down to such tenuity that it might easily be taken by any person possessed of what the noble Lord had once happily termed "a robust conscience."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to remind the Committee that the making of the declaration was similar to a plea of "Not Guilty" in criminal law, and merely signified that the accused wished to be put upon his defence. If, therefore, a Member conscientiously refused to make the declaration, it would be tantamount to preventing him from properly defending himself before the courts, should any claim be made against him. It would, therefore, operate most unjustly.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he would propose that the Committee should decide at once whether the declaration was to be adopted: verbal Amendments could be made afterwards, if deemed necessary. He thought legislation on the subject of election expenses would be idle unless it was accompanied by a declaration. A pecuniary penalty would be willingly paid in cases where candidates would hesitate in submitting themselves to the risk of prosecution for misdemeanor.

MR. GOULBURN said, he agreed that the most expedient course would be to decide as to the declaration. He should vote against the declaration without hesitation when the time arrived for taking the opinion of the Committee on the subject.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, he thought the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven fell short of the fact. He should support it, however; but he thought it ought to comprehend all offences included in Clause 2 of the Bill.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 120; Noes 128: Majority 8.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, he would now move to add to the clause the following words—

"Nor have done, nor will hereafter do, any act contrary to the provisions contained in Sections 2 and 4 of this Act."

He had reason to believe that many hon. Members who voted against the last Amendment would have supported it had it had a more extended operation. He believed, however, that the wording of the present Amendment was sufficiently large to include everything against which it was desirable to obtain the declaration of an hon. Member.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he must appeal to the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Amendment, because, if the Committee should determine to retain the declaration at all, he would have two other opportunities of moving Amendments upon it.

MR. COBDEN said, he had voted against the last Amendment because it only applied to the case of Members of Government who gave places, but did not extend to the case of Members of that House who procured places. The present Amendment, however, seemed to include both, and he should therefore support it.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 119: Majority 19.

Clause agreed to.

VOTE OF CREDIT—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI said, it would be very convenient to the House if the noble Lord the leader of the Government would say when he would lay on the table an estimate of the amount required in the form of a Vote of Credit for the expenses of the war, and when he would propose to take it into consideration.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that some misapprehension seemed to have existed on the subject. In conformity with the usual practice, a Message would be sent down from Her Majesty to that and the other House of Parliament. In pursuance of that Message he would propose on Monday next, as was usual in time of war, that the Vote of Credit be granted to the amount of 3,000,000*l.* He did not think it would be necessary to lay any estimate on the table; but his proposal would be that a Vote of 3,000,000*l.* be granted for the purposes of the war. With reference to a question which had been put to him the other night, he might state, that it would not be necessary to take any Vote in Committee of Ways and Means, the Votes already granted by the House being sufficient for the present.

MR. DISRAELI said, he wished to know whether it was to be understood that the Royal Message would be taken into consideration on Monday?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The Message will come down, probably, to-morrow, and will be taken into consideration on Monday.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 34 (Election Officer, how paid).

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, it had been suggested that some provision should be made for the payment of the election officers and other reasonable expenses, and to meet those wishes he had drawn up a few words to be inserted at the end of Clause 34 to meet this point.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 3, to add at the end of the Clause, the words—

"And the reasonable expenses incurred by the Election Officer in the business of the Election and the performance of his duties pursuant to this Act, shall form part of the Election Expenses, and shall be paid rateably and proportionably by the Candidates respectively."

MR. BENTINCK said, this Amendment would leave the relations between the election officer and a candidate in a very unsatisfactory state. There was nothing in the Bill to determine what was reasonable or not. What the election officer might think a reasonable charge the candidate might think unreasonable. He considered there ought to be some power of determining questions that might arise as to expenses between candidates and election officers. He thought the sum for election officers too small considering their responsible duties, and that it was advisable to get a superior class of persons to fill those posts. He also thought it was highly objectionable in principle that candidates should be called upon to pay the expense of election officers. These officers were for the good of the country, not for the good of the candidate, and ought to be paid out of the borough rate, or county rate, as the case might be.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, he thought the clause relating to the payment of advertisements ought to be made more definite. He also thought the sum named in the clause was sufficient.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, no one had been named as the party who was to determine what were legal expenses. His great objection to the Bill was, the unsatisfactory mode in which the clauses were framed.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the Bill had been drawn up with great care by some of the most eminent lawyers in the House, the Members for East Suffolk, Midhurst, and Bath, and by the Attorney General; and he believed with an anxiety that it should be effective for its purpose.

MR. ELLIOT said, he would suggest that the charges of the election officer should be subjected to the revision of the returning officer.

LORD HOTHAM said, his feeling was, that if they were to have an election officer at all, they ought to have the office filled by one of the most respectable individuals in every borough or county. It appeared to him, also, that 10*l.* from each candidate would be a paltry remuneration for such an officer; for it would be perfectly absurd to expect that any respectable man would consent to receive such a sum for the invidious duties he would have to discharge. He did not think such an officer would be overpaid if he received 100*l.*, instead of 10*l.*; and, if no one else did it, he would, at a future stage, propose that the remuneration to election officers should be 100*l.*

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to know whether the noble Lord meant that each candidate should contribute 100*l.*?

LORD HOTHAM said, what he meant was, that the 100*l.* should be paid rateably among the candidates.

MR. HENLEY said, he apprehended they could not now take that proposition into consideration, seeing that they had already gone beyond that part of the clause. With respect to the question immediately before the Committee, he should prefer leaving it to the tribunals of the country, rather than to the returning officer, to say what expenses were reasonable. There was also another point of some importance. He should like to know at what time of the election this fee—whether of 10*l.* or 100*l.*—was to be paid to the election officer? At present a man of straw was often proposed as a candidate at an election, and he was required, with the other candidates, to pay the returning officer his share of the necessary expenses. Would such a person likewise have to pay 10*l.* down to the election officer? He (Mr. Henley) thought he should do so, for, otherwise, the man of straw might go away before the election, and they had already defined a candidate to be, not only a man who is nominated at an election, but one who might be about to be nominated.

Mr. GOULBURN said, he would put another case. One or two gentlemen at an election for a county might set up a gentleman as a candidate without his knowledge or his consent, and as the Bill stood at present a gentleman so proposed would be obliged to pay 10*l.* to the election officer. He thought that unreasonable.

Mr. BENTINCK said, his objection throughout had been the entire want of security provided by the Bill, both as to the ability and the character of this election officer. He thought, with regard to the suggestion of his noble Friend (Lord Hotham), that 100*l.* would be an enormous amount of remuneration for the kind of person likely to be appointed to the office.

Mr. GRANVILLE VERNON said, a candidate frequently came down to a borough and went about canvassing the electors for a few days, when, finding he had no chance of being returned, he retired, but without incurring any expense. Now, he wanted to know whether such a person would be bound, under this clause, to pay 10*l.* to the election officer, who would have nothing whatever to do for him?

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, that would depend altogether on the definition which the Committee might give to the word "candidate" in the interpretation clause. He was convinced that this election officer would have the candidate more in his power than the returning officer had at this moment. He would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) whether, if the election officer for East Suffolk charged him 500*l.* as his expenses at an election, the hon. and learned Gentleman would venture to call him to account for it; and if he did so, would he dare to go further, and bring the matter before a legal tribunal? He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman would never venture to do either the one or the other. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) that the election officer ought to be a man of the greatest competence and respectability; but the only men fit for the office, namely, the County Court Judge in every English county, and the assistant barrister in Ireland, were those against whom the Committee appeared to have the most prejudice.

Mr. HEYWORTH said, he must contend that when a man came into Parliament and voluntarily gave up his services and his time to his country, it was neither just nor reasonable that he should be subjected to an impost like that under discussion, and that the fairer course would be to charge the remuneration of the election officer on the county or borough rates.

Mr. BIGGS said, he would suggest that, instead of two per cent, the election officer should be allowed five per cent commission. In this case, if there were four candidates, and the expenses of each were 300*l.*, the election officer would receive 15*l.* commission, and 10*l.* from each candidate, which, together, would amount to the sum mentioned by the noble Lord (Lord Hotham).

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he could not conceive why a candidate should be called on to pay any part of these expenses at all.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 56: Majority 32.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 103; Noes 47: Majority 56.

Clause added to the Bill.

Clause 36 (the Interpretation Clause).

Sir FITZROY KELLY proposed to alter the definition of candidates. The clause provided that a candidate at an election should mean and include all persons elected as Members to serve in Parliament at such election, and all other persons who had been or were about to be nominated or proposed as candidates at such election. He proposed to strike out the words "mean and," and also the words "or are about to be," and after the word "proposed," to insert the words "or who shall have declared themselves to be candidates."

Amendments agreed to.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER proposed to insert, after the words, "have declared themselves candidates," the words "at or before the election."

The insertion of the words having been agreed to,

MR. HILDYARD said, that the adoption of that Amendment superseded the necessity of the one suggested by himself.

SIR FITZROY KELLY then proposed to strike out certain words in the latter part of the clause, so as to make the words "personal expenses" include all reasonable travelling expenses of the candidate generally.

Words struck out.

MR. PERCY said, he wished to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Suffolk, whether the expenses of chairing were among those personal expenses which would be illegal under the Bill?

SIR FITZROY KELLY replied in the negative. In the Bill which he had the honour to introduce, he proposed to render the expenses of chairing absolutely illegal. That clause was not in the present Bill, but he doubted very much whether the expenses of chairing were or could ever be considered legal, and they certainly could not be included in the words "personal expenses." He would be ready at any time to speak and vote in favour of a proposition prohibiting chairing expenses altogether. He had himself on one occasion paid a sum so enormous for chairing, that he feared the Committee would hardly credit him if he were to name it.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk would again bring forward his clause relative to chairing and bands.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there was one expense necessary to be incurred before the election officer appeared upon the scene—that of postage. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but in large boroughs, such as that which he had the honour to represent, the expense of circulating addresses among the electors amounted to a very large sum. In his own case it cost 100*l.*, and he thought that item of expenditure ought to be authorised.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the expenses in question were provided for in a clause of which he had given notice, empowering candidates to pay all such expenses as they bond fide thought ought to be paid in ready money before the election, but requiring them, of course, to render an account of all such payments to the election officer.

Clause agreed to.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he would now bring forward the clause of which he had given notice. He presumed that when that House entertained the three Bills that were brought forward on the subject of bribery and corrupt practices at elections, and referred them to a Select Committee, it intended to do something more than merely to consolidate the law, because the uncertainty of the law, the impossibility of knowing what a person might do, or might not do, was one of the evils complained of. Now, what were the facts of the case? After the last general election they had upwards of fifty Election Committees, and between 250 and 300 gentlemen were employed for a vast number of days endeavouring to settle some of the most perplexing questions possible, many of whom ended their inquiries without being sure whether they had decided right or wrong. No fewer than forty Members lost their seats, nine writs were suspended, the country was put to the expense of several Commissions, and a great deal of discredit was thrown upon that House, upon a large portion of the electoral body, and upon the whole institutions of the country. He was afraid that the law would not be made much better by the present Bill. They had, it was true, put a check, or thought they had put a check, upon some of the expenses connected with an election, by the creation of an election officer; but the uncertainties of the law still existed, and he apprehended that they would be, if possible, increased by the enactments of the present Bill. That being the case, he would beg to be allowed to lay before them a few facts with regard to the expenditure at contested elections. He would not go to Yorkshire, where 250,000*l.* was spent in one election; nor to Northamptonshire, where three noble families were reduced to the verge of ruin by the expenses of an election; but would refer to elections which had occurred recently, and which were within their own cognisance. In 1846, the election for the county of Middlesex cost 13,000*l.* to the three candidates, and the contested election for the northern division of Lincolnshire cost one candidate alone 15,000*l.*, and the three candidates together 23,000*l.* In that division of Gloucestershire which was contested the other day under the new Act, the election cost 10,000*l.*; and to come to the county in which he resided, the cost of the elections for the last few years amounted to the enormous sum of 30,000*l.* Nobody would venture to say that such a state of things ought to continue. Such a vast expenditure could not be incurred without a great deal of unfair and improper influence being used, and the result in many instances had been that the man with the largest purse was usually sent to Parliament. He would mention two very curious cases which had occurred. The first illustrated the question of refreshment tickets. There was a county returning three Members. Three gentlemen stood on one side and only one on the other, and it was agreed that each should give a 5*s.* ticket for refreshments. Accordingly, the three candidates who represented the same interest each gave a 5*s.* ticket, and the other—the opposing candidate—did the same, so that the elector who voted for the former got 15*s.*, while he who voted for the latter obtained only 5*s.* Of course, the three candidates were returned. The other case illustrated the point as to the expenses of conveyance. There was a borough in which it was the custom to give the voters 2*l.* 2*s.* each as head-money. Upon one occasion, the candidates decided that they should give the head-money no longer; but the electors refused to go to the poll, and the candidates hit upon the following expedient—each voter had a cab sent to his house accompanied by a servant, and all the members of his family, himself included, were driven to the polling-booth. There could be no doubt that, if such expenses were allowed to go on, they would continue to be used for corrupt purposes. Some hon. Gentleman had talked of the loss of time of the voter in going to the poll, but he could not comprehend how any man who estimated the possession of the franchise could feel it to be a grievance to be required to come to the poll once in three or four years. Some hon. Gentlemen were also haunted with the notion that, if the expenses of an election were abolished, the House would be invaded by a host of adventurers, who by giving large promises would obtain seats in the Legislature. All he could say was, that having had much experience of popular constituencies, that provided a man's character would stand the test of public scrutiny, the fact of his being a gentleman of independent fortune was a positive passport to favour. Upon what conceivable principle, except that of vicious practice, could they saddle a candidate with the personal expenses of a voter? Let the candidate pay his own personal expenses—let the voter pay his—and let the county or borough pay that which properly belonged to it. Whether his clause was agreed to or not, he hoped the Committee would, at least, declare its opinion upon the subject, so that some clue might be given to the members of an Election Committee as to how they were to decide upon the case of a controverted election when it came before them. The question was surrounded with great difficulties, but they never would escape from those difficulties unless they based their legislation upon some sound and intelligible principle, such as that contained in the clause which he had now the honour to propose.

Clause (Every person who shall advance or pay, or cause to be paid, any money for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the conveyance of any Voter to or from the Poll, or for the refreshment of any Voters on the day of nomination, or between that day and the day after the declaration of the Poll, shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit),—brought up, and read 1^o.

MR. J. BALL said, that the expense of refreshments was voluntarily incurred, and was not by any means necessary for the exercise of the elective franchise. But the question of conveyance was totally different. In many of the Irish counties, the effect of the proposed clauses would be to place in the hands of the wealthier classes the power of carrying the elections, for large numbers of the voters lived at considerable distances from the polling places, and the expense of going to the poll was, to such poor men, a very serious matter. The expense of removing electors from one street to another in boroughs ought to be declared illegal, but to extend the same prohibition to counties would not conduce to that freedom of choice which the noble Lord wished to secure to the voters.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he was in favour of the principle of every voter paying his own expenses. Some few might be prevented from voting on this ground, but the way to remedy that would be to give universal suffrage.

MR. ELLIOT said, he thought that in Scotland there would be great difficulty in bringing voters to the poll—a distance of perhaps fifteen or twenty miles—without an allowance for travelling expenses. Universal suffrage would be no remedy for this evil; it would merely increase the numbers who suffered from it. If the ticket could be got rid of altogether, he thought it would be a great advantage; but he did not see how it was to be done. He represented a place where many of his constituents resided in England, and he should be glad to see a law passed preventing non-residents from voting.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he hoped that the framers of the Bill would no longer be charged with the undue severity of their measure; for no clauses could be devised more severe or more oppressive in their operation than the one just proposed. The effect of it would be, if enacted, to render absolutely illegal these expenses, as also to subject to pecuniary penalty, as well as to penal action, every person who might make the smallest payment for travelling or refreshment expenses for a single voter, no matter the peculiarity of that voter's case. The present state of the law rendered it absolutely necessary to settle the question. On one side they had the high authority of Lord Lyndhurst, that moderate payments for refreshments and travelling expenses to voters coming from a distance were not illegal either by the common or statute law; while, on the other hand, they had the opinion of the Attorney General, that all such payments were altogether illegal. It was well known that at every election some expenses of this kind were incurred. Suppose after the next general election, petitions were presented complaining of them, in one room counsel might rely on the opinion of the Attorney General, and if there was the slightest feeling against the sitting Member, he was sure to be unseated; whilst in the very next room, another Committee would avail themselves of the authority of Lord Lyndhurst, to retain a certain gentleman in his seat. Such a state of things ought not to exist, and the proposal of the noble Lord, or some other, should be adopted. In deciding on this question, they should look to what public opinion was; no person could assert that public opinion was against these payments, for there had not been an election in the country for many years past at which they had not been made. So long as the law forced persons to come from a distance to give their votes, so long ought these payments to be allowed within reasonable limits. A measure had been proposed to the Select Committee, to enable every man to give his vote at his place of residence, wherever it might be; he hoped that would eventually become law; but until it did these tickets must be sanctioned. He was entirely against legalising the giving refreshments to any voters, except those coming from a distance; but in every county of England there were a large number of persons who could not come to the poll unless they received a reasonable sum for their expenses. To refuse it to them would be to disfranchise one-fourth of the constituency of England; he, therefore, could not support the Motion of the noble Lord.

MR. COBDEN said, he had watched with much interest the proceedings of the hon. and learned Gentleman in his somewhat novel character of reformer and purifier of our election proceedings; but he should be sorry if the Committee was induced to affirm the proposition he had now laid down, and deeply regretted that he had ever touched the question at all. If they attempted to legislate with no better definition than reasonable and unreasonable expenses, they would be opening a door to every conceivable excess and corruption on the day of election. What was reasonable for one man, who could carry off two bottles of port wine without being in the least excited, would be very unreasonable for another weak-headed man, who would be rolled in the dust by half a bottle. And how would an Election Committee decide what was reasonable for a thirsty man, and for one who had not the least appetite for drink? To legalise this definition of reasonable and unreasonable would do more harm than if they never touched the question at all. He was confident the Bill would never pass with a clause affirming the legality of giving reasonable refreshment on the polling day. The other proposal with regard to the hire of carriages might require more consideration. All admitted that it was in harmony with the Bill to prevent this small species of bribery; it was in harmony with the principle they had laid down in prohibiting the giving of a yard of ribbon for a cockade, and preventing the employment of any agent, poll-clerk, or messenger who was an elector. They were not dealing with a weekly, a monthly, or even an annual event, but with a case that arose on an average once in about three years. Once in three years the electors of this country, intrusted by the Constitution with supreme power over the empire, were called upon to exercise their high function by voting for representatives in that House. They were involved in a certain amount of trouble in going to the poll; but what did it amount to? Take a county election. The polling districts, on an average, were not seven miles in diameter; and that did not imply that the elector had to walk or ride seven miles, but only three and a half. Would it be contended that the electors, the privileged class in this country, people who were held out as, par excellence, in an independent condition, and fit to be intrusted with the power of choosing representatives for their fellow-countrymen, were not able, once in three years, to go three miles and a half to give their votes? In counties the polling places were always in towns, consequently the dense population of the county was clustered round the polling places. Then the facilities given by railways enabled these poor, helpless people, who could not walk, to perform their duty. Nearly every town in the kingdom had now a railway in connection with it; and a parliamentary train ran on each line every day at a penny a mile; so that actually for 3d. or 4d. this poor elector might go from his residence to the polling place to give his vote. Was it necessary, for the sake of this miserable pittance, to violate the principle of this Bill by introducing the proposed system? It would be degrading the elector to allow him to be paid by Act of Parliament for exercising his high functions. But there was another objection to the hiring of carriages on the day of election, it was made a source of bribery to those who had votes to give. How was it with the car-owners in Ireland, with the cab and omnibus proprietors in England? It was a regular and systematic mode of bribery. As soon as the day of election was named, there was a scramble between the two parties which should get possession of the carriages. As a consequence, the price was raised; and very often the raising of the price was an obstacle to the voters getting up to the poll at all. The voters were persuaded to wait till they were sent for; it often happened that the committees could not get the carriages on account of the competition, or the drunkenness and inattention of those having the control over them; and the price was so raised that the voters could not hire for themselves. When they proposed to prohibit every species of bribery, they should also prohibit that of bribery by cabs and carriages. It was said that if this system were not allowed, none but rich men would be returned for the counties; that the rich men had got all the private carriages, and the farmers the horses, which they would lend for the conveyance of voters; but that the friends of the poor candidate having no carriages to lend, his supporters would be unable to come up to the poll. But it was not usually poor and rich men who were pitted against each other on the day of election. Ordinarily the contest was between the property classes, Whig and Tory generally, though they were pretty much merged into one now. They had proprietors and rich men on both sides. He warned the country Gentlemen that the system which they supported was not calculated to maintain their influence, but rather to bring in the parvenu millionaire whose long purse enabled him to bear the expense. Gentlemen of old family, who had traditional influence, were mistaken if they thought they served their interests by encouraging enormous expense. It would be better for them to depend on their traditional influence, which gave them a hold on the constituency. For example, he would take the county he himself represented. It contained 36,000 electors. Suppose the principle of giving refreshment was once recognised, and that every Yorkshireman who came to the poll was to receive even the smallest sum suggested by any Gentleman—two shillings—it gave a sum of 3,600*l.*; add to this the travelling expenses. In some counties, he believed, the voters require carriages and four; but, setting it down at the sum of 2*s.*, this would require 3,600*l.* more, making a fixed charge of 7,200*l.* at every election for the West Riding, independent of all other expenses. He warned the county representatives of the danger that threatened them. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly), that it was important that the question should now be settled; but if it was to be settled by affirming the principle that a candidate might pay for the travelling expenses and moderate refreshment of the voters, he hoped the Bill would never pass that House. The principles of the hon. and learned Gentleman might be affirmed in Committee, but he hoped that in a future stage the clause would be rendered inoperative, or the Bill be rejected altogether.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, that whatever decision the Committee might arrive at on this subject, whether to pronounce these expenses illegal or otherwise, it was incumbent on them and would be a great boon to candidates, that the law should be positively determined, and not left in its present discreditable state of uncertainty. The same authorities, and very high ones, which had determined that travelling expenses were legal, had determined that refreshments were illegal, and he regretted that the noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor) had not kept these two questions separate. He understood that the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was different—that he had expressed it as his opinion that moderate travelling expenses were legal, but that the giving of refreshments was illegal. The Southampton Election Committee, on which he had the honour to sit, unanimously came to the decision that travelling expenses were legal. If the hon. and learned Attorney General had been tried and judged according to his own opinion, he would not now be sitting for the borough of Southampton. He (Sir J. Walsh) had suggested that the Committee should come to a resolution on the subject, but he had been met by the argument that the opinion of Committees on the subject were so contradictory that it would be useless to do so. That showed the importance of their coming to some decision on this question. Not only did they think in the case of the Southampton Committee that moderate travelling expenses were legal, but they were also of opinion that some moderate sustentation of the voter was permissible. The Committee in that case being unable to fix the law, he thought it extremely desirable that it should be now decided and set at rest. He feared if they made all travelling expenses illegal, that the practical effect would be to disfranchise many persons. There were a large class of persons who would not incur the expense of travelling any distance merely upon public grounds. He was ready to agree with the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) that where the distance was only three and a half to seven miles the candidate ought not to pay anything towards travelling expenses. The average distance, however, was much greater; and there was a large class of non-resident voters who might have to come from very remote places, and who would certainly expect to have their expenses paid. If the two questions, of travelling expenses and refreshments, were separated, it would, in his opinion, be far more convenient and far more just. With regard to the latter point, he had always felt that the House of Commons, in its desire to put down anything like bribery, had reversed the principle always applied by that House to cases of corruption and bribery. There had been a tangled web of legislation adopted, and the decision of the question had been referred to a tribunal avowedly partial. He believed the candidate, in giving a moderate refreshment to the voter, had not the slightest idea of corrupting him. It was a practice consecrated by custom, and sanctioned on the ground of hospitality, and he hoped the Committee would pause before they pronounced this practice illegal.

Sir J. Walsh

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was desirous of saying a word upon the matter after the pointed manner in which his opinion had been referred to by the hon. Member for Radnorshire. He adhered to what he had before stated, that, as regarded travelling expenses, express decisions of Committees of that House had determined that such payments were legal, but with respect to refreshment tickets he was of opinion that the payment came within the terms of the Treating Act, and was therefore illegal. With regard to the payment of travelling expenses, no one in that House or out of it would be more cordially satisfied with a declaration or enactment that such payments were illegal than himself. Although the decision of the Committee upon the Southampton Election Petition was strongly in favour of the legality of such payments, his own doubts were such that a week anterior to the election, when it was proposed to have the out-voters up to vote, he declared he would not have them. They were, however, brought in without his knowledge, and payments made on their account without his consent, by which means he was involved in the expense and annoyance of an Election Committee. In his opinion it would be desirable to strike all out-voters from off the register for boroughs. Such a course would limit the expense, and be beneficial to candidates. Counties stood upon a different footing in this respect. Still the more that House instilled into the minds of the electors of England the importance of the franchise intrusted to them, and convinced them that it was a trust upon the proper discharge of which the well-being of themselves and their country depended, the more would purity of election be promoted. But so long as they were paid for their votes in the shape of travelling expenses and refreshments, they derogated from the value of the right. As he wished to see all such expenses abolished, he should support the proposition of the noble Lord.

MR. WALPOLE said, the Committee seemed to be agreed upon one point, namely, that this question must be settled. Certain tests, therefore, must be applied to know how it should be decided. The Bill was framed for two purposes—to diminish expense, and to prevent corruption at elections. Consistently with these two objects, the Committee would agree that no impediment or obstruction ought to be interposed to the discretion of voters in the exercise of their franchise in favour of the candidate for whom they intended to vote, provided they were not influenced to do so by any corrupt motives. Taking this test, he could not see how the Committee could assent to the noble Lord's proposition; and if they could not assent to it, they must be driven to the other alternative of legalising travelling expenses and refreshments in some way. How, might be open to considerable doubt. In respect to travelling expenses, it was clear that, by refusing to pay them, the number of voters brought to the poll would be diminished. Although there were lines of railway intersecting the kingdom, they only afforded facility of communication to certain towns, and not to electors in distant districts. It was perfectly clear that the mere payment of travelling expenses would not tend to increase corruption at elections. It was only in those cases where more was given than was necessary to bring the voter to the poll that the voter was corrupted. With regard to travelling expenses, he felt no doubt whatever, if the alternative was to allow or disallow them, they must allow them, because the disallowance would be to disfranchise half the voters for counties. The hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) said there were 36,000 voters in that district, and the allowance of 2*s.* a head for travelling expenses, and 2*s.* a head for refreshment, would impose a cost upon the candidates of upwards of 7,000*l.* Assuming that 20,000 out of the 36,000 received the 2*s.*—and that was an extravagant estimate—the sum expended would be only 2,000*l.*, and, divided among four candidates, would be only 500*l.* each. He would put it to any county Member whether, in the present uncertain state of the law, he would not think himself well off with a payment of 500*l.* for refreshment expenses? By allowing refreshment expenses to a limited amount they would not add to corruption. No man would poll for a certain candidate because he received 2*s.*, but because he preferred that candidate to any other. Since it would neither add to the expenses of the election nor increase corruption, to allow reasonable expenses for travelling and reasonable expenses for refreshment, the proper alternative, in his opinion, was to allow them. If they disallowed them, they would make the law antagonistic to the general feelings of the people of this country; the law would become worse than nugatory; every one would endeavour to evade it, and more stringent legislation would be necessary, for the present Bill would then utterly fail in its object.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must confess he had very great doubts with respect to the clause now under consideration. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) that it did seem to be the opinion of that House, and he could not but say it was a very reasonable opinion, that, as they were making a new law on this subject, candidates and the country generally should be informed whether the expenses of refreshment and travelling were to be considered legal or illegal. As he understood his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, it had been frequently decided that travelling expenses which were bond fide the expenses of bringing persons to the places of polling, were legal expenses, and that, in his opinion, any payment for refreshment came under the words of the Treating Act, however conflicting later decisions had been. There appeared to him to be a difference between the question of travelling expenses and the question of refreshment. A poor man, living some miles from a polling place in a county, might very well say, "I cannot put such a value on my franchise that I can afford not only to lose my day's wages, but to spend money for the purpose of being conveyed to the place of polling." He thought, in that case, it was not unreasonable that others, and even candidates, should provide the expense which the poor voter could not afford himself. He, therefore, could not give his vote for the proposition of his noble Friend (Lord R. Grosvenor). He thought the question of refreshment, however, was of a totally different character, because, after all, the expense of a man's daily food was an expense defrayed by him, and an expense which, at all events, he need not call on the candidate to defray ; as it was more than probable that he and his neighbours meeting together might be able to take such refreshment as was necessary. Though he had endeavoured as far as possible to bring his mind to consider that some provision of the kind ought to be introduced, he could not concur with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that it would not lead to any corrupt expense. It was quite true, if they continued a practice which had been usual, of the candidates furnishing refreshment expenses, and if they limited to 2*s.* what had hitherto cost 5*s.* a head, they did not introduce any corruption. But there were numbers of cases in which it had not been the practice to allow a sum for refreshment, where persons had been accustomed to go to the poll and did not receive any allowance whatever. Immediately Parliament said 2*s.* should be allowed for the purpose of refreshment, numbers of men who would now never think of claiming a single farthing, but would go and give their votes and return to their own dwellings without calling on any candidate for payment of refreshment, would say, "After all, it is a legal payment ; it is not a gift or any act of generosity on the part of the candidates ; it is found in the Act of Parliament, and we have a right to be paid." He should be afraid, therefore, an element of corruption would be added, and though for some time he was inclined to vote for a clause of this kind, on the whole he had come to the conclusion that it was desirable to allow travelling expenses, but that it was not desirable to allow the expenses of refreshment, and that to make the law more clear, a clause should be inserted, declaring that such expenses came within the provisions of this law. That was the conclusion as to the best course to pursue which he had come to after great hesitation and consideration.

MR. WILKINSON said, that the multiplication of polling-booths ought to render the payment of travelling expenses quite unnecessary. He had no faith in this new attempt to put down bribery and corruption, of which they would never see the end until they adopted the ballot and largely augmented the franchise.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) was guilty of very great inconsistency in calling upon the humbler classes to invest their savings in the purchase of 40*s.* freeholds, while at the same time he decried the payment of travelling expenses. Why, those were the very persons who would become practically disfranchised if they were denied the expense of their journey to the polling places. Now, speaking without the slightest personal feeling on the matter, he would put it to the hon. Gentleman, did he really mean to deprive these poor men of the means of access to the poll, after they had been induced to expend their savings on the obtaining of votes in various counties ? If, however, their object was to disfranchise all the outlying voters, he thought the fair mode of procedure would be to disfranchise all non-resident voters in a county. Still he trusted the Committee would not adopt any measure that would have the effect of disfranchising the poor, while the rich were allowed to retain their privilege of voting. To adopt a measure of that character would indeed be to impose a property qualification with a vengeance.

MR. CROSSLEY said, he must deny that there were any voters in the counties so poor as to make their travelling expenses an object to them. [Laughter.] Well, he would give hon. Gentleman a proof of that. In the factory with which he was connected there were about 1,000 adult labourers, but of that number not more than five, or at the outside ten, had votes. But he would tell hon. Gentlemen that if the whole number were enfranchised, there was not one of them that would not scorn their 2*s.* tickets, and would go manfully to the poll.

COLONEL BLAIR said, he first wished to observe, that it was all very well for the hon. Gentleman to talk of voters in his borough walking like men to the poll—very possibly that might be so with men who had not half a mile to go, but he should like to know what could men do who had a journey of perhaps fifteen or twenty miles to take to reach the polling-booth. And as to refreshments, it was all very easy for voters to go out to the hustings to vote, and then return to their dinner—but that could not be done by the county voters. The hon. Member for the West Riding had laid much stress on there being omnibuses and railways in every part of the country. Now he begged to tell that hon. Gentleman that in the county which he had the honour to represent, they had no such convenience. The object of these travelling expenses was to enable the poor voter to exercise his franchise—and, therefore, in allowing them these expenses they would be merely performing an act of justice.

MR. HEADLAM said, he could not assent to the proposition, that any person who paid the cab-hire of a voter, however old, infirm, or poor such voter might be, should be liable to a penalty of 50*l*. He considered that the proper course would be to allow a moderate amount for travelling expenses, for at county elections some voters must necessarily come a considerable distance to record their votes at the poll. The Committee might rely upon it, that if their legislation were contrary to public opinion, means would be found for evading the law.

MR. ALCOCK said, he trusted the Committee would not allow this opportunity to pass without putting the question of providing refreshment for voters upon some clear and intelligible footing. In some counties, tickets for 3*s*. and more were given to the voters by the agents of each of the candidates; and in case of a plumper, the agent of the candidate who received it gave the voter two refreshment tickets. The evidence given before the Election Committee showed that many Members were unseated for mere treating; and, whatever they should do with respect to travelling expenses, he trusted they would settle the question of refreshment. In 1852 Sir Edward Buxton introduced a Bill for the purpose of legalising refreshments supplied to voters to a limited amount. That Bill was thrown out, and soon afterwards a general election took place; and he would venture to say, that there was no contested election for a county throughout England at which treating did not take place, except in one case, to which his modesty prevented him from referring more particularly. He hoped the House would come to some specific decision upon this subject, and that it would be determined whether refreshment tickets should or should not be issued.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR, in reply, said, he never heard anything like the inconsistency of the arguments used against his proposition. No two hon. Members agreed as to what they thought ought to be done under the circumstances. He was not surprised at that when he found them departing from the principles they had at first laid down, which his proposition merely intended to render more perfect. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) said, that every facility possible ought to be given to all classes of voters to exercise their franchise. He (Lord R. Grosvenor) fully concurred in that sentiment; but he asked the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee upon what ground the candidate should be called upon to pay for that facility? He had put that question before, and he had waited in vain for an answer.

MR. GOULBURN said, that the inconsistency of which the noble Lord complained in respect to the way in which his proposition was met, arose in a great degree from the fact of the noble Lord having combined in one proposition two questions which were essentially different. There was a manifest difference between paying for the conveyance of a voter to the poll and the payment of refreshments for him. Under the circumstances, he (Mr. Goulburn) could not concur in the Motion. From the speech of the noble Lord himself, it appeared that the House of Commons could not prevent the conveyance of the voter to the poll in the ordinary way, without giving him increased and new facilities for exercising his franchise. They were not now prepared to lay down a new system by which the votes were hereafter to be taken, in order to get rid of the reasonable expenses involved in the conveyances of voters to the poll. He contended, therefore, that they would be virtually disfranchising a large portion of the voters if they passed that clause without giving at the same time new facilities to the voter to exercise his constitutional right.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he represented an Irish county, and therefore he was quite familiar with the subject. He had nothing but his popularity to depend upon with the constituency which he had the honour to represent, because it was a popular constituency, and perhaps this being a popular question it might be to his interest to vote against this proposition; but he was so satisfied of its policy that he felt constrained to support it. At one period in the county which he had the honour to represent, it was determined to send a car to the door of every elector to bring him up to the poll, but that proceeding, instead of increasing the number of electors who registered their votes at the election, rather induced them to stop at home. [Laughter.] Strange as it might seem, it was nevertheless true, for the car led them to expect a pleasant drive, besides being taken to the poll, and because they could not have that they declined to vote at all.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 86; Noes 190: Majority 104.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he hoped that the Committee would consent to take the further clauses that had to be considered upon the bringing up of the report. There were a great many other Orders of the Day on the paper, and it would be convenient if the House should now proceed to consider them.

MR. STANHOPE said, he was anxious to propose the clause which stood in his name that night, and he hoped the Committee would allow him to do so. The clause he had to move, he wished to follow Clause 4. It provided that the refreshment tickets should be delivered to such voters as should apply for them. Unless some such clause as this were introduced, he was convinced they would virtually disqualify one-half of the county voters of England, or they must put the candidates to enormous expense for providing additional polling places. They had established the principle that travelling expenses were not illegal or corrupt payments; and he contended that a reasonable and fixed allowance to the poor man for refreshment was equally unobjectionable to a payment for his conveyance.

Clause (Provided always, That upon the consent and application in writing of all such persons as shall be Candidates at any contested County Election, after a poll has been demanded, it shall and may be lawful for the Election Officer to issue tickets or orders in such form as he may think fit for refreshments to voters on the day of polling, not exceeding the amount or value of two shillings each ticket or order, to be delivered to such persons as shall apply, by the Poll Clerks, or some other persons to be appointed for that purpose by the Election Officer, to each voter, on his having voted or polled at such Election, and the amount of the tickets or orders so given shall be paid or discharged in money or refreshments by any person who may be willing so to pay or discharge the same, and such person or persons shall send or deliver such tickets or orders to the Election Officer within one month after the day of Election, and the Election Officer shall pay or discharge such tickets or orders, and charge the same in his accounts, in the same manner and subject to the same provisions as are herein contained regarding the expenses of the Election, to be provided for and paid by such Election Officer: Provided also, That the Candidates shall pay to the Election Officer the amount of such tickets or orders in equal proportions, or in such other proportions as they shall agree upon)—brought up, and read 1^o.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had already declared that his opinion was opposed to the principle contained in this clause; and as the Committee had already fully discussed the question, he hoped they would divide upon it at once.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 126; Noes 142: Majority 16.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that there were some clauses yet to be considered, and some propositions to be made on the report. He proposed that those clauses should be postponed until the report was brought up, and that the Bill be reported now, and taken to-morrow, at twelve o'clock. If the Bill were to be reported, the House would order it to be reprinted.

MR. IRTON said, he would insist upon the Bill being printed before they proceeded further.

MR. KNIGHTLEY moved that the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, he had a very important clause intrusted to him, and he thought that the best course to be adopted was, that the Chairman should report progress, and ask leave to sit again. They had been sitting since twelve o'clock at noon, and it was very hard upon hon. Members that they should be kept for so long a time upon this Bill. He should second the Motion.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that in the course of the discussion upon the last clause, it had been said that it was absolutely necessary to settle this question. Some voted for and some against the clause, but everybody said it must be settled, and he should like to know whether any hon. Gentleman had any clause which was to settle it. It was not yet settled whether travelling expenses were legal or not; and it was absolutely necessary to bring forward some clause to determine that point.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, there was a clause which had been printed these three days, which was calculated entirely to settle the question, and if they now reported the Bill, the clause would be brought forward upon the report.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he thought it impossible for him to propose a clause upon the matter, not knowing whether the House would allow travelling expenses or refreshments; but as soon as the House came to a decision, he should be ready to propose a clause. He wished to go on with the Bill, so as to be able to send it up in conformity with the Resolution of the House of Lords.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished, as the clauses had been very much altered, that the Bill should be reprinted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he should be glad to know whether it would be reprinted until it had been reported upon.

MR. CHAIRMAN said, that until the Bill had been reported, it could not be reprinted.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought that the object of the hon. Member (Mr. Irton) would be best attained by allowing the Bill to be now reported, because it could not be reprinted until it had been reported.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, if the Bill should not be reprinted by to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, he would not proceed with the Amendments.

MR. IRTON said, he did not object to reporting the Bill. All he asked was, that the House should not be called on to discuss the Bill further at twelve o'clock, after having been engaged on it the whole day.

MR. BRIGHT said, he understood that Bills must be sent up to the other House by the 25th instant, in conformity with an order made by that House; and in reference to that matter he wished to ask a question of the Lord President of the Council. He (Mr. Bright) was not a great authority in constitutional law or practice, but it did seem a very odd thing that the other House should pass an order which was a species of coercion on the proceedings of the House of Commons. If the House of Peers could pass this order, they might have passed an order that they would take no Bills after the 25th of June; and if the House of Lords could pass such an order, why could not the House of Commons, and thus put coercion on the Queen herself, and force a dissolution or prorogation of the House? The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) very properly treated this Bill as highly important; and, perhaps, it was likely to be as useful as even the University of Oxford Bill. It had now nearly passed, and the House was compressed into a night or rather into a day's sitting to finish the Bill; and he should be very sorry that the House should submit to have its deliberations interfered with, and the public interest damaged, by a coercion of this kind with regard to a Bill of this nature. He undertook to say that if there were a dozen men in that House who had an animosity to this Bill, and who were resolved pertinaciously to oppose it, they could act in such a manner as would render it impossible to get this Bill through the House, so as to reach the House of Lords before Tuesday next, and then the order of the House of Lords, combined with a small minority of the House of Commons, would stunt and overrule the large majority of the House. He thought it a very unconstitutional course to be taken by one out of two legislative bodies, and he thought the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) ought, through his Colleagues in the other House, to represent the difficulty in which they were. As the Chairman said, to have the Bill reprinted it was necessary that it should be reported; that would be the best course to adopt, and he trusted that the Bill might become law. If hon. Gentlemen withdrew their Motions, then on the third reading they could discuss any clauses to be added to the Bill.

LORD SEYMOUR asked, when the noble Lord meant to take the third reading of the Bill?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he proposed to take the third reading on Monday. With reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Manchester, there was no doubt that there appeared on the Minutes of the House of Lords a statement that, after the 25th of July, with certain exceptions, they would not allow any Bill to be read a second time. He must say there were some grounds for this unusual Resolution in the practice which had prevailed for some years, of sending, at a late period of the Session, a great number of Bills for the consideration of the other House. At the same time, he did not expect that the House of Lords would be so capricious as to reject Bills of great importance. The present measure was one of considerable urgency, as there were several boroughs the writs of which were suspended, and he, for one, would not consent to these writs being issued, unless a measure of the present kind were passed. It would be a question with the House of Lords, supposing the Bill were not sent up to them until the latter end of next week, whether they would read it; and it was obvious that those who did not wish the Bill to pass would have a foundation for their opposition, on the Resolution with respect to the second reading of Bills which had been generally agreed to by their Lordships. He did not wish this obstacle to be placed in the way of the present Bill; and he therefore hoped, under these circumstances, that the House would agree to the Bill being reported.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, that, on the understanding that the report should not be brought up until six o'clock to-morrow, he would consent to withdraw his Motion.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL assented to this.

Motion for reporting progress withdrawn.

The House resumed; Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

STAMP DUTIES BILL.

On the Report of this Bill, as amended, being considered,

MR. HAMILTON moved, that the following clause should be added to the Bill—

"All matriculations, degrees, and certificates of degrees granted by the University of Dublin shall be, and the same are hereby exempted from all Stamp Duty."

In doing so, he assured the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, if the clause was not germane to the object of the Bill, or, at least, as germane as many clauses which it already contained, or if its object was to obtain for the University of Dublin any peculiar advantage or exemption, he would hesitate to press the clause on the present occasion; but if he could show, as he hoped to do in a few words, not only that the stamp duties payable on matriculations and degrees in Dublin College were in themselves objectionable, as being a tax on education and knowledge, but that, unless the clause should be admitted in the Bill, students resorting to Dublin would be in a worse situation than students resorting to any other University in the United Kingdom, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would admit that he was only doing his duty in pressing the matter upon the consideration of the House. The history of these stamp duties was this—no stamps were payable in Ireland in respect of admissions or degrees till 1842; they were then introduced by Sir Robert Peel, expressly as one of the equivalents for the exemption of Ireland at that time from income tax. The stamp duties on degrees, therefore, had no lengthened usage to recommend them; and the exemption, for which they were an equivalent, had been since removed. The tax was 1*l.* on matriculation, and 3*l.* on the degree of bachelor of arts; and it appeared, from a return he had moved for early in the Session, that in Durham, London, the Queen's University in Ireland, and in the several Scotch Universities, no duty on matriculation, or on the degree of bachelor of arts, is payable. The duty, therefore, was imposed only upon students of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was aware that it was about to be removed in Oxford and Cambridge. Was it, then, to remain as regards students who resorted to Dublin, and who generally were less able to pay such an impost than students of Oxford or Cambridge? There were many objections to it, into which, at that late hour, he would not enter. It was a tax upon education and knowledge; it was payable at a most inconvenient time, just when young men required all their means to embark in any profession; it was unequal. The Commissioners of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin Universities concurred in recommending its abolition. The Commissioners for Dublin University thus expressed themselves—

"The general question of taxing degrees we shall notice in connection with degrees in arts; but in the case of medical degrees, there is a special reason for not imposing any tax upon the degrees in the University of Dublin. Medical students frequently receive part of their education in one medical school, and part in another, and many of them are in such circumstances, that the necessity of paying 3*l.* would influence their selection of a place of education. The University of Dublin allows part of the course of education for their degrees to be pursued in the Queen's colleges, and the course of education in the Dublin school of physic is in a great part recognised by the Queen's University in Ireland. If a student has studied partly in each University, and proceeds to graduate in the Queen's University, he is exempt from the payment of the 3*l.* for stamp duty; but if he select the Dublin University to graduate in, he is liable to the tax. Such an inequality of taxation, giving an advantage to one public institution over another, in a matter where they are directly brought into competition, is manifestly unjust; and this injustice ought to be removed by the entire repeal of the duty on degrees in the University of Dublin."

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

Lord J. Russell

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not accede to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman, not because he thought degrees should be taxed, or was unwilling to consider the subject at a proper time, but because to exempt the University of Dublin from the operation of the stamp law would be a piece of irregular and partial legislation.

MR. NAPIER said, he should support the clause. The tax in question was a duty upon the students, and not upon the University, and nothing could be fairer than the proposed clause, which was not proposed in a spirit of favouritism.

MR. WILSON PATTEN said, he would suggest, that as the Bill was one of those in favour of which the House of Lords had made an exception, it would be better to postpone the discussion. He moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

THE POLISH SUBJECTS OF RUSSIA.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON: I beg to put the question of which I have given notice to Her Majesty's Ministers. I wish to know whether it be true that they have directed the Earl of Westmoreland to state to the Cabinet of Vienna that Polish subjects of the Czar will not be allowed to enter the armies or to follow the standards of the allies? My Lords, I can scarcely believe that such a thing is possible, because the main strength of our cause and that of the allies depends upon the co-operation of Poland. When I say Poland, I do not mean the Polish subjects of Austria or of Prussia, but I allude to the 13,000,000 of Polish subjects and 200,000 of Polish soldiers belonging to Russia. It appears to me that it is only with the co-operation of Poland that the cause which the allies have undertaken can be made to succeed; and if the report that has been circulated is true, the Ambassador of England at the Court of Vienna, acting, no doubt, with the most honourable intentions (because I believe Lord Westmoreland is incapable of acting otherwise), will in point of fact have been made to promote the objects of Russian diplomacy. My Lords, I repeat that it is by the aid of Poland that this war can be brought to a successful issue; and by that means alone can you obtain a durable peace, or permanently secure for the allies and for Europe the maintenance of the balance of power. You may take the Crimea, may take Sebastopol or Cronstadt, and destroy the Russian fleets, but this would not terminate the struggle; on the contrary, you will have much to do even after you have accomplished all these achievements. My Lords, as you may remember, the Emperor Napoleon, as a soldier not inferior to Cæsar himself, with 600,000 men, 140,000 cavalry, and 1,300 cannon, made the attempt to conquer Russia, and failed; and those armies, which had succeeded in subjugating nearly half the civilised world, were defeated, routed, plundered, and destroyed—not, as was said, owing to frost and fire, or to the bravery of the legions who opposed them, but from the want of a gallant nation like that of Poland to advance and retreat upon. My Lords, you may humble Russia; and, perchance, with the good fortune of the noble Earl opposite, and with the aid of an able diplomacy, you may succeed in obtaining another peace of twenty-five years' duration; but, mark well, at the expiration of that period are you likely to find a second Louis Napoleon Bonaparte—a man of iron mind—to extricate you again from your difficulties, with money at his disposal, with 500,000 troops, and with as fine fleets as ever sailed to sea? You may not have that good fortune; and, in my opinion, you might as well attempt to carry on this war without the aid of gold or iron, or gunpowder, as to carry it on without the aid of the heart and nerve of Poland. My Lords, it appears to me that it is the interest of the alliance in the first place to endeavour to conciliate the followers of the Greek Church, and in the next place, to restore this 13,000,000 of Poles to their independence—for without these you can never hope to have a permanent peace in Europe. And not only this, but you must look to that which has been much apprehended by Russia, namely, a Pan Slavonian Empire, and to have that empire based upon a liberal constitution.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, that he did not clearly understand what was the noble Earl's question.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON: I am not in the habit of addressing your Lordships, and I may have failed to make myself sufficiently intelligible; but my question is, whether Her Majesty's Ministers have directed the Earl of Westmoreland, our Ambassador to Austria, to assure the Cabinet of Vienna that the Polish subjects of the Czar would not be allowed in any way to co-operate with our armies or to follow the standards of the allies? I do not mean to put the question in that merely technical form; but I want to know from Her Majesty's Government whether they really wish to co-operate with these 13,000,000 of Poles, their most sincere allies in this struggle, or whether they do not?

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, in answer to the question of the noble Earl, I have to state, first, that if he had had the goodness to wait till my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was present, my noble Friend would have been able to give him a more precise answer than I can do; but I will take on myself to state that no such instructions have been given to Lord Westmoreland as the noble Earl opposite imagines. I cannot quite understand, even now, what is the nature of the co-operation to which the noble Earl refers. If he means to ask whether the subjects of the Emperor of Russia are not to co-operate with British troops, that is a question for the Commander in Chief of the British forces to decide. As for the intentions of the allies, we could, of course, give no instructions with respect to any other Power; and with regard to our own forces, I take it that that is a military question that will entirely depend upon the views of the Commander in Chief, who will have to determine whether deserters from other Powers should be employed or not. But as far as the instructions of Lord Westmoreland, to which the noble Earl alludes, are concerned, I think I can undertake to say that nothing of the sort that he supposes has taken place.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON: I understand that one of the chiefs of Poland

had been refused leave to form a Polish Legion to act with the allies, and that the Government of England had been instrumental in that refusal.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN.

Message from THE QUEEN—Delivered by The Viscount Gordon, and read by The Lord Chancellor, as follows:

"VICTORIA R.

CONVOCAATION.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON rose to move for copies of Reports of Committees of the Convocation of the province of Canterbury, presented to the Convocation. The right rev. Prelate was understood to say that one of the Reports to which his Motion referred related to certain reforms or changes in the present constitution of Convocation, suggested with the view of enabling that body to treat, with the fuller confidence of the Church, of such matters as Her Majesty might be graciously pleased to submit to its deliberations. The changes in question were not really changes, so much as they were a return to the rules for regulating the proceedings of both Houses of Convocation which prevailed in former times. The recommendations contained in the Report were made by a joint Committee of the two Houses, in which the most perfect unanimity existed on the subject; so that in case Convocation were permitted to meet for the despatch of business, there was no fear of its being again disturbed by those dissensions and contentions which were the principal cause of the discontinuance of its action in the last century. The Committee did not feel itself at liberty to enter into that most important part of the subject, namely, whether there should be introduced into Convocation the lay element, so as to make that body a representation not of the clergy only, but of the laity, or rather of the Church of England at large. A great complaint was made that Convocation, as at present constituted, was not a fair or adequate representation even of the clergy, and therefore, whilst fully sensible of the vital importance of the question affecting the representation of the laity, the Committee felt that it was one that ought to be determined by Convocation in its reformed or remodelled state, should it hereafter be allowed to meet. The next Report, included in his present Motion, touched also upon a most important and difficult question—the modification of the rules and ordinances of the Church, so as to enable her to extend her boundaries, and to minister more efficaciously and effectually to the spiritual wants of our growing and ever increasing population. He would not now enter into the recommendations of this Report, but he was bound to say that they had all been agreed upon by the Committee of both Houses of Convocation, consisting of men of different shades of opinion in ecclesiastical matters, with something very nearly approaching to perfect unanimity—certainly there was not one point of vital importance on which there was the least divergence of sentiment. The discussions—amicable conversations they ought rather to be called—were, in fact, carried on in a manner that afforded a very hopeful augury for the future; and that ought to go far towards mitigating, if it did not entirely remove, the apprehensions which many serious and well-intentioned persons entertained of the danger that was likely to result from the revival of the synodal action of Convocation. Not a single expression had fallen from any one member of the Committee that could give ground for apprehending the recurrence of anything like polemical controversies. The members of both Houses had reason to be grateful to the most rev. Prelate for the patience with which he had listened to them, and for the impartiality he had displayed—for the most rev. Prelate, if he had been favourable to the revival of the synodal action of Convocation, could not possibly have acted with more fairness. If Her Majesty should be graciously pleased, with certain restrictions and limitations, to revive the synodal action of Convocation, the repetition of the scenes which led to its suspension in the last century would be effectually avoided; and if at any time any member of either House transgressed the bounds of propriety, or forgot the restrictions imposed by the Queen's writ, Her Majesty, as the head of the Church, could put a stop to any irregular proceedings, by the exercise of her Royal prerogative, in proroguing. He rejoiced that the acrimonious feelings which formerly prevailed had been gradually disappearing; and he hoped that at no very distant day the Church of England would again be allowed to enjoy the privilege which was enjoyed by every Christian Church but itself, and be enabled to meet in synod for the regulation of its own concerns. While the Scotch Presbyterian Church, the various Dissenting bodies, and foreign Protestant Churches, had such a power, the Church of England alone was debarred of that which he considered to be essentially necessary to her well-being; and he must repeat his hope that the tone, temper, and universal harmony which prevailed at the recent meetings of Convocation to which he had referred, would have the effect of disabusing the minds of those who had hitherto been led to look with disfavour upon the restoration of the Church's privilege of synodal action. The right rev. Prelate concluded by moving an Address for—

“Copies of the Three Reports made to the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury by Committees of the Upper and Lower House upon Clergy Discipline, the Changes required in the present Constitution of Convocation, and Church Extension.”

Motion agreed to.

COLONIAL CLERGY DISABILITIES.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he had once earnestly hoped that the measures of internal improvement would not have been altogether impeded by the outbreak of the war; for, though the time of Her Majesty's Ministers might be engrossed in dealing with that absorbing subject, still the attention of private Members need not have been so occupied, and they might have entered on the task. That hope, however, had now been entirely disappointed, and amongst the measures which had been sacrificed in consequence was a Bill for the removal of the Colonial clergy's disabilities. Since, however, the Bill was introduced into the other House of Parliament, a change had taken place in the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies. Now, he was not speaking altogether from rumour, for the fact was notorious, when he stated that so far as the present Secretary for the Colonies had stated any opinions in reference to the Bill, those opinions were adverse to it. The question, therefore, naturally arose whether the Government as a Government still retained the same opinions on the subject, and whether they meditated future legislation in its regard? He felt perfectly certain that the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Newcastle) had not changed his mind upon the subject, but he should be exceedingly glad to hear the sense of Her Majesty's Government generally. He had, therefore, to ask whether the Government intended at any future time to reintroduce a measure for the removal of the disabilities of the Colonial clergy?

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that their Lordships would not have forgotten that in three successive Sessions three different Bills, all designed to carry out the same object, had been introduced upon this subject. Three years ago the matter was taken up by his right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the other House, but, after great discussion, the measure was not proceeded with. Last year the most rev. Prelate introduced a Bill in a similar form, but framed so as to obviate the objections of those who had opposed the former measure; but that Bill, after passing through their Lordships' House, also met with a good deal of opposition in the other House, and was withdrawn. In the present Session, again, the Bill now in question was introduced, and was met with considerable opposition in the same quarter as before, and although he was not prepared to say that if an opportunity had been given either by a Select Committee or in some other manner, the objections that had been stated might not have been overcome, nevertheless the result unfortunately had been that legislation on the subject this Session had also been suspended. Although he was not aware that his noble Friend was under any misapprehension as to the opinion of his right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey), he had consulted him, and he had his assurance, and was able to give that of the rest of the Government, that the attention of the Government would continue to be devoted to this subject, and, with the assistance of the Church in the Colony, he was not without hopes that at the commencement of the next Session a Bill would be introduced which would meet the objections which had been raised against former measures, which were, he understood, rather objections of form than of substance.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN

Message from HER MAJESTY, brought up, and read by Mr. Speaker, as follows (all the Members being uncovered)—

“VICTORIA R.

“Her Majesty, deeming it expedient to provide for any additional expense which may arise in consequence of the War in which Her Majesty is now engaged against the Emperor of Russia, and relying on the experienced zeal and affection of Her faithful Commons, trusts they will make provision accordingly.

“V. R.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move that Her Majesty's most gracious Message be referred to the Committee of Supply. The Committee of Supply stands for this evening, but I apprehend it is perfectly well understood that Her Majesty's Message will be taken into consideration on Monday evening next.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, with respect to this side of the House, I am sure I may say that there is every disposition to vote any aid that Her Majesty may require, in order to carry on the war with vigour, spirit, and energy. As I understand, the House will have to take Her Majesty's Royal Message into consideration on Monday next, when I not only hope and trust, but indeed I suppose, Her Majesty's Ministers will be enabled to assure the House that in the present state of affairs there will be an autumnal Session.

Message referred to the Committee of Supply.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

Order read for considering the Bill as amended.

MR. LIDDELL said, he would beg to move to insert, instead of Clause A, Section 10, the Clause of which he had given notice.

Clause (If any person shall, either during any election of a Member to serve in Parliament, or within six calendar months previous to such election, or within fourteen days after it shall have been completed, be employed at such election as counsel, agent, attorney, poll clerk, flag-man, or in any other capacity, for the purposes of such election, and shall at any time, either before, during, or after such election, accept or take from any such candidate or candidates, or from any person whatsoever, for or in consideration of or with reference to such employment, any sum or sums of money, retaining fee, office, place, or employment, or any promise or security for any sum or sums of money, retaining fee, office, place, or employment, such person shall be deemed incapable of voting at such election, and his vote, if given, shall be utterly void and of none effect, and shall render him liable to forfeit the sum of fifty pounds to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit), brought up, and read 1^o.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he did not propose to offer any opposition to his hon. Friend's clause. He believed there were only two questions which might lead to much difference of opinion—one of which was the vexata quæstio as to whether there should be an allowance for refreshment expenses, with respect to which a clause would be introduced when the present was disposed of; the other question arose out of an Amendment which was to be moved. As far as the other Amendments were concerned, they were rather Amendments to other clauses, than as asserting any new or disputed principle; and he would suggest that this, as well as those relating to allowances for refreshments and travelling expenses, be taken on the recommittal of the Bill, and that at the present stage they should dispose only of those Amendments which were unopposed.

MR. HILDYARD said, he considered this another instance of the anxiety of some hon. Members to import 50*l.* penalties into every clause. By the present clause, persons acting as special constables would be liable to a penalty, and when he mentioned that to the hon. Member for Liverpool, he told him that that would be rectified by another clause, which, on examination, did not effect the object.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the question was, whether or not they would adopt the clause of the hon. Member. At present, although persons coming under the description there given were restricted from voting at an election, it was notorious that such persons did vote, and, as no remuneration ought to be given to a voter, it was obvious some alteration of the law was required; the Select Committee were of opinion that no person who was an elector should be employed in any capacity. With regard to special constables, they were persons employed by the mayors or returning officers at elections, merely for the purpose of keeping the peace.

MR. SPOONER said, he considered that the clause would prevent all persons who were employed at elections as poll clerks, or in any similar capacity, under the direction of the sheriffs or returning officers, from exercising the right of voting, and would also subject them to penalties. He thought it was desirable that such a clause should receive more full discussion than could take place in the House, and, with that view, he would move that the Bill be recommitted.

MR. SPEAKER said, that such a Motion could not be made until the clause now before the House was disposed of.

MR. BANKES said, he was astonished by the proposition which should make voters subject to a penalty of 50*l.*, which might come upon them as a surprise. He thought the Bill required very full consideration, and he regretted the readiness with which the noble Lord's proposition to take Amendments and additional clauses had been acceded to last night. He feared they might by this compliance allow legislation to proceed at a dangerous speed. He did not particularly wish the Bill to be recommitted if the noble Lord could point out any other way by which the object of the Motion could be attained.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he understood the right hon. Member did not object to the whole clause, but only to a part of it. He thought the best course would be to pass the clause, and move that the words be omitted.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, that on his side of the House it was thought that there was an understanding that the Bill was to be recommitted, and on that understanding he withdrew his Motion last night. He called on the noble Lord to act according to that understanding.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must deny that there was any such understanding; what he had proposed was, to take the report of the Bill that evening.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was under the same impression as his noble Friend behind him, and he urged on the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) whether it would not be better to allow the Bill to be recommitted.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) wanted to have a long talk over another clause, and that was why he wished to make the Motion for recommitment. Gentlemen opposite knew perfectly well that unless the Bill was reported to-night it could not become law this Session, on account of the Standing Order of the other House, and the whole of this proposition was for the defeat of the Bill. There was evidently a great unwillingness to part with the system of bribery and corruption to which so many of them owed their seats in that House.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, it was all very well for the hon. Member for Lambeth, who had said he was the only pure person in the House, to say "put an end to bribery;" but the real question was the passing of a good Bill. The House of Lords, in their Standing Order, said they would not read any Bill a second time after the 25th of July, unless in case of emergency; and this was a Bill which might fairly come under the exception, and ought to be considered so by the other House. It was not the fact that if it was not reported to-night it could not go up to the Lords in sufficient time. It could be sent up in time, but still it ought to be thoroughly discussed, and that could only be done by its being recommitted. The Bill had been reprinted, and put wet into their hands as they came into the House, and there had been no opportunity of considering it in its present form. Explanations of the clauses could only be given in Committee, and he therefore urged his noble Friend to consider only the perfection of the Bill and to consent to its recommitment.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL begged in the first place to state that he had never said a word against the recommitment of the Bill. All he had said was that he did not consent last night to that course. If by the recommitment they were to argue all the questions raised on the Bill over again, as if they knew nothing of what had been done in the last six days, he thought the Bill ought not to be recommitted; but if it was intended by the recommitment merely to make the discussion of the new clauses more easy, and it was conducted with such despatch as to enable the Bill to be reported to-morrow, he had no objection to the recommitment, and the clause now under discussion might be withdrawn and brought on again in Committee.

MR. LIDDELL said, he would withdraw the clause, in order that the Motion might be made for recommitting the Bill.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD HOTHAM said, he thought the hon. Member for Lambeth ought to be content with explaining the grounds of his own vote, without imputing motives to others, who were quite as free as himself. The hon. Member had accused them on that side of making a number of long and unnecessary speeches. The hon. Member had probably had an opportunity in Committee of saying his say. At all events the hon. Member ought to have been the last person who should have made such a charge; for no one made more long-winded harangues than the hon. Member was in the habit of doing on questions within his peculiar province.

Order for recommitting the Bill read.
House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 9 agreed to.

Clause 10.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that this clause rendered it illegal for candidates to give cockades to voters at elections, but it left entirely untouched the more important question which had been alluded to in the course of the discussion with reference to the expenditure for chairing, bands of music, flags, and banners. He proposed, therefore, to add to the clause words which would prevent that expenditure.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

"And all payments made for or on account of any chairing, or any bands of music, or flags or banners, shall be deemed illegal payments within this Act."

Sir G. Grey

MR. NEWDEGATE said he should oppose the proposition, on the ground that hereafter it would have a tendency, together with other enactments in the Bill, to give to elections the appearance of funerals. He thought that music and flags at elections were but the natural expressions of good humour and hilarity on the part of the people, and he should be sorry to see such ceremonies conducted, as in America, in sober silence and in a virulently factious spirit.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he should be glad to know what would be the effect of these words?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that the effect of them would be that the candidate could not lawfully make any such payments, either before, after, or during the election. He had introduced the Amendment principally at the suggestion of hon. Members behind him.

MR. IRTON said, he would suggest that, to complete the thing, the hon. and learned Gentleman had better include the ringing of bells.

LORD HOTHAM said, he, for one, should oppose the introduction of the proposed words, as being, in his opinion, worse than unnecessary.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that no doubt large sums of money might be spent in an objectionable manner for music, flags, and chairing at elections; but he had doubts whether the words did not go too far.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not withdraw the words. He spoke from experience when he said that fights were often occasioned by the meeting of the rival bands.

MR. WALPOLE said, he would remind his hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly) that this proposition had been deliberately discussed in the House last year, and rejected; and after that he thought it should not have been renewed without notice, seeing that it took the Committee rather by surprise.

MR. ROUNDELL PALMER said, he should support the Amendment, seeing that in the borough which he represented bands of music and banners had been dispensed with at the last election at the express wish of the authorities, on the ground that on previous occasions they had ever more or less led to the disturbance of the public peace.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, his experience had led him to the conclusion that the breaches of the peace at elections ascribed to bands of music were referable, in almost every case, not to the conduct of the men employed in the bands, but to that of the people usually employed to protect the bandsmen on either side.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to know whether the Amendment was intended to apply to the purely spontaneous welcome in the shape of music which the people often gave to a candidate? For example, he might mention that in almost every one of the colliery villages in Northumberland and Durham the miners had a band of music, which, at election times, always turned out to welcome the candidates on either side. What he desired to know was, whether such men would be liable to penalties, because, now and then, they might be found playing a cheerful strain at an election?

MR. BOOKER said, he objected to the Amendment, and also to the clause itself, expressly on the ground that they were meant to suppress the ebullition of party feelings at elections. He thought party feeling was of the very essence of our political constitution. The present Ministry were attempting to carry on the Government without party feeling, and see what was the result.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he thought it was due to the importance of this subject that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) should have given notice of his Amendment. He hoped, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman would now withdraw his Amendment; for he (Mr. V. Smith) did not think they had any right to put down all the old ladies' music parties in a town during an election.

MR. VANCE said, he had taken part in elections in Ireland, where, by an old Act, music and flags and banners were prohibited, and in England, where these manifestations of popular feeling were permitted; and he had no hesitation in saying, that music appeared to him decidedly more calculated to produce good humour and order than was the absence of music.

MR. MANGLES said, at the last election for Guildford a tremendous riot arose out of the use of bands, which led to the serious maltreatment of the police, some of whom were left on the field almost for dead. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not give up his Amendment; with regard to "chairing," it was a most fruitful source of bribery, corruption, and confusion.

MR. IRTON thought it would be better to put down bludgeons rather than chairs.

MR. HILDYARD said, he would remind the Committee that they had some experience to go upon in this matter. In Ireland, bands were not allowed, in England they were, and yet in Ireland there was no end to rows and riots during contested elections.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, he thought that if the opposing candidates agreed on all occasions to have only one band, there would be an end of the fighting.

MR. E. BALL said, his experience had taught him that the employment of bands of music at elections was a frightful source of bitterness and dissension, and he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would have the courage to persevere with his Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 106; Noes 57: Majority 49.

Words added to the Clause, which was ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 11 to 14 agreed to.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he would now beg to move the insertion of the following additional Clause—

"Be it further enacted, that, after the passing of this Act, no returning officer, or whom he may appoint, shall permit, after a poll is once opened, any candidate or other person on his behalf, under any pretence, or in any capacity whatsoever, to be present within or about the hustings or booth where such poll is proceeding, any law, custom, or practice to the contrary notwithstanding."

He did not mean to say this clause would be so effective as the ballot in the prevention of intimidation, but he believed that, next to the ballot, it would assist the freedom of action on the part of the voter. He thought no one whatever ought to interfere between the voter and the returning officer. Under the present system, the agent of the candidate, or of the landlord, was in the polling booth, and the elector was either thanked for his vote, or, if he had not voted on the side he was wanted to support, he was put down in the black book at once. The provision he suggested would make the Bill more effective, and would be well worth a trial.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to know how any returning officer, or any one appointed by him, could refuse permission to persons who claimed to be present, and with what authority the hon. Member for Finsbury would arm him? But, setting this aside, one very substantial objection to the hon. Member's proposition arose out of an abuse which prevailed at contested elections, more particularly in seaport towns—namely, the personation of voters. The law now enabled, and almost enjoined, the candidates to appoint persons to verify the identity of those who came to poll. If there was no one in the booth besides the returning officer, or his representative, to speak to the identity of persons who came to give their votes, how were these frauds to be discovered?

MR. ELLIOT said, he would point out, as an additional objection to the proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. T. Duncombe), that many would-be voters were disqualified, and had to be objected to at the time when they presented themselves. Besides this, in preventing the attendance of other persons, you took away a check upon the polling clerk himself, who certainly required as much check as anybody.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there were strong and insuperable objections to the Motion. Many of these poll clerks, if left quite to themselves, being most likely friends of one or other of the candidates, would communicate to that candidate how the election was going on, while the other party might be left in ignorance on the subject.

LORD HOTHAM said, the effect of the words would be to prevent even the candidate and his friends from attending at the poll to give their votes.

MR. BANKES said, that referring generally to the Bill, he saw clearly that the consequence of its passing would be to introduce a new kind of voting. We must come very soon throughout the country to the parochial mode of voting. If Parliament prohibited, so strictly as it proposed to do, the payment of travelling expenses and a reasonable sum for refreshments, it was not to be supposed that in a county election, for example, a man, in addition to the forfeiture of a day's wages, would walk many miles to a polling booth, and then return home without any refreshment whatever. This would render necessary a system of parochial voting like that which existed for poor law guardians.

Clause 16 (Appointment of an Auditor of Election Expenses).

SIR FITZROY KELLY proposed that the clause should be omitted, for the purpose of substituting a clause providing that the election officer should be appointed once every year in the month of August, and that he should be reappointed as often as the returning officer should think fit; and also containing a declaration to be made by every election officer so appointed, any act contrary to such declaration being considered a misdemeanor. As he understood that the hon. Member for Newark (Mr. G. Vernon) intended to propose some Amendments to the clause which he wished to insert, he would suggest to him, when the subject came under discussion, to move the omission of the words "once in every year, in the month of August."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would also suggest that the clause should be struck out, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman should bring up the new clause at a subsequent stage.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that the Committee had decided that the election officer should be appointed by the returning officer; but when the hon. and learned Member (Sir F. Kelly) brought up the new clause, it was his intention to move that the appointment be made by the county court judge.

Clause struck out.

Clauses 17 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 24 (No person to pay expenses of Elections except to Candidate or Election Officer).

SIR FITZROY KELLY proposed the following proviso—

"Provided that, if, upon the trial of any action for recovering any such penalty or penalties, it shall appear to the Judge who tries the same that any such payment shall have been made, or agreed to be made, by inadvertence, and without any corrupt or improper intention, such Judge may, if he shall think fit, reduce such penalty or penalties to any sum not less than 40s."

MR. HILDYARD said, that few payments were made inadvertently, whether the intention was improper or not. He would suggest, therefore, that the words "by inadvertence and" should be omitted.

Words. "by inadvertence and" were accordingly struck out, and the proviso, as amended, was ordered to stand part of the clause.

MR. HILDYARD said, the Bill authorised actions to any extent by men of straw. When party feeling rose high, a large number would be brought unless they took some steps to protect the parties liable to be harassed by them. The hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) had told them it would be impossible to frame a clause to protect innocent men against every pettifogging vagabond that might bring an action; if that was so, he hoped the House would pause before it accepted the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he willingly admitted that it was most desirable to protect those who acted from inadvertence, but as the House had laid down the principle that all payments should be made in one way, namely, through the hands of the election officer, it was necessary, in order to enforce the rule, that a penalty should be inflicted on all who transgressed, no matter how inadvertently.

MR. HILDYARD said, he should repeat his complaint, that by this Bill, as it now stood, men who never transgressed the law might be sued by pettifogging vagabonds, and subscriptions might be raised for the purpose when party feeling ran high; yet the innocent man was afforded no means of getting his costs from the man of straw, who might sue him. The Bill, he maintained, was capable of being perverted to the very worst purposes.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had already stated to his hon. Friend that he considered it would be impossible to frame a clause to give costs to a defendant who had innocently violated the Act. In all cases where a penal action was given at the suit of a common informer, parties were liable to vexatious actions, but the evil could not be remedied. He would, however, on bringing up the report, propose a clause to the effect—

"That in any action under this clause a Judge in chambers might, if he thought fit, order the plaintiff to give security for costs."

He would now beg to move an addition to the clause relative to expenditure.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, to add at the end of the Clause the words—

"Provided also, and be it Declared and Enacted, That no expenses of or relating to the registration of Electors, and no subscriptions or contributions bonâ fide made to or for any public or charitable purpose, shall be deemed Election expenses within the meaning of this Act."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, such a clause would be a most excellent addition to the Bill, and he would give it his most cordial support; but he was opposed to the proviso now proposed to be added to the Bill, which he considered would be very mischievous. If they meant to say that they would have a permanent officer, and that all election expenses should be paid through that officer, he thought they would be doing great good, but if registration expenses and subscriptions and contributions to public or private or charitable purposes were to be taken out of the category of election expenses, it would open the door to gross corruption. He thought the House of Commons would do a great deal better if they were to put an end to the payment of contributions of every description whatsoever.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought that the opinion expressed by the Attorney General would interpose a serious stumbling-block in the way of the declaration which it was proposed Members should take. According to the hon. and learned Gentleman's interpretation of the Bill, all contributions which Gentlemen might make to charities or to defray the costs of registration would be election expenses, and must be paid through the election officer.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, he had also heard the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman with astonishment and dismay. In the whole course of the discussion such an interpretation had not been put on the words "election expenses." If it were to be adopted, no man of honour could take the declaration. He had agreed to the clause containing it, because he felt that it would be easy for him to distinguish in his own mind between those expenses which were connected with the election and those arising out of his general connection with the town or county he might represent. If this interpretation was to be adopted, he hoped the House would reject not only the declaration, but the Bill itself:

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that payments on account of registration expenses were clearly within the words of several clauses of the Bill. He could not object to public contributions to charitable purposes, but to retain the word "private" in the clause would, in his opinion, open the door to the most wide-spread corruption.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he did not hesitate to assert that contributions to the expenses of registration in any county or borough were not election expenses at all. If they considered what the expenses of registration were, the hon. and learned Attorney General must himself admit that they could not be considered in any sense of the word election expenses. In many cases they were paid by the country gentlemen, and he should view with great alarm any attempt to make them election expenses, inasmuch as, although the election might not take place for five years, all the payments made during these five years might be set down as election expenses paid by the candidate. He had introduced the word "reasonable" before the word expenses, and he thought that would meet the objections that had been raised, and that the Committee would agree that they could not be considered in any sense of the word election expenses within the meaning of the Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL had no objection to allow the word "reasonable" to be introduced; but he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not object to strike out the words "or private."

MR. GEACH said, he would call upon the Committee to observe how this Bill would work from an incident which had occurred to himself within a day or two. A man in great distress called upon him, and he gave him a small sum to save him from starvation and help him on his road home. This he did without the slightest reference to election considerations; but at the same time the man would never have come to him, nor would he have relieved the man, if he (Mr. Geach) had not been Member for Coventry. [Laughter.] Any gentleman would have done as he did, and he did not envy the feelings of the man who would avail himself of a Bill like this to drive a starving fellow-creature from his door. The Bill was a perfect absurdity, and ought not to be suffered to pass.

MR. HEADLAM said, the observations of the hon. and learned Gentlemen on either side of the House had created a great deal of doubt in his mind. It was difficult to define what were reasonable and what were unreasonable expenses. He feared the result of the proviso would be to involve the whole question in doubt and uncertainty.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he did not agree with the hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Geach) as to the absurdity of the Bill. He feared, however, they were now falling into a pedantic purity which would defeat its own object. In his own case, he subscribed to every public and private charity of the town, and he would continue to do so, whatever the law was.

The Attorney General

How was he to discriminate between his contributions as a country gentleman and his contributions as the Member for Northampton? The hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk said registration expenses were not election expenses, if they were not, they were, at all events, the expenses that won the election. The late Sir Robert Peel recommended to his followers to "Register! register! register!" and here was now his law officer saying they were not election expenses. He believed no one could define what were reasonable, and what were unreasonable expenses. After these niceties, no man of sense would think of signing the declaration.

MR. HILDYARD said, the Committee, by the course it had adopted, was attempting to do more than it could hope to effect. They were in the ridiculous position of the boy in Esop's fable, who got his hands into a narrow-necked jar filled with filberts, and could not draw it back. There were good suggestions in the Bill, which might be usefully acted upon if they were divested of a great deal of the minuteness with which they were surrounded. He was convinced, however, that the measure ought not to be sent up to the House of Lords in its present shape this Session. It required more consideration than there was time to give it. Great good had certainly resulted from its introduction; but he trusted that the Government, seeing the objections made to it from all sides of the House, would consider whether it was possible to send it up to the other House this Session in a shape to do the House of Commons any credit.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he could not certainly deny that, if they attempted to define everything that was meant by bribery, they would get into difficulties; but he did not think they were showing too great harshness in the manner in which they were endeavouring to deal with it by this Bill. The great difficulty was in defining those cases which did not come within the term "bribery." Happily, there were already laws against bribery, for, if there were not, he should not be very sanguine that a great part of that House would ever consent to impose any penalties at all upon it. But penalties were imposed by existing laws more severe in some respects than those imposed in the early clauses of this Bill. For instance, the law was relaxed with respect to the giving of money to persons for a vote. But the difficulty in the present instance arose solely from

Gentlemen ingeniously raising a vast number of cases—which they might just as well raise with reference to the existing law—as to whether certain things were or were not bribery—cases which were some of them just upon the narrow confines of that which was and that which was not perfectly pure, and which the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk had attempted to define. He did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman was attempting to press too severely, although he might be attempting to define too narrowly; but, at the same time, these difficulties having been raised, he quite agreed in the necessity for the proviso, leaving out the words "for any private purpose." It was quite clear that the case mentioned by the hon. Member for Coventry would come under the definition of a charitable purpose, and that subscriptions to racing and matters of that kind were public purposes. If a gentleman had obtained such a character for hospitality in the county in which he lived that all his neighbours wished him to be a Member for that county, the expenses which he incurred were not election expenses, nor had they been incurred with a view to his election, although his election had been carried in consequence of the character which by means of them he had obtained. No one could say they were corrupt expenses, or that they had been incurred for the purpose of securing his election; but, at the same time, there was great difficulty in defining each particular case in the Bill. The Bill had passed through the ordeal of a Select Committee, in which all these points had been discussed by the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole), and by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General; and he could not think that the result of their labours had been a parcel of absurdities. But when hon. Gentlemen said that every case ought to be defined precisely and accurately, it was evident that they could easily imagine cases to which no language could apply. He was quite ready to vote, at least, for this proviso, and it would be time to consider the other propositions when they came before the Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, the noble Lord had not put the case at all fairly. It was not a question of bribery, but as to a declaration that Members had not spent anything in expenses of elections except in certain specified instances. Then, on this the inquiry had been naturally made whether expenses of charities, &c., came within the terms of the declaration? The hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk had told them, with reference to the declaration they were to be called upon to make, that registration expenses could not be considered election expenses, while they had since been informed by the hon. and learned Attorney General that in his opinion they were election expenses. After these different statements from two such high authorities, in what position was a candidate placed who was called upon to make the declaration? It was very common for Members to subscribe a guinea or two to a registration fund, but the professional gentlemen employed considered that they had a right to expect to be retained in the conduct of the elections. This was an instance of the difficult questions which would arise. So again as to charities—the question of what was reasonable would prove impracticable. The hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk proposed a proviso to remedy the declaration plan, and then the noble Lord the Lord President declared that the attempt to define was impossible. But how could parties take so unintelligible a declaration? Whether it was worth while to go muddling on it was not for him to decide, but for those who had the conduct of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought the difficulties raised as to the declaration were solved by the proviso of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly). It was quite clear they all desired to compel the payment of election expenses through particular channels; but then it was said there were certain classes of which it was difficult to say whether they ranged themselves under the head of election expenses or not, and they divided themselves into three sorts—registration expenses, public contributions, and charitable contributions. That he believed embraced the whole category, and the right hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. V. Smith), who seemed the most strenuous opponent of the stringent provisions of the Bill, although a Member of the Select Committee, could discover no such description of expenses which were not included in that division. Those three classes were provided against by the enactment of his hon. and learned Friend. The Bill, as originally framed, contemplated that the election officer should be appointed for the purpose of a particular election, and should not go beyond the expenses of that election. When the provision was introduced making him a permanent instead of a changeable officer, it struck him that, as under the head of registration there might be colourable and corrupt expenses, it would be very desirable to have that particular expense passed through the election officer. If it was thought better to introduce a proviso regarding registration expenses, it was perfectly clear the enacting that registration expenses formed no part of election expenses would relieve candidates of any difficulty on that point in making the declaration. The other two heads, public purposes and charitable purposes, were both included in this provision, and, therefore, the candidate would be also relieved as to them, because the Act would explain in the clearest terms that neither public purposes nor charitable purposes were included in the declaration. The category was exhausted. All three classes were provided for. His great objection to this clause was, that under the vague and ambiguous words "or for any private purpose" they were using a term, under which any species of corruption might have been introduced, but if these words were struck out, and the exceptions were limited to registration expenses, and to bonâ fide and reasonable subscriptions to charitable or public purposes, he then considered that they should meet every case which it had been suggested as proper to exclude from election expenses, and, at the same time, they would shut the door on corrupt practices. It had been said that the introduction of the word "reasonable" would create a difficulty; he had, however, no objection that the word should not be inserted, as the law would always imply that such payments must be reasonable. It had been said that it would be difficult for Members, in making their declarations, to say whether such subscriptions or payments had been reasonable; but he thought that it was impossible for this difficulty to arise, as no hon. Member could say that he did not know whether such expenditure had been bonâ fide for public and charitable purposes, or whether for the purposes of corruption. If they were determined to throw obstacles in the way of the passing of this Bill, by raising difficulties as to the most important part of it—the declaration required from hon. Members—the ingenuity of man might do anything. He hoped it would not be said that lawyers brought lax consciences to this subject, for he believed that when the declaration was trenched round by the present proviso, no difficulty would arise in making it. The election officer being permanent, he should have preferred to have brought the subject of registration under his cognisance; but if that was not the opinion of the Committee, then this clause relieved them of all ambiguity.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, difficulties were forced upon the Committee, and by no person more than by the Attorney General. The result of this discussion would probably be fatal to the Bill, and if it were, it would be owing almost entirely to the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman had commenced the discussion by opposing the proviso of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly), and now eagerly resorted to it, in order to escape the difficulties of his own construction of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not denied that without the proviso the declaration would include charitable contributions, and for his own part he (Sir J. Pakington) hoped that in its present form it would not pass. He and his Friends were seriously anxious to repress bribery, and believed that the Bill would tend to that object; but it must not be carried too far or it would defeat the object, and in his opinion, if the law of the Attorney General were accepted, it would be impossible to pass the Bill.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, it was too much cookery which had created the difficulty. The Bill was aimed against corrupt, and not against innocent acts, and the first sixteen sections amply provided against corruption. This proviso was not only unnecessary, but positively mischievous, because, by stating that certain reasonable expenses were not election expenses, it implied that if those expenses were unreasonable they then became election expenses. The previous clauses provided against unreasonable expenses for registration, or public or charitable purposes, and therefore the proviso was unnecessary. It did not render the Bill a bit clearer, but, on the contrary, if it declared contributions for private purposes legal, it would wholly vitiate their legislation.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would suggest that the clause should be adopted exactly as it was printed, without the word reasonable, in order to obviate the objection which some hon. Gentlemen had raised, that if that word were retained unreasonable expenses on registration might be deemed election expenses, whereas reasonable expenses would not be. He had before stated his opinion that he did not think the clause was required, as it merely amounted to a declaration of what he believed to be the law already; but inasmuch as doubts had been suggested, he thought it was as well to remove those doubts by introducing it.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, his objection to this proviso was, that it would, to some extent, and under certain forms, legalise bribery. He felt called upon to defend his conduct in reference to the Bill both in the Committee and in the House from the observations made by the hon. and learned Attorney General, and he must declare that there was no hon. Member more sincere in his desire to suppress bribery than he was; he must also complain that the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) should have said that, if there were not a law against bribery already, he should have despaired of being able to carry one.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he believed that, throughout the discussions on this Bill, a majority of the Members of that House had shown themselves anxious to put down bribery; but he thought there were some Members who had made so many difficulties, that he had said, with respect to them, that if there had not existed a law against bribery, he should have despaired of inducing them to agree to one.

The question that the words "or private" be struck out was then put and agreed to.

LORD SEYMOUR said, it appeared to him that the whole force of the declaration depended on the terms of the proviso. If they were to make a solemn declaration, they could not, in his opinion, be too minute or careful in marking the sense in which they were to make it, and he thought it was not fitting that the noble Lord the leader of the House, in answer to such an inquiry, should tell them not to be too particular or too precise about the meaning of the words. The difficulty of such a declaration was, that it must, almost of necessity, be either too precise or too lax. If they made it too lax, and the exceptions too large, they left almost every one out; and if they made it too precise, without any proviso at all, it was almost impossible that any man who had been long connected with any town could take it. He should like to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East

Suffolk whether, if a gentleman connected with a town, by being its representative in Parliament, but not otherwise locally interested in it, should give a donation of 1,000*l.* to a public library, that was a payment which would be fairly covered by this proviso, and which the law would consider reasonable?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had no hesitation in saying that any such payment as a contribution to a library, or to a church, or to any other salutary public purpose, would be perfectly legal.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it was necessary that he should trouble the Committee with a few words, in consequence of the observation of his noble Friend behind him (Lord Seymour), that it was not fitting that he (Lord J. Russell), when asked with respect to the declaration, should tell them that they ought not to be too precise or too minute as to the meaning of the words employed. Now, what he had said last night—and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley) had correctly interpreted his observations—was, that any declaration to be made by Members of that House ought to be intelligible, and ought to be understood by those who took it. It was quite a different question, he considered, whether they should endeavour to provide, with extreme minuteness, for every possible case that might occur. There was scarcely any form of words that could be devised with respect to which some persons might not make a difficulty. Nothing could apparently be more clear than the terms of the oath administered to witnesses in courts of justice, to tell “the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.” Yet he had heard it suggested that a witness interpreting that oath strictly, and being told by counsel to sit down when he had answered one or two questions, might refuse to leave the witness-box until he had detailed every minute particular connected with the case which was within his knowledge, because he had sworn to tell “the whole truth.” Yet such cases did not happen, because everybody understood that the obligation to tell the whole truth did not amount to an obligation to tell, at all events, every word the witness knew.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he was opposed to those subscriptions for apparently charitable objects, at a time when a candidate was seeking for the representation of a place.

MR. GOULBURN said, he wished to afford the noble Lord an opportunity of explaining the words that had just fallen from him. If he (Mr. Goulburn) understood the noble Lord aright, he said that a witness who takes an oath to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, was not bound to tell the whole of what he knew about the transaction, if he but answered the simple questions that were put to him.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the case he meant was this:—A witness having taken the usual oath, was examined in respect to transactions that had been already stated by several witnesses who had gone before him. The circumstances of the case were fully known. The counsel having asked one or two questions of this witness, was perfectly satisfied, and desired the witness to go down. But the witness, taking the literal meaning of the oath, might insist upon entering into a statement which would probably be a refutation of what had been elicited by several of the witnesses that had been examined before. Now, this he (Lord John Russell) considered would be a refinement of conscientiousness.

MR. FITZWILLIAM HUME said, he wished to ask whether the declaration would include votes given by hon. Members for the building of bridges and the repair of roads in their counties; for it was not very long since he had been canvassed by an hon. Gentleman opposite to give his vote in favour of the building of a bridge in a particular barony in the county which he represented, and it was at the same time hinted to him that, if he did not, he need not expect the support of the voters in that barony?

MR. MALINS said, he wanted to know from the hon. and learned Attorney General whether he concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) in reference to the answer which he had given to the noble Lord the Member for Totness (Lord Seymour) with respect to the sum of 1,000*l.* given as a subscription to a library in the town of which he was a Member. If that was perfectly legal, he (Mr. Malins) contended it was also legal for a candidate to do any act in the way of subscribing money that tended to secure his election. The noble Lord the Member for Totness had himself founded a mechanics' institute in the town which he represented. It was no disparagement to the noble Lord to say it was probable that he would not have founded that institution if he had not been chosen as representative of the place. Nor, on the other hand, possibly, would the electors have voted for the noble Lord if he had not subscribed for this work. In the contest in his (Mr. Malins') own borough the great difficulty he had to contend against was, that his opponent was the son of one of the richest commoners in England. The more they considered this question the more the Committee would find that they could not legislate upon those minute matters. He was exceedingly happy to find the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. V. Smith), sitting as he did on the Ministerial side of the House, so sensible of the difficulties imposed by the clause; and he trusted that the Committee would yet become so well aware of the impossibility of Gentlemen making the declaration it enjoined, that they would unanimously agree to overthrow it. He would even go further, and say that the inevitable result of the discussion with regard to the declaration must be to prevent the Bill from becoming law at all. The Bill was utterly impracticable and utterly improper. And when they had such a statement before them as that made by the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) that a subscription to the most unlimited amount given by a candidate for the purpose of providing a library, a mechanics' institute, or an almshouse, in the borough whose representation he was contesting, must be held legal, such a statement furnished so satisfactory a proof of the uncertainty attending the whole question of bribery, that he considered it became impossible to pass such a Bill as this. He would then put it at once to his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General whether he concurred in the declaration of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk that the expenditure of a sum of money for founding a charitable institution or a public library by a Member in the borough which he represented could not be considered as coming within the intent of the declaration?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, his answer was simply this—if a person representing a particular place bond fide contributed a sum of money for public purposes, that was not bribery; and to whom did it ever occur that it was? [Laughter and "oh, oh!"] It might be his fault, but he could not quite understand the meaning of that cheer; but the restriction was this—if any one contributed a sum of money with a view of influencing an election, no one could doubt that that was bribery; but if, on the other hand, it was done for the purpose of accomplishing some great public object—[cheers and laughter]*—*hon. Gentlemen cheered him, but the question put assumed the perfect bond fide nature of the contribution—the answer, then, to his hon. and learned Friend was, that if it was a contribution for a charitable purpose, made without any view of influencing the election, it would not come within the terms of the clause; and in the propriety of that he cordially concurred.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he wished to put the case of his desiring to exchange the representation of Marylebone for that of Wallingford. Suppose he thought proper, under those circumstances, to give 1,000*l.* to establish a library at Wallingford, would it not be nonsense to say that money given in that way was not intended to corrupt the electors? It was as complete bribery as any other mode.

MR. MALINS said, he would put it to the common sense of the Committee—acting upon the rule that a man's acts bespoke his motives—whether a subscription on the part of a Member to a race fund, a ball fund, or to a charitable institution in a borough which he represented, was not given with a view of retaining his seat.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 234; Noes 16: Majority 218.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 25 to 30 inclusive.

Clause 31 (Declaration of Member.)

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that the objections which he originally entertained to this declaration had assumed a tenfold force after the discussion of that evening. The whole of the debate since six o'clock had turned upon this declaration, and provisions had been introduced to make it as nearly as possible what might be swallowed by any Gentleman on entering that House. It was, however, still his impression that it was such a declaration as should not be put to a Member, and that it was calculated to produce greater evils than those it was intended to remedy. He thought it had been clearly shown that it would gradually become a mere conventional and formal declaration. It would be interpreted not to mean this thing and not to mean that; it would be taken in a sense understood amongst men of honour, and it would not have the effect intended. Although, no doubt, it might be in the first instance a stumbling-block to scrupulous persons, yet in the end it would be regarded in the same light as the oath taken by Members not to disturb a succession that no one thought of disturbing, or not to assert that which no one in their senses dreamt of asserting; or it would be treated like the declaration which was taken when it was necessary to have a freehold qualification in order to occupy a seat in that House. He believed that the same freehold had been held successively by Sir James Mackintosh, by Sir Samuel Romilly, and by Mr. Horner, and was given back by each as soon as he had taken the declaration. How could any one be willing to take a declaration which had received so many different interpretations in the course of the debate, and that, too, after the Bill had been before a Select Committee of which the most eminent lawyers in the House were Members? Why, it was clear that every man of honour must feel the greatest difficulty about the matter, and that it was only unscrupulous persons who could take it with ease. He thought, too, that the imposition of such a declaration would have a tendency to impede the administration of justice by Election Committees, since the Members of these tribunals would feel the greatest difficulty possible in deciding that a Member had been guilty of corrupt practices when he had solemnly declared that he had not. Besides, the declaration was really unnecessary, because all the acts against which it was directed had been rendered punishable by other parts of the Bill. He most decidedly objected to expose Members to such a degradation as was involved in the declaration; and he felt so strongly upon the question that he would be willing to divide the Committee against it again and again. He believed it was a fatal defect in the Bill, of which it did not originally form part, though it was now declared by the hon. and learned Attorney General to be its mainstay and prop. He believed the division taken upon this clause on the previous day was sufficiently close to justify him in taking another, and he should, therefore, now oppose the passing of the clause.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 120: Majority 8.

Clause agreed to.

The House resumed.

Committee report progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will this day, at Twelve o'clock, again resolve itself into the said Committee."

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "will" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Monday next," instead thereof.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That this House will to-morrow, at Twelve o'clock, again resolve itself into the said Committee."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "to-morrow, at Twelve o'clock," in order to insert the words "Monday next," instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words 'this day' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 144; Noes 64: Majority 80.

Main Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 132; Noes 51: Majority 81.

RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that, if the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart) persisted in pressing this Motion, he should move that the Bill be committed that day three months. The Bill related to a subject upon which considerable difference of opinion existed among Members of that House, and much discussion would consequently arise in the Committee. He therefore trusted the noble Lord would withdraw his proposal.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was quite prepared to vote for his noble Friend's Bill. He thought its principle good, being entirely in accordance with the existing law, which prohibited advances of money directly to an enemy for carrying on war against this country. The Bill provided against indirect advances, stamping them with reprobation. How far it would be practically efficient he was not prepared to say, but, at any rate, it constituted a moral demonstration exceedingly proper for the Parliament to make. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Hankey) said he objected to the principle of the Bill, and that was an objection which could be urged at another stage, and it would be inconvenient, regard being had to the Resolution of the House of Lords with reference to the second readings of Bills, to postpone this measure from day to day. He therefore trusted that the House would at once go into Committee upon the Bill.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said, he conceived that, if the present Bill was a proper measure of public policy, the Government ought to have introduced it, and informed the House of its provisions. This was a Bill to interfere, not with advances to the Emperor of Russia, contrary, as the noble Lord had said, to law, for the purpose of carrying on war against this country, but with persons living in this country in respect to their ordinary transactions. The noble Lord had not explained one single provision of the Bill, he only said that it was a moral demonstration. That moral demonstration had already been made by the notices from the different Consuls, published in newspapers, declaring that any persons taking a share in a loan issued by the Russian Government since the declaration of war would be guilty of high treason in adhering to the enemies of the country. That being so, he submitted to the House that to proceed with the Bill for the purpose of obtaining a further moral demonstration was unnecessary. He should like to hear the opinion of the hon. Secretary of the Treasury upon the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman was quite competent to give an opinion upon a question of this kind, and he (Mr. Gibson) had read a very able article upon the subject in the Economist newspaper, which he recommended every Gentleman in that House, and especially the noble Lord the Home Secretary, to peruse, for he did not think the noble Lord had read anything in reference to this matter, not even the Bill itself. He should like, he repeated, to hear the opinion of the hon. Secretary to the Treasury as to whether he thought the Bill calculated to do any good, or to prevent the Emperor of Russia in the slightest degree from carrying on war against this country. He did submit that if it were an important measure of public policy, it was not treating the House with respect for the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, who introduced the Bill, to abstain from explaining the objects of the Bill.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he was quite willing, in accordance with the wish of his right hon. Friend, to explain the objects of the Bill. His right hon. Friend had stated, with perfect truth, that the law at present was, that if any British subject should assist in making a loan to the Emperor of Russia during the war he would be guilty of high treason. But it was of no use to make such an enactment if persons were allowed to buy or sell scrip of any loan guaranteed by the Russian Government. A contractor of a loan did not himself supply the whole of the money, nor anything like it; but he sold what was called scrip to other persons, who, in fact, were the parties who supplied the money to the borrowing Government. Now, if any person could sell or buy scrip with impunity, it would be very easy for Russia to obtain a loan. By enacting, however, that it should be unlawful for any British subject to deal with those securities, the effect would be to check these loans, for the contractors, knowing that fact, would not touch a loan under such circumstances, and a great difficulty would be thus thrown in the way of Russia raising money by that mode. He apprehended that one of the great difficulties with which Russia had to contend was in obtaining money. She required money for maintaining her army, for the purposes of corruption, and for exciting rebellion in other countries. It was probable, if such a Bill as this should be made law in this country, that a similar measure would be adopted in France. England and France were the only countries, with the exception of Holland, that were rich enough to lend money; it would be exceedingly difficult, therefore, for Russia to obtain a loan. He should have thought that this mode of dealing with Russia would have been one which would have recommended itself to the peace party to which the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) belonged, because it was a mode of encountering Russia which was bloodless. You sacrificed no life, you shed no blood, but you prevented Russia from carrying on the war. The House would remember the memorable speech of the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden), in which he spoke of crumpling up Russia like a sheet of paper. All he (Lord D. Stuart) asked him now to do was to crumple up the scrip of Russia. His hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding had told him that, if he were present in the House when this Bill was brought forward, he would give it his support. He believed the Bill to be a good Bill, and calculated to effect the purpose he had in view, and he hoped the House would permit it to pass through Committee.

Mr. J. WILSON said, as his right hon. Friend (Mr. Milner Gibson) had appealed to him unexpectedly upon this subject, he could not refrain addressing a few observations to the House. His right hon. Friend had referred to certain sources of enlightenment to which he had had access, but as the nature of those sources were not known to him (Mr. Wilson) his right hon. Friend possessed an advantage of which he could not boast. When, some two years ago, the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) made the speech which had been alluded to by the noble Lord (Lord Stuart), he very much agreed with him as to the crippling of the power of Russia by crumpling Russia up. He did not, however, agree with the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that they would be crippling Russia by any Act passed in that House, to the effect of the one now before them. He believed, on the contrary, that they would be exposing themselves to the contemptuous remarks of all persons connected with the money markets of Europe, who knew practically the operations of these loans. An Act to deter certain parties from taking part in these loans might be very easily evaded by employing agents at Holland and elsewhere. The Emperor of Russia himself held a very large quantity of stock, created anterior to the war; therefore it would only be for the English capitalist to buy that stock directly from the Emperor of Russia, in order to contribute to the Russian exchequer. But suppose they were to interdict this particular part of the Russian debt from being dealt with in the English market, it was clear they might thereby reduce the price of the stock in the market; but that would only be giving a premium to the capitalists in other countries to buy it up. The English capitalist would hold the Russian anterior debt, and the Dutch would hold the new debt, and all that would be done in the market would be simply a transfer of stock. He was bound to state that he thought any legislation of this kind, so far from accomplishing its object, was calculated to bring the House into disrespect, and was discreditable to the Legislature.

Mr. I. BUTT said, he would suggest that the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone should postpone the discussion to another day, as it was quite obvious the subject must undergo a serious debate. If the argument of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilson) was worth anything, then the law was wrong which made it high treason to contribute directly to the aid of the Russian exchequer. This Bill appeared to him to be simply intended to give effect to what was now the unquestioned law in cases in which that law might now be evaded.

Mr. BRIGHT said, he objected to the Bill on the ground that it was entirely useless. If that fact were not known before, it must be quite evident, after the convincing speech of the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Wilson). The effect of the Bill would be to injure our own subjects, without being in any way detrimental to Russia. In passing this Bill our conduct would resemble that of the Irishman, who, being offended with a bank, revenged himself by burning its notes which he had in his possession. At any rate it was impossible to go on with the Bill after such a difference of opinion had prevailed respecting it between the Secretary for the Home Department and the Secretary for the Treasury. It was necessary for the Government to have a conference on the Bill before they invited the House to pass it. The measure was called a moral demonstration; but the Emperor of Russia was not a man to care much about moral demonstrations. The Bill was only another of the many claptraps which were palmed off upon the people of this country with reference to this question. The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone had what was called "a bee in his bonnet" with regard to Russia, and thought everything fair that was directed against that Power. The noble Lord was a supporter of the noble Home Secretary, and the latter, with the fidelity which he always showed to those who supported him—and for which he (Mr. Bright) admired him—felt it necessary, without having examined the Bill, or believing that it would be of the least service, to ask the House to pass it. The measure would only raise a smile on the countenance of the Emperor of Russia, if, under existing circumstances, he could force a smile.

Mr. HENLEY said, he was inclined to believe that the Bill was only moonshine; but it involved considerations of great importance, with which the Government alone ought to deal. The Government, however, now stood in a rather inconvenient position as regarded the measure; for while the noble Lord the Home Secretary, on the one hand, called upon the House to pass it on grounds of high policy, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury had condemned it in the strongest terms. Under these circumstances, it was impossible to proceed with the Bill at present, and it should be postponed until the Government had come to a decision upon it.

MR. CAIRNS said, he also thought that further proceedings in respect to the Bill should be postponed until the Government had held a conference upon the difference of opinion manifested by the Home Secretary and the Secretary for the Treasury. This brief discussion, important in many respects, had elicited a remarkable admission from the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), namely, that moral demonstrations were useless, and that it was time something substantial should be done.

MR. WILKINSON said, he must express his disapprobation of the Bill, and should move, as an Amendment, that it be committed on that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, that in defending the Bill, he must admit that, after what had passed, it was necessary to postpone it, and he therefore moved that the debate be adjourned to Monday.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

SALE OF BEER, &c., BILL.

Order for Third Reading read,

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he could not altogether approve of this Bill, because he thought it would prevent the comfort of the working classes when they were taking their recreation and pleasure by excursion trains on Sundays. By this Bill, when an excursion train lauded its visitors after one o'clock on Sunday, it would be impossible for them to obtain any refreshment, for if they ordered dinner, by the time it was got ready two o'clock would arrive, and then they would all be turned out, whatever the weather might be. Was the piety of the age so extreme that persons were not to be able to obtain needful refreshment on Sundays? If so, why did they not legislate for the rich as they did for the poor? Why did they not close the clubhouses of the rich on Sunday, and prevent them from going to Greenwich to eat whitebait, or to Richmond to eat turtle and venison? It was said that travellers were exempted from the operation of this Bill, but the magistrates had come to the decision that pleasure seekers were not travellers under the Statute, and if this Bill passed, every man who went out of town on a Sunday must go with a knapsack on his back. Such legislation was not to be tolerated. A vast number of persons were of opinion that, after the due observance of the Sabbath, the more recreation there was for the working classes the better it was for them and their morals. He believed that excursion trains, instead of promoting drunkenness, acted as a check upon intemperance. It was a mistake to suppose that there was more drunkenness on Sundays than on any other day. Inquiries had been made in nine of the largest cities in the kingdom as to the number of charges of drunkenness on Whit Sunday, and it was found that not more than thirty-four persons were charged with drunkenness out of a population of 1,000,000, being only 1 in 30,000. He could not, therefore, consent to a measure which proposed to inflict so much injustice on the community.

MR. WILSON PATTEN said, if it could be shown that the Bill bore unequally on the poor he would at once withdraw it; but he must assert that it would have no such effect. It would bear equally on all classes, and in no way interfere with the rational amusements and recreations of the people. He had, at the request of persons engaged in the trade, added an hour to the period during which publicans could keep open on Sunday, namely, ten instead of nine o'clock, and he believed with that concession they were perfectly satisfied. He believed that the Bill would not interfere with rational amusements, or prevent the working people from availing themselves of the cheap excursion trains in any way, while at the same time he felt certain it would prevent a great deal of immorality and vice.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, that the alteration of the hour from nine o'clock to ten did not at all meet his objection to the Bill.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he could state that this legislation sprang from the poor, and it was at their request that the House was now asked to pass this Bill. He believed that if the Bill went further, and closed public-houses and beer-shops during the whole of Sundays, it would meet with the acquiescence of all the respectable and intelligent portion of the working classes.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he would not support this Bill if it were legislation of a partial description. The hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) quite misunderstood the Bill, for if it passed, neither the rich nor the poor would be able to remain in taverns and public-houses after a certain hour on Sundays. He believed that it would be the desire of the poor that the public-houses should be still further limited in their hours, if not altogether closed, on Sundays. In Scotland all public-houses were closed during the entire Sunday, and the result was excellent; for there had been a most material diminution in the number of persons who were charged with drunkenness on Sundays, and the aspect of the larger towns was completely changed.

MR. BANKES said, he only doubted whether this Bill went far enough. There was a strong feeling out of doors in favour of this Bill. It was, indeed, the only subject upon which the public had manifested a unanimous opinion during the present Session.

MR. W. J. FOX said, that the concession of an extra hour at night was no concession to the parties for whom the hon. Member for Bristol had put in a plea. Those persons were not those who wished to sit in a public-house an hour longer at night, but who wished, when they availed themselves of the opportunity which the excursion trains afforded them for enjoying the country air, to obtain that refreshment of which they stood in need.

MR. HENLEY said, he was glad that this Bill was likely to become law. He thought that persons who were going out by excursion trains were travellers in every proper sense of the word, and he could not conceive that any magistrate would levy penalties upon publicans who sold beer to persons who were going by train from one part of the country to another. Therefore these persons could not be inconvenienced by the present Bill.

Mr. H. Berkeley

MR. CRAUFURD said, he considered that, if the Bill were attempted to be carried out, those people who now resorted to public-houses on the Sunday would take to drinking in secret. He believed as the law was generally interpreted excursionists were not regarded as travellers.

MR. LANGTON said, that even under the present law publicans in Bristol had been fined heavily for supplying refreshments to excursionists.

Bill read 3^a, and passed.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

The remaining Clauses after Clause 13 agreed to.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL moved the insertion of the following clause—

"And whereas doubts have arisen as to whether the payment of the expenses of conveying Voters to and from the poll be or be not according to law; and it is expedient that such doubts should be removed, and that the law should be settled in these particulars, be it Declared and Enacted that, from and after the passing of this Act, it shall be lawful for any candidate or other person, subject always to the provisions of this Act as to the payment of election expenses, to pay or cause to be paid the actual and reasonable expense of bringing any Voters to the poll."

Clause brought up, and read 1^o, 2^o.

MR. CRAUFURD proposed an Amendment, to insert the word "not" after the word "shall."

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, that the clause would render the payment of what were called "actual and reasonable" expenses, not only legal, but imperative, on the part of candidates. The effect of the clause would be that in future it would be necessary for candidates to provide carriages for the conveyance of voters to the poll in many places where no expenditure for such a purpose had hitherto been requisite. He wished to know what construction was to be put upon the term "actual and reasonable expenses?"

MR. HEYWORTH said, he objected to the clause, considering that its tendency would be to degrade the electors.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he thought it would be very difficult to put a satisfactory construction upon the term "reasonable expenses." Would the provision of refreshments for voters on their way to the poll, or payment for the board and lodging of electors who could not go to the poll and return to their homes on the same day, be regarded as "reasonable expenses?" He thought the effect of the Bill as it stood, and of some of the clauses which it was proposed to introduce, would be to legalise wholesale bribery, and to punish retail bribery with great severity. He considered that under this clause most exorbitant sums might be charged to candidates for the hire of carriages and cabs at elections.

MR. HEADLAM said, he had given notice of a clause on this subject which he thought would operate more satisfactorily than the clause under discussion. His objection to the present clause was, that it would render, not only legal, but compulsory, a great deal of expenditure which he considered entirely useless. A legislative enactment legalising all travelling expenses at elections would lead a large proportion of the voters in large towns to think that they were entitled to be taken up to the poll in hackney carriages. The effect of this idea would be that the owners of hackney carriages in such towns would charge enormous sums for the hire of their vehicles, and thus a system of indirect bribery would be established with regard to the coach-owners.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he believed that the words of the clause were in strict conformity with the legal decision of Lord Lyndhurst on the subject of election expenses, and he was not aware that any practical inconvenience had resulted from the existing law. If the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) were adopted, any man who sent up his tenants or friends to the poll in his private carriage would be liable to very heavy penalties.

MR. W. J. FOX said, he wished to know whether the noble Lord would object to introduce words into the clause, making payments for bringing up voters to the poll contingent upon the previous consent of the candidates? He had known elections at which all the cabs in a town had been engaged by the friends of one candidate, and the consequence was, that the opposite party were put to an enormous expenditure in bringing vehicles from a distance. As under this clause every voter would expect to be taken to the poll in a carriage, he thought that its effect would be very considerably to extend such a system of vexatious opposition. In the exercise of the franchise there was a privilege to be enjoyed and a duty to be discharged, and he thought it would be just as reasonable to send out carriages on a Sunday to convey persons to their parish churches, where there was a privilege to be enjoyed and a duty to be discharged, as to provide vehicles for the conveyance of voters to the poll. He would support the Amendment, believing that the clause would open a very wide door to bribery and corruption.

MR. MASSEY said, he would suggest the substitution of the word "necessary" for the word "reasonable."

VISCOUNT MONCK said, at one election he stood for, not a shilling was spent corruptly, but all the vehicles in the county were engaged at an enormous expense. He voted against the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord R. Grosvenor) the other night, but he was now convinced that he was wrong.

MR. HILDYARD said, he considered that if this clause did not pass they would practically disfranchise the small freeholders, who were the most independent voters.

MR. CRAUFURD said, if he succeeded in carrying his Amendment, he should propose further to amend the clause by striking out the word "reasonable." If this clause was carried as it was, he should certainly vote against the declaration.

MR. ELLIOT said, he should be glad to know, if this Amendment were carried, how the electors in the northern parts of Scotland were to get to the poll?

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, there was now no doubt whatever that a candidate might pay the reasonable expenses of bringing voters to the poll. Doubts, however, often arose whether the payment of expenses had been made a cover for bribery; and they would not be lessened by this clause. Considering, therefore, that the clause was quite unnecessary, he should vote against it, because he believed that it would make the carriage of voters to the poll a general instead of an exceptional practice, as electors would then insist on it as a right. He should also oppose the Amendment, because he thought it would disfranchise a large portion of the poorer voters in counties.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, the proper way of meeting the difficulty would be to take the votes of the electors at their own houses.

MR. CAYLEY said, he had considerable doubts with respect to the proposed clause. He feared it would lead to increased expenditure.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had proposed this clause on the understanding that it was the wish of the House that the expenses of travelling should be allowed. If the House said they wished the law to be left as it was, and that this clause should not be inserted, he could well understand that wish; but if they decided on having a determination of the law one way or the other, it was plain they must incur a chance of one of two evils. The one evil was, that if they declared positively to be the law that which was now avowedly the law, they gave more positive sanction to it, and it might happen, though he did not think it would to a great extent, that some persons who had hitherto not asked to be carried to the poll might, in future, ask to be carried to the voting place. But if they decided, in the other direction, that they would not allow any of these expenses to be incurred, he thought that would lead at once to a great number of the voters, more especially the forty-shilling freeholders, not being able to give their votes. He considered that to be a far greater evil than the chance there would be that some persons somewhere or other might be carried to the poll who had not been carried hitherto. But, with regard to the evil of conveying voters to the poll, he owned he did not consider it a great one. An hon. Gentleman had said that a voter felt degraded if he was carried to the poll. No doubt in many towns the great majority of voters thought they were exercising their franchise more freely and independently if they walked to the voting place without putting the candidate to any expense. But those men would have the same privilege still. He did not see that a man's independence of mind was destroyed by being told there was a clause in an Act of Parliament which declared that to be legal which everybody knew to be legal before. With regard to the proposition for amending the clause, he did not think there was any advantage in it. The Committee might change its mind in wishing to have a decision on the subject at all, but unless that was their opinion he hoped they would decide one way or the other, either decide in favour of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr, and thereby disfranchise a great portion of the voters, or vote for the clause as it stood.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY said, that it had been much insisted upon that if they did not allow certain expenses for conveyance, they would prevent many voters from voting, and there might be some show of reason for that as regarded the counties, but that argument could not apply to boroughs. If this Bill was for any purpose at all it was to prevent bribery, but this clause would legalise one form of bribery; it would legalise that which had been hitherto very doubtful. If they were to legalise this mode of corruption in the counties, he hoped at least that it would not be extended to the boroughs.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, he saw no objection to allow the actual reasonable expenses to voters, as proposed by the noble Lord, but he should prefer the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. Headlam).

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he wished to know whether tavern expenses to electors who were travelling to the election would be allowed under the Act?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that reasonable travelling expenses would be allowed, but that refreshment expenses would not be allowed. [Lord R. Grosvenor: But hotel expenses?] It would be impossible to answer every question that might arise.

Question put, "That the word 'not' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 110: Majority 61.

MR. HEADLAM said, he would now bring forward the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

"Provided always, that in the case of boroughs no travelling expenses shall be deemed reasonable, except the expense of bringing up to the poll from their residences within the borough, or with respect to freemen from their residences within seven miles from the borough, aged or infirm voters."

MR. SAWLE said, he would remind the hon. and learned Member that some boroughs were as large as small counties.

MR. FREWEN said, that around Leicester, for instance, there were many villages in which a great number of poor freemen resided, and the clause would virtually disfranchise them. In some straggling boroughs voters might virtually reside as far as fifteen miles from the voting place.

LORD SEYMOUR would ask the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle how he could justify the application of one rule to boroughs and another to counties?

MR. HILDYARD said, he would read the proviso which the hon. and learned Member proposed next to move, namely—

"Provided always that, in case any candidate shall, bonâ fide, endeavour and exercise reasonable care to limit the expenses for travelling and refreshment in accordance with the provisions of this clause, he shall not be personally liable, nor shall his seat be avoided for any accidental payment for travelling or refreshment, not strictly authorised by the rules hereinbefore laid down."

Lord J. Russell

How would it be possible to convict any person after that proviso?

MR. HEADLAM said, that the qualification in boroughs was a residential, and that in counties a property, one. That, he thought, was a very good reason why a difference should be made.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it was a sufficiently suggestive circumstance, that these objections should come from a party who had shown such a disposition to cling to the last rag of corruption. The voters in the neighbourhood of Leicester were in the habit of walking several times every week with their work, and might do so to exercise one of the proudest rights of Englishmen.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 95; Majority 44.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 47; Majority 41.

Clause added to the Bill.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL then proposed the following clause—

"The giving, or causing to be given, to any Voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such voter having polled, or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket to enable such Voter to obtain refreshment, shall be held and be taken to amount to bribery or treating, as the case may be, within the meaning of this Act."

MR. WALPOLE said, he must warn the Committee that if they made the Bill repugnant to the feelings of the people of this country, it would fail of its object.

MR. HILDYARD said, he apprehended that the lunch which it was usual to give at elections for the University of Cambridge to every Voter without reference to the party he had polled for, would, if the clause were agreed to, render even dignitaries of the Church liable to be tried for misdemeanor. He therefore appealed to the noble Lord not to proceed further with a clause that would only render them ridiculous.

MR. HEADLAM said, that the refreshment question ought to be settled, or otherwise the Bill would be construed to sanction unlimited "reasonable" expenses.

MR. HENLEY said, the effect of the clause would render penal the hospitality of one friend who invited another to breakfast with him on the way of election.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he nevertheless thought that the clause ought to form part of the Bill. He would, however, propose the clause on the report, in order that its wording might be reconsidered.

Clause withdrawn.

MR. WALPOLE (in the absence of Sir F. Kelly) moved to insert the following clause in the place of Clause 28 of the original Bill—

"The election officer shall keep all accounts which shall come to his hands in some fit and convenient place, and shall, at all reasonable and convenient times, submit the same to the inspection of the candidates and their agents, and permit them to take copies of the same upon request; and when such general account as aforesaid shall be so made out and signed by him, he shall keep the same in some fit and convenient place, and such general account shall be open to the inspection of any voter, and copies thereof shall be furnished to any voter at all reasonable and convenient times upon request, such voter paying a fee at the rate of one shilling for every 200 words for the same; and when the election officer shall have concluded the business of an election, he shall deliver over all the accounts in his hands to the clerk of the peace in counties, and to the town clerk or other officer performing any of the duties of town clerk in cities and boroughs, and to the sheriff clerk in counties in Scotland, and shall deliver over to the candidates respectively the balance of all moneys, if any, and all vouchers in his hands, and shall allow them to be inspected by any person on payment of one shilling, and shall furnish copies of the same, or any part thereof, on the payment of a fee at the rate of one shilling for every 200 words, except any vouchers appertaining personally to himself."

The clause was agreed to.

The House resumed; Bill reported as amended.

The House adjourned at half after Five o'clock, till Monday next.

THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE.

Order of the Day for the consideration of the QUEEN'S MESSAGE read.

The Message having been read as follows—

“VICTORIA R.

“Her Majesty, deeming it expedient to provide for any additional Expense which may arise in consequence of the War in which Her Majesty is now engaged against the Emperor of Russia, relies on the Affection of the House of Lords for their Concurrence in such Measures as may be necessary for making Provision accordingly.”

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, in moving an Address of thanks to Her Majesty for Her most gracious Message, and in giving Her the assurance that this House will concur in Her Majesty's desire, expressed in Her gracious Message, I do not anticipate any objection on the part of your Lordships. My Lords, whatever may be the differences of opinion on the subject of the war in which we are engaged and the events which led to it, I shall assume that there is an entire agreement of opinion on the necessity of adopting all such measures as are best calculated to lead to an early and successful termination of it. My Lords, I shall also assume that this result is, mainly to be produced by the activity and energy of the efforts of England and France, with the concurrence of the other Powers. My Lords, it is to be presumed that at the present period of the year the close of the existing Session of Parliament cannot be long delayed. It is also highly probable that in the course of the year contingencies may arise of which it may be of the highest importance that we should be able to avail ourselves and to turn to account, in the prosecution of those endeavours that are to lead to the happy result to which I have referred. My Lords, it is intended for these reasons—following the precedent which upon similar occasions has been adopted—to ask Parliament for a Vote of credit to the amount of 3,000,000*l.* sterling—a large sum undoubtedly, and one which it is possible some noble Lords might prefer to see intrusted to other hands than those who will have the disposal of it. But I am willing to believe that no such wish will interfere in any degree with their desire to promote and assist, as far as possible, the efforts which Her Majesty's Government have made and will make under the circumstances to which I have referred. The House will clearly understand that this money which has been now demanded has already been voted and provided by Parliament. There is no question of any new burdens on the people—no new tax—no loan; it is an authorisation to employ funds already provided, but which have hitherto not been appropriated by Parliament. Under these circumstances, my Lords, I think I do not make an unreasonable proposal in following that course which, under similar circumstances, has been observed by all preceding Governments, and in asking your Lordships to concur with the other House in making provision for any additional expenses that may arise. I move that an humble Address be presented to Her Most Gracious Majesty to return to Her Majesty the thanks of this House for Her most gracious Message, and to assure Her Majesty that this House will cheerfully concur in such measures as are necessary for making due provision for any additional expenses which may arise in consequence of the war in which Her Majesty is now engaged.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I think that this is not a convenient opportunity for entering into details connected either with the diplomatic or military transactions of the war. To the Motion that has been made by the noble Earl I certainly can have no objection. We are engaged in a war that is just, necessary, and politic, and I, least of all men, can have any objection to the Motion, as I think that these measures should have been proposed last year at this time, and that, if this had been done, it would have afforded the only possible chance of successfully terminating the negotiations in which we were then engaged, by showing that it was the intention of this country to support by war the representations we made in diplomacy. This only I will venture to say—I think we have a right to expect that, in administering those funds which have been so liberally and with such confidence placed by Parliament at the disposal of the Government, Her Majesty's Ministers, while consulting the efficiency of the military service, will not be forgetful of economy; and that, above all things, they will carry the most searching economy into all those civil departments which have no connection with the war, and in which economy cannot by any possibility impair our efficiency in the field, but may most materially conduce to our financial efficiency, and may enable us, without burdening the people, to conduct this war to a satisfactory conclusion. My Lords, I know that a great war so occupies men's minds that they do not attend so much as they should to economy in the civil departments of the State, and, that while there really exists no reason whatever for an increase of expenditure in the civil departments unconnected with the war, it nevertheless does increase more largely in consequence of want of due consideration and thought being applied to it. It seems to me to be more especially the duty of my noble Friend at the head of the Government himself to look not merely to the great important charges, but into the most minute details of expenditure of every civil department of the State, in order to effect a general strict economy, and to satisfy the people that no money has been misapplied, and that what the people give willingly is applied sagaciously and honestly to the furtherance of the public service. I could not allow this Motion to pass without saying thus much. It is deeply impressed on my mind, this necessity for economy at the commencement of a war of which no man can foresee the termination. I am sure it is necessary to give contentment to the people, and to enable us to carry the people with us through the difficulties now before us.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: Certainly, my Lords, there can be no question of greater importance than that we have now before us—that of voting an Address to Her Majesty in answer to the Message requiring our concurrence in voting the sum of money necessary for carrying on the war. The noble Earl (the Earl of Aberdeen) has stated that there may be some noble Lords in this House who may wish to see the charge of this war in other hands, but that he feels assured, from the loyalty we bear to the Throne and the necessities of the Crown, that we should willingly deliver into the hands of the Government the control of the funds necessary for carrying on that war with vigour and efficiency. For my own part I perfectly agree with the noble Earl that the necessities of the Crown warrant that demand upon our confidence, and I myself shall most readily concur in placing in his hands those powers for which he asks. There can be no question, my Lords, that in any ordinary case of this sort we might fairly claim to enter into a discussion on the general question and objects of the war; but in the present instance I am ready to admit there are difficulties in the way. First of all, we are kept entirely in ignorance of the plan upon which the war is to be carried on. We see great exertions in the Baltic and the Black Sea—great efforts ably conducted by the Government—by that I mean we see a large naval force in the Baltic and a similar force in the Black Sea—and we see transported to the shores of the Danube a larger army than this country has seen brought together for many a day. We see great preparations for the war, but of what is intended to be done we know nothing—and, therefore, to comment upon the operations of the war would be most inexpedient, seeing that it would be impossible to do so with justice. I will, therefore, content myself with saying that I hope and trust my noble Friend, by means of those powers which have been so liberally placed by Parliament in the hands of the Government, will be enabled, by God's Providence, to conduct this war to a happy issue. But the Government must at the same time bear in mind that they are in this peculiar position—that by means of the extraordinarily large force they have at their disposal in the various parts of the world where their operations are being conducted they have raised the hopes and expectations of the people of this country to such a pitch, that if the season during which operations are practicable should pass away without any great deed of arms being accomplished, equal to the expectations which the powers and forces employed have raised, a very great responsibility will rest upon the Government. For myself and my noble Friends who act with me, concurring as we do in the necessity of arming the Government with all the powers necessary for carrying on the war with vigour, and bringing it to a happy issue, we shall give a cordial support to the noble Earl's Motion.

EARL FITZWILLIAM: My Lords, I feel myself called upon to make a few remarks on what, I confess, appears to me to be the very singular position in which the Parliament of the country is placed by Her Majesty's Ministers. I agree with my noble Friend who has just sat down, and with the noble Earl beyond him (the Earl of Ellenborough), that it is desirable during the progress of the war to have the most searching investigation into the financial position of the country. I must remark, however, that the practice of raising such questions in Parliament, and particularly in this House, has a tendency to encourage what I conceive to be a most mischievous feeling amongst the people of the country, and one which ought not to be encouraged by persons in high station in that or the other House of Parliament; I allude to the delusion that this country is the highest taxed country in the world. So far from this country being the highest taxed country in the world, I believe, if you look around the States of Europe, you will find there is none in which the people who are called upon to pay the taxes are more capable of paying them than the people of this country. Instead, then, of this country being described as being the highest taxed in Europe, it ought to be described as that in which the taxes fall more lightly on the people than in any other section of the European commonwealth. But I do not, on that account, think it the less necessary that economy should be observed in the administration of those funds which the liberality of the other House of Parliament—sanctioned, I trust, by your Lordships—have placed at the disposal of Her Majesty's Government. I think, however, that both this and the other House of Parliament has been placed in a singular position by the speech of the noble Earl at the head of the Government; and my noble Friend must allow me to say that there never was a speech made on such an occasion as this of which it might be more truly said, that it conveyed scarcely a single idea to the Parliament to which it was addressed. But, though it conveyed but little information, there did fall from the noble Earl an ominous expression, to which I am desirous of calling the attention of your Lordships; and if perchance beyond the walls of that House it should be the means of drawing some little attention to it in other quarters, I shall not regret the observation I am about to make. My noble Friend spoke strongly—and he could not speak more strongly than I feel upon the subject—my noble Friend spoke strongly of the restoration of peace, and, in doing so, he used this ominous expression—"with the concurrence of other Powers." My noble Friend must forgive me for saying that, having used this expression, it was the duty of my noble Friend to relieve it from the mystery in which it is involved. I desire now to know—and I think I am not singular in that desire—I desire to know who are the Powers whose concurrence my noble Friend is anxious to obtain?

LORD BROUGHAM: The noble Earl said, "concurrence in carrying on the war."

EARL FITZWILLIAM: "Concurrence in carrying on the war!" I think my noble Friend talked of concurrence in the restoration of peace. ["No, no!"]

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: It is totally a mistake. I said nothing of the sort, and I made no reference whatever to any other Powers with respect to peace. I spoke entirely with respect to war.

EARL FITZWILLIAM: I am sorry that I misunderstood my noble Friend, and I take it that he only spoke of carrying on the war in concurrence with other Powers. Now, for the purpose of carrying on the war, we are in concurrence with Turkey as principal in the war, and France and England appear in the matter as the allies of Turkey. But, my Lords, I do not quite understand the distinction which my noble Friend draws, because, according to his own theory—and to that theory I have no objection—the only object of carrying on war is to secure peace. Why, then, after all, we are in concurrence with other Powers for the attainment of peace. Undoubtedly, if my noble Friend tells us that in any conditions for peace we are not to be engaged with any other Power besides Turkey and France, then I understand the position in which we are placed; but is that the true interpretation which I am to put upon the position in which this country is placed? Am I to understand that France and England, as the allies of Turkey, are not to be engaged with any other Power in endeavours for the restoration of peace? Now, my Lords, the great object which Her Majesty's Ministers ought to have in view is undoubtedly, as my noble Friend at the head of the Government has stated, the restoration of peace; but give me leave to say that the restoration of peace is a task which I expect my noble Friend will find to be one of not very easy attainment. If we are to attain peace, it must be by a serious blow against the Power with whom we are at war. We must not confine our operations to attacking small ports. While upon this matter, allow me to avail myself of the opportunity of expressing the deep regret I feel that any portion of the exertions of the country should have been diverted from what I think must appear, not only to me, but to your Lordships, the great objects which we ought to have in view. I take this opportunity of expressing my regret that any portion of those exertions should have been, in any part of Europe, in any part of Asia, or in any part of the world, diverted from the endeavour to strike those blows upon the enemy which would be most likely to induce him to make peace. It is not by attacks upon small ports in the Baltic, nor is it by an analogous conduct in the Black Sea, that we can hope to strike those blows which will induce the enemy to make peace, or to meet us upon those terms on which it might be fitting to make peace. I confess, my Lords, that I do entertain great apprehensions with respect to the terms on which it is possible or probable that it may be proposed to make peace. I trust they will be such as will secure, as far as any human foresight can secure, the Turkish empire from being at the mercy of the power of Russia. That is the true object which we must have in view; and what I am afraid of is this—that we may be induced by other Powers to consider that certain minor objects would be sufficient to justify us in obtaining what appears to me to be the great object we ought to have in view. I can easily conceive that there are Powers which would be perfectly satisfied with the abandonment of the Danubian Principalities, and the placing of the Danube in a position free to other Powers; but most undoubtedly this must not be held to be sufficient for the object we have in view. Austria may free Wallachia and Moldavia from the presence of the Russian armies, the mouths of the Danube may be opened to Austrian commerce, and yet nothing have been done towards maintaining the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire. And, while speaking of the integrity of the Ottoman empire, I should certainly like to know, though I do not think I shall obtain the information—I should like to know what is the interpretation which Her Majesty's Ministers place upon the expression, "the integrity of the Ottoman empire?" Do they simply mean the maintenance of that boundary to which the Ottoman empire was circumscribed by the Treaty of Adrianople, or do they mean the placing of Turkey in such a position that, with or without the assistance of such allies as she now has, she will be enabled to maintain her independence against the aggressions of Russia? I certainly should be very desirous of hearing from Her Majesty's Ministers, little as I expect it, what is their interpretation of the expression, "the integrity of the Ottoman empire." Your Lordships will give me leave to say, that it must be an integrity not merely explained by the boundaries fixed by the Treaty of Adrianople, but it must be an integrity which would be coincident with its independence and its power to maintain that independence against future aggression. That future aggression will be made, I think your Lordships cannot doubt; and if you conclude the war by the simple restoration of things to the position in which they stood a year and a half ago, you may depend upon it that no very long time will elapse before you will be obliged to engage in another contest, perhaps not under such favourable circumstances as now—that you will, if you continue to think it wise to maintain the independence and integrity of the Ottoman empire, be obliged at no distant time to engage in another war for that purpose. Now, my Lords, it is because I am desirous that we should never again be placed under a similar obligation that I hope that, whatever negotiations we may engage in, the result of those negotiations will be such as will enable us to look with satisfaction upon the endeavours we are now making to maintain the integrity and independence of Turkey. I am not desirous of troubling your Lordships with any further observations, but I could not refrain from calling your Lordships' attention to what appears to me to be the very singular position in which Parliament and the Government of the country are placed—a position in which the former is not informed of what are the intentions of the executive Government.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: My Lords, in the present temper of the House, I should certainly not be desirous of detaining your Lordships, but I cannot refrain from adding my expression of surprise to that of the noble Earl who has just sat down at the extraordinary course which has been pursued upon this occasion. I say "extraordinary," because, although I do not pretend to be learned in Parliamentary history—and, thank God, since I have sat in Parliament there have been but few occasions like the present—certainly upon no one of those occasions has such a speech been made, in proposing a Vote of Parliament such as the present, as that which has been made to-night by the noble Earl at the head of the Government. It has been the custom on all former occasions—and that custom ought to be adhered to now—to afford some explanation of the condition and prospects of the war, and of the state of the country in relation to its allies. I must say that when a Minister, having already had repeated supplies from Parliament—voted with unexampled liberality—comes to ask for a further Vote, he should at least give some information respecting the progress which has been made and the operations performed since the former supplies were asked for. Why, my Lords, if the noble Earl had nothing else to say, he might, at least, have availed himself of the opportunity to make some remark upon, and pay some tribute, however slight, to the glorious and brilliant exploits of the ally in whose cause we have embarked. If any successes worthy of being spoken of have been achieved, they are due, not to the British Government, and I regret to say, not to the British arms—they are due to the Turkish arms—to the firmness of the Turkish Government in resistance counsel as well as in supplying their commander with proper means—they are due, above all, to the skill of that commander, and to the bravery of the Ottoman troops. These it is which enable us now to vote supplies with much more cheering hopes than we could have entertained a few months ago. And yet not one word has been said by the Government upon the progress or condition of the war—a subject not unworthy of the notice of the Government of a country in addressing Parliament for supplies. My Lords, as a humble individual, I think it right to call attention to these circumstances, and to the cheering prospects now before us. It would only have been fair to our commanders in the Black Sea and in the Baltic to call attention to what has been done. In the Baltic it appears to me that those slight operations which have taken place have undoubtedly had the effect of showing the bravery, skill, and intrepidity of our sailors and commanders so far as they have had an opportunity afforded them of exhibiting it. In the Black Sea, though but little may have been done which can have any serious effect upon the war, certain operations have undoubtedly been performed, and certain successes have been obtained, which, I trust, will have a tendency towards effecting a lasting and beneficial peace. I refer to the destruction of the forts upon the coast of Circassia, and the clearing away of the Russians from that quarter. The noble Earl (the Earl of Aberdeen) has said that, so far as the restoration of peace is concerned, the terms upon which peace would be concluded would depend very much upon whether the allies found themselves at St. Petersburg or the Russians at Constantinople, when we came to treat upon the question; but there are hypotheses intermediate to these, and if we have driven the Russians out of Circassia, that is a fact which must not be overlooked when we come to negotiate for peace. I should like to have heard something from Her Majesty's Ministers upon this point, and I think that the manner in which it has been entirely passed over by the noble Earl is a little ominous. My noble Friend who has just sat down alluded, as well he might, to the confederacies and alliances into which this country has entered. I think that Parliament ought to have very distinct information upon this subject; and if no other noble Lord shall bring the matter forward, I will myself take an early opportunity of fixing a day to move for the production of the recent convention entered into between Turkey and Austria, as well as for other documents which may throw a light upon the position in which we now stand. It is only proper that we should be placed in possession of this information, because, according to the treaty which has been laid before us, Turkey has entered into certain stipulations which prevented her from contracting any treaty, secret or open, with any other Power without our knowledge, and we know that the treaty which has been entered into is not a secret treaty. The convention is a most important one, and a question we must look to in voting further supplies is the state of things in reference to that convention, and the conduct of the Powers to whom we are not allied, as well as of those with whom we are allied. I am willing to put the best construction upon the conduct of Austria; I am willing to admit what has been said in this House, that Austria is an independent Power, having her own interests to look to, and that we have no particular right to control her actions. But, admitting all this, assuredly we have a right to know what our own obligations are, and what are the obligations of our confederates, that we may really know how we stand, and what to expect. From general rumour—for Parliament has as yet received no information upon the subject—it appears that, through the pressure and persuasion of the British Government, the Divan and the Turkish Ministers, who were much averse to it, have recently concluded a convention with Austria, by which the Austrian troops were to enter the Danubian provinces and occupy a portion of the Turkish empire. These are facts which ought to have been mentioned to Parliament, and the treaty ought certainly to have been produced. According to the accounts in the papers, the treaty was concluded on the 14th of June, at the time when the siege of Silistria was being raised, when the Russians were in hot retreat, and when it was generally supposed that they were not only in retreat from Silistria, but from the Principalities altogether. It does, then, appear to me most unaccountable, and a point upon which we ought to have some information, that, after the signing of the convention, the Russians being in retreat, and the Austrian army being upon the borders of the Turkish empire, instead of, as might have been supposed after the engagement entered into, marching and attacking the flank and rear of the Russian army, and endeavouring to cut it off, the Austrians should have kept in their place, and have refrained from moving into the Principalities. My Lords, what I want is, that Parliament should know the meaning of the convention between Austria and the Porte—that they should know whether it is a convention for driving the Russians from the Danubian provinces. If it is, how came it that at the hour of danger, and in the moment of the greatest need, Austria, instead of hurrying into the field, held back and commenced fresh negotiations? I believe, my Lords, that hitherto we have placed too much dependence upon other Powers, and too little reliance upon our own resources. Austria is an independent Power; she has a right to be neutral; she has a right to take part with Russia, or she may take part with Turkey; but this, at least, we ought to know—namely, where we are, with whom we are acting, and against whom we are opposed. My Lords, there are considerations which are delicate to touch upon, and which I know that men in office and responsible Ministers are not willing to touch upon, but they are considerations which do not escape a British public, and which cannot escape the Government, and the Austrian and other Governments ought to be made sensible of this. We must know how other Powers mean to deal with us, so that we may know how to deal with them. We have great resources, moral as well as material, if we choose to use them; and if, in this war, which my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office well described on a former occasion as a war of civilisation against the advance of barbarism; if the Governments of Austria and Prussia, if the rulers of Poland, choose to take part against civilisation in favour of barbarism, they must be made aware that there is an appeal to be made to the peoples themselves, to know if they are of the same mind as their rulers. I might carry this further, I might allude to other countries, and the news which has come this day from the south would afford me an opportunity for doing so; but even for an individual these are delicate topics to touch, and a man in office, speaking under the responsibilities of office, cannot be expected to approach them. It is right that Austria and that Prussia should know that if a doubtful, suspicious, or injurious course is adopted by them towards this country or towards France, we must put into use all the arms and all the powers we possess, and out of the conflict thus engendered, I do not think those Governments would come unscathed. I think, too, we ought to be informed if there are any conferences going on in which we have a part—because in the papers we see that an invitation has been held out to renew the conferences at Vienna. I think one of the greatest mistakes made last year, when we had a much longer recourse to negotiations than was advisable, and when for the sake of those negotiations we stopped our warlike preparations, and were consequently compelled to take the field, when war began, at a disadvantage, was, that we had negotiations going on in different parts at once. At that time there were negotiations going on at no less than five different Courts. If there is to be another Conference at Vienna, we have a right to know what it is that this Conference is to consult about. I hope, however, that nothing of the sort is to be entered into. I, for one, think that the time for that sort of thing is gone by. By these conferences and negotiations we have got into a war of which the objects are so ill defined and uncertain, that no one can point out its probable issue or termination. It is high time now that we should have straightforward allies or declared enemies for peace or war. We must not, by hoping and lingering for other Powers to join and assist us, let the precious and irrevocable moments for energetic action slip by, but must trust to our own right and our own arms; and if we do that, serious as I own the conflict to be in which we are engaged, I have not the least doubt that we must ultimately be successful.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: As my noble Friend has given notice of his intention at some early day to call the attention of this House to the state both of the negotiations and of the military operations of the war—[The Marquess of CLANRICARDE: I said I would move for copies of the treaty.] Well, as my noble Friend is to move for the treaty entered into between Austria and the Porte, I would not have intruded upon your Lordships' notice if it were not to rectify some errors into which he has fallen, and more particularly with reference to the treaty [to which he has alluded, and in which I think it is necessary he should be set right. My noble Friend said this treaty was concluded on the 14th of June, after the siege of Silistria had been raised, and the Russians were in full retreat. Now, the fact is, that the siege was never carried on with so much activity (so it was thought), or with such great hopes of success on the part of the Russians, as was the case at that time; and it was not till the 23rd of June that, owing to the valour of the Turks, to which my noble Friend paid nothing but a just tribute, the siege was raised, and the Russians were in full retreat. But, my Lords, at that time the treaty, I believe, had not been ratified, and it is only in consequence of our not having received a ratified copy of the treaty that it has not been laid upon your Lordships' table; because I admit that it is a treaty of great importance, and of great interest to this country, and one of which your Lordships and the public have a right to possess as early a knowledge as practicable. But your Lordships are aware that until we have received from the Governments between whom a treaty is made the ratification of such treaty, it is not usual to lay such a document before Parliament. My Lords, I repeat again what my noble Friend has to-night also truly said, that Austria is an independent Power, and mistress to pursue her own policy in the manner she thinks best; but Austria is also under solemn engagements to other countries—she has vital interests of her own to protect; and unless we can suppose that she would bring disgrace upon herself by being unfaithful to her engagements, or that she will be blind to her own most urgent and, I might say, vital interests, I think, my Lords, we are right in believing that Austria will act as we have every desire that she should do and every right to expect from her. My Lords, Austria has already declared the conduct adopted by England and France in summoning Russia to evacuate the Danubian Principalities, and their subsequent efforts to carry out that summons to its legitimate consequences, to be both just and reasonable. She has herself declared the evacuation of those Principalities, and the free navigation of the Danube, to be matters which not only affect the interests of Austria, but those also of the whole of Germany; and she has declared, with England and France, that it is necessary to devise the means for connecting Turkey with the general system and equilibrium of Europe—which means that Turkey is to be relaxed, not only from her onerous engagements with Russia, but from the wrongful interpretation of her treaties with that Power. She has herself summoned Russia to evacuate the Principalities; and last, though not least, at great expense—an expense which she is very ill able to bear—Austria has organised and equipped one of the largest and finest armies which I believe has been seen in Europe in modern times. Now, my Lords, as it is impossible to suppose that Russia will voluntarily comply with the demands which not England and France alone, but Austria also, have addressed to her, and as it must equally be supposed that Austria has made what she conceives to be just demands, and demands from which, if she were ignominiously to withdraw, she must sink in the scale of nations by acknowledging the superiority of Russia and submitting to her dictation, I think the time cannot be far distant when Austria will be found co-operating with us; and I believe that co-operation would have taken place long before now had it not been for the difficulties that beset Austria, which have, perhaps, not been understood or appreciated in this country. Your Lordships may remember that in the course of last autumn the Austrian army was reduced by 100,000 men; and anybody conversant with such a matter knows that such a measure, and the raising of the army again to 300,000, must necessarily be a work of time. Your Lordships may be also aware that, in the month of March, Austria was ready to complete a quadruple treaty with the other Powers; and that the protocol of the 9th of April was but a compromise to which she was compelled to submit. Your Lordships will also be acquainted, from the recent information brought before you, and mentioned by my noble Friend on the cross-bench (Earl Fitzwilliam), with respect to the late combination against Austria and in the interest of Russia, which is called by the name of the Bamberg Conference, and which up to this day has prevented the Austrian and Prussian treaty from being submitted to the Diet. With these difficulties, and others to which I do not think it right to allude—and that for the very reason stated by my noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde), namely, that here, and particularly under present circumstances, Her Majesty's Ministers must speak under a sense of their responsibility—I say that these considerations and these difficulties must be taken into account when we ask what has hitherto been, and what will hereafter be, the policy adopted by Austria? My Lords, I will answer for nothing; I merely state what has occurred in the past, and my grounds for believing that we may count upon the co-operation of Austria. Now, let me tell my noble Friend that he is mistaken in thinking that on the 3rd of July any fresh negotiations were entered into by this country with Austria or with Russia. Your Lordships know that Austria has addressed a demand, and sent a summons to Russia, for the evacuation, in a short time, of the Principalities. Early in the present month the answer of Russia reached Vienna; but, my Lords, we were no parties to the communication made by Austria to Russia, and we shall be no parties to the answer which has been received. Her Majesty's Government will at all times be ready to enter into negotiations for attaining the object of the war, which is a just and an honourable peace; but until such terms are set before us, and until we have some reason to believe that they are of a bond fide character, no negotiations will be entered into by this country. My Lords, I have on former occasions adverted to the almost impossibility of stating, at the commencement of a war, what would be the terms of peace. I have no wish now to detain your Lordships by going over the same ground again; but I do hope that, during the time that it has been my duty to administer the affairs of the Foreign Office, I have not given your Lordships any reason to doubt that I am insensible to the honour or dignity of the country. I ask your Lordships to believe me when I say, not only in my own name, but in that of my Colleagues, that there is no intention of returning to the status quo ante—that there is no intention of listening to a patched-up peace, which can only be a hollow truce, and render a return to war inevitable, and that, perhaps, under adverse circumstances. But if we continue, my Lords, to enjoy the support of Parliament and of the people of England, I can assure your Lordships that we shall not enter into any negotiations which have not for their object a just, durable, and honourable peace—worthy of the righteous cause in which we are engaged, worthy of the allies with whom we have undertaken this cause—and, I hope, not unworthy of the great and disinterested sacrifices which the people of this country have so cheerfully made.

On Question, agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente; and the said Address to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

LORD BROUGHAM rose, pursuant to notice, to move certain Resolutions on the subject of National Education. The noble and learned Lord said: * I much fear, my Lords, that I shall have but a moderate share of your indulgence, if after the more interesting, at least the more immediately attractive subject which has just occupied you, I proceed to broach the question of National Education, in pursuance of the notice which I lately gave. The vast and permanent interest, however, of that question no one can doubt; and I think I shall be forgiven even by my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Ellenborough), with whom I on a recent occasion had some little difference, not so much respecting the influence of knowledge upon the character and the peace of the community, as touching the celerity with which that influence is made perceptible, if I preface the statement I am about to make with the mention of a fact in no little degree remarkable, as illustrating the humanising effects of instruction; and he, as well as your Lordships, will, perhaps, pardon me the rather because it bears a reference to the quarter of the world which at present so much engrosses his attention and yours. I find that, taking the two countries which stand at the opposite ends of the scale, the United States and Russia, the one the best, the other the worst educated of civilised nations (if, indeed, they both come under that description)—of the crimes committed in a given period, those accompanied with violence are little more than one-twelfth of the whole number in America, while in Russia they are much more than a half, namely, about three-fifths: 640 in 7,400 among the educated and civilised, 3,500 in 5,800 among the ignorant and barbarous people. And now I fear that I have exhausted the only topic likely to attract the notice either of my noble Friend or your Lordships, and I must now proceed to statistics of a more uninviting description. Into this inquiry, however, dry as it is, we must enter, if we would ascertain how far the exertions of the State and of individuals have been successful in providing the means of education. That much has been done is certain; but I fear we shall find, upon a careful examination, that much yet remains to do; and that the help of the Legislature is required, not to supplant by public interference the efforts of individuals, but to stimulate and to assist them by judicious measures, and to supply what they have been unable to accomplish.

I shall begin by marking the periods to which our detailed information applies, and the grounds upon which we are enabled to rely upon that information. Great objections have, at different times, been made to its accuracy, and we must, therefore, stop a moment to consider how far these are well founded. The earliest returns are those obtained by the Education Committee of the Commons, in 1818; the next are those of 1833, obtained on the Motion of a noble Friend, whose early loss to the country is so deeply to be lamented, Lord Kerry; the last are those of 1851, under the Census Act. The returns of 1818 were made by the parochial clergy, and as having presided over that inquiry, I well know the zeal with which they performed the office cast upon them. Such was their alacrity, that within a week after our circular was issued, all those sent their answers who were within a moderate distance, and very soon after I had received the whole, with the exception of about 600, which, in a number of nearly 12,000, might be expected from different accidents. A second circular reduced this number to about 200 defaulters. But a circumstance occurred which placed the conduct of those reverend persons in a most honourable light. By some oversight of the clerks in the Committee, there were 360 returns mislaid; and as it was believed they had not been sent, a circular was dispatched, chiding the supposed defaulters. It so happened that those returns had been culled out from the mass, as being more elaborate and voluminous than the rest, and the Committee, in a somewhat peremptory manner, called for the returns to the original requisition. It might well be expected that those reverend persons should feel hurt, both at the groundless rebuke and at the labour needlessly exacted. But of the whole 360 only two made the least complaint, and even they sent the second returns demanded. Some had kept copies of their former answers, but a great number had not; and their returns extended, in many instances, to ten pages and upwards. I may further state, that when, after the dissolution of Parliament, I took the liberty to send another circular for further information, although aware that this was only in my private capacity, and not as Chairman of the Committee, the clergy returned answers, giving the details solicited, rather than required. After the lapse of fifteen years, the returns of 1833 were made, but by the churchwardens; and I have no hesitation in stating, that they are very inferior in point of fulness and accuracy, as might be expected from the temporary nature of the office held by those who made them. They have proved, on examination, to be particularly defective in some of the larger towns. In 1851, we have the latest returns, and as these were made under the superintendence of the Home Department, they are more to be relied on for fulness as well as accuracy, than those of 1833. I must, however, mention a circumstance which shows that no little confidence is due to the latter. When the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, in 1828, seemed to remove the chief obstruction in the way of a general school system, I was anxious to ascertain what progress had been made during the ten preceding years; and addressed a letter to 700 or 800 parochial ministers, to ask for a continuation of their former returns. Those parishes were taken indifferently, some large, some small, some middle-sized; I received 487 answers, and these, compared with the statements of 1818, indicated an increase in the number of day scholars at unendowed schools, in the proportion of 21 to 10. Now, the returns of 1833 give that increase as between 23 and 24 to 10, which, allowing for the increase between 1828 and 1833, tallies very nearly with the other proportion. I therefore conclude that we may place reliance upon the accounts generally, not only in considering the rate at which education has advanced, but in estimating the deficiency at any given period, provided we keep in view the consideration that the numbers given in these accounts are, from the nature of the case, more or less below the real amount; those of 1851 being nearest the truth, those of 1833 probably most defective.

It appears that, in 1818, the day schools of all kinds were attended by 674,000 scholars (I take round numbers, as the Resolutions I am about to move give the particulars)—the Sunday schools had 425,000. In 1833, the former had increased to 1,276,000; the latter to no less than 1,548,000, or nearer fourfold than trebled. In 1851, the day scholars had increased to 2,144,000, the Sunday to 2,407,000. So that in thirty-three years day scholars had increased more than threefold; Sunday scholars nearly sixfold. Now the population had, no doubt, increased from above eleven millions and a half to fourteen millions and one-third in the first period, and to nearly eighteen millions in the second; but still the increase of education was much more rapid, there being, in 1818, of day scholars one-seventeenth, of Sunday one twenty-fourth, of the population; in 1833, these numbers had become one-eleventh, and one-ninth respectively; and in 1851, one-eighth and one-seventh. It is also manifest that the rate of increase had been considerably greater in the fifteen years between 1818 and 1833, than in the eighteen years between 1833 and 1851, although the population increased more rapidly during the second period than during the first. As the omissions in the returns of 1833 were greater than in those of either 1818 or 1851, it may be taken as certain that the actual rate of increase was less than the apparent, or, in other words, that there was a greater retardation than the returns show. Nor can we doubt that this retardation has been owing not altogether to the unavoidable relaxation of the voluntary exertions made to promote education—exertions which must needs be lessened unless the resources of individuals are enlarged—but also in a considerable degree to the wants having been partly supplied which had called them forth. It is certain, that previous to 1818, there had for some years been a great step made by the establishment of schools on the new or monitorial plan, that of Bell and Lancaster, insomuch that above 1,500 of these had been planted, educating 200,000 children. But the discussions which arose out of the Education Committee in the other House, in 1816, 1817, and 1818, had occasioned new efforts all over the country to establish schools of a more useful class, because having a larger proportion of teachers, and dispensing, in a great measure, with the monitorial system. The Bill which I brought forward in 1820 as the Chairman of that Committee, and which reached almost its last stage in the Commons, was, unfortunately, opposed by the Dissenters, and, being only feebly supported by the Church party, we were deprived of a great, and, in my belief, a most unexceptionably framed system of parochial education; nor was there ever the least encouragement given to renew the attempt. Nevertheless, out of evil came good, by the blessing of Providence; and even the animosity, or let us only say the rivalry, of conflicting sects gave rise to new exertions for the furtherance of popular instruction. Such exertions could not be expected to continue, and accordingly a great deficiency still exists in the means of education.

Before 1833 there had been no interference at all of the State; everything had been done by individuals. But in that year the Government to which I had the honour of belonging, felt it incumbent on them to act upon the Report of the Education Committee of 1818. To the recommendations in that Report I called the attention of my Colleagues, laying it before Lord Grey and Lord Althorp, and a grant was obtained from Parliament of a sum to be applied in the encouragement of schools. This grant was repeated yearly, and from the moderate sum of 20,000*l.*, it has happily of late been increased to, I think, upwards of 300,000*l.* The application of it was for some years intrusted to the Treasury, and they had acted chiefly upon the principles laid down in the Report of 1818, avoiding whatever might tend to discourage voluntary exertions, and giving the sums allotted for outfit or original cost to parties who were ready to provide for the yearly expenses. The Committee had suggested two modes of distribution, either through Commissioners, or through the two great school societies, the National and British and Foreign. The latter was the course adopted; but I may more correctly say that both courses were taken ultimately; for in the year 1839 a Committee of the Privy Council was formed to superintend the distribution, and that Committee generally gave the sums through the two societies. The transfer to the Privy Council was at one time the subject of regret, because the Treasury had conducted the business in a quiet and unobtrusive manner, and the creation of a department gave rise to some jealousy and even alarm; so that your Lordships may recollect a long and warm debate on Resolutions moved by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in which the House by a very large majority concurred, expressing an opinion unfavourable to the appointment of the Privy Council Committee as made without the sanction of Parliament. But great advantage has ultimately resulted from the creation of this department; and certainly, whatever may have been the inconvenience originally experienced, I am bound to defend the proceeding still more strenuously than I did in that debate, because I afterwards found that the Committee adopted the very measures which I had described in the Resolutions moved in May, 1835, for not merely encouraging the formation of new schools, as the Report of 1818 had recommended—for not only increasing the amount of the education afforded, but improving its quality by the employment of inspectors and the establishment of training seminaries. The Committee has been most ably and actively seconded by its assistants, especially Messrs. Kaye Shuttleworth and Ling.

In the same year that this important Committee was appointed, I had for the third time brought in a Bill to establish such a department, and to invest it with powers of distributing the yearly grants, and of authorising local rates, so as to encourage by both these funds the planting of schools, to support those requiring assistance, to establish training schools, and to superintend the conduct of all either founded or aided by the public. The difficulty as to the religious question had seemed to be surmounted; and I was authorised to state on behalf of a very numerous meeting of delegates from most parts of the country, who had held a conference on the details of the plan, that it had, after undergoing various alterations, received their general concurrence; the Dissenters joining with the Churchmen in holding its provisions to be unobjectionable. The Government of the day, Lord Melbourne's, was entirely favourable to the measure; but, unfortunately, they had been defeated the week before I moved the second reading; and when a right rev. Prelate, recently raised to the Episcopal Bench by that Government, and who had voted with us against his Metropolitan upon the recent occasion, now put himself in the front of the opposition to the Bill, we had no hopes of success, and were obliged to withdraw it until a more auspicious time should come. I found, however, that one great object of the Bill would be secured, the creation of an Education Department, if the Privy Council Committee not only persevered in its administration of the annual grant, but applied it to the establishment of training schools, and the employment of inspectors; all which they could do without any Parliamentary authority. The more effectual power of local rating would alone be still wanted; but the increase of the annual grant might to a considerable extent supply this defect; and I was willing to expect everything from the entire agreement of my noble Friends in the great principles of the Bill. Their proceedings in Parliament and in the Privy Council during the next year or two, confirmed these expectations, and I certainly should have been without excuse had I interrupted them by again pressing the Bill. It was only consistent with the most ordinary discretion, and the scantiest stock of patience, to await for awhile the results of what had been already done. The ground had been prepared in 1818; the seed sown in 1833; due care was now cheerfully bestowed upon its protection; and with a fair prospect of success crowning the labours of the new department created in 1839, it would have been most unwise, indeed irrational, impatience to interfere with the natural growth of the plant, as some projecting lawgivers of exalted rank, the Emperor Joseph among them, have occasionally been seen to do, and been in consequence compared to the child that having put a bean in the ground, must needs pluck it up to see if it has begun to sprout, instead of waiting till the stem and the leaf appear, fostered by the breeze, strengthened by the sun, expanded by the shower. That childish, preposterous impatience I felt not, how great and how constant soever my anxiety for the progress of the system, because I was well assured of its safety in the hands of my noble Friends of the Privy Council Committee. But I think we may admit that the time is now come for examining the progress which has been made, and for asking ourselves whether anything and what remains to be done.

I take it to be clear beyond all question that the means of education are still insufficient; and I now beg the attention of your Lordships while I demonstrate this proposition. I lay aside the great numbers taught at Sunday schools, because valuable as is the instruction there given, and beyond all praise the conduct of the pious and truly charitable persons (290,000, I glory in being able to say it,) who devote themselves to this really good work, in the spirit of genuine, because wise, benevolence—that which alone deserves the name, when the act is in harmony with the will, and good is not only intended, but done: the instruction received is extremely limited, and two or three hours in a week give but inconsiderable moral discipline, which is the most important part of tuition; not to mention that no small proportion of the Sunday scholars are returned also under the head of day scholars. It is to the day scholars, therefore, that we must look, and these appear to be in round numbers 2,144,000, at 46,000 schools. But these include private as well as public schools, and 500,000 children of the upper and middle classes are taught there, and about 50,000 at the endowed schools, which are also included. These deductions I make after a full communication with Mr. Horace Mann, whose intimate acquaintance with the whole statistics of education is well known to such of your Lordships as have had the advantage of perusing his elaborate and judicious Report to the Registrar General, a document of the highest merit both for its arithmetical details and for the enlightened views which it gives of the whole subject. It would, indeed, be difficult too highly to praise this most able and useful officer. [Earl GRANVILLE, Lord MONT-EAGLE, and others strongly expressed their concurrence.] We may conclude, therefore, that for the children of the working classes, and of the poor, there are only public day schools attended by little more than 1,500,000.

Let us now consider how far this supply of education is adequate to the wants of the people. And here I must begin by observing, that nothing can be more wild than the notions of those who reckon upon all the children between three and fifteen, or 4,900,000, as the number for whom schools should be provided, conceiving most erroneously that the working classes, as well as those in easy circumstances, can keep their children long enough at school to require anything like this accommodation. Unhappily there comes in competition with the schoolmaster, great as his merits and his claims may be, the employer; and from the time that a child can earn somewhat towards his support, his attendance at even the school which costs nothing, must be first interrupted, and then altogether cease, even assuming the parent to be duly impressed with the advantages of education. Instead, therefore, of more than a fourth of the population, we should not reckon more than one-eighth, or the children between four and twelve, which would give the number for all classes at 2,222,000. But we are to consider only the proportion of these belonging to the working classes and the poor. What is that proportion? I made inquiry of my honourable friend the Registrar General, and he gave me four-fifths as his estimate of the proportion which the working classes bear to the whole population, or about 3,625,000 males of twenty and upwards, but not reckoning farmers' sons and commercial clerks. I will take the calculation, then, as four-fifths, or 14,340,000, and one-eighth as the children, or 1,792,000. But I was desirous of checking this calculation by having recourse to another test; and I found in the evidence before Mr. Hume's Income Tax Committee last Session, the number of persons having incomes of 75*l.* and upwards is counted at 829,117 by Mr. W. Farr, the able and intelligent head of the Statistical Department in the Registrar General's office; and, deducting a sixth for Scotland, we then have 712,000 for England and Wales, which, reckoning five to a family, would leave for the other classes, the working and the poor, 14,440,000, and the children, 1,805,000, being very nearly the number obtained from the calculation founded on Mr. Graham's estimate of four-fifths. It is, indeed, very possible that in making this estimate he had taken into his account Mr. Farr's statements respecting the income tax. However, I think we may, on the whole, rest satisfied with the inference that as, instead of 1,800,000, there are attending public day schools little more than 1,500,000, the deficiency in these schools for the working classes is not much less than 300,000, or upwards of 3,000 schools, even allowing the average of 94 scholars to a school, which is unfortunately the number in the public day schools, and is very considerably more than in every view is desirable. I have made no deduction for dame-schools; had I done so, the deficiency would have been greater by above 130,000.

But I must proceed to state that this great evil is unfortunately not equally diffused, as it were, over the country; the deficiency is much greater in some places than in others, and it is greater exactly where it is most to be lamented, in the larger towns. I take 44 of those, the population of which amounts to 3,206,000, London not included, and I find that the scholars at public day schools amount to 226,000, to which we must add a portion of those at private schools, say 24,000, and we have the whole therefore 247,000, or one in thirteen of the population. But if we take the rest of the country, exclusive of the 44 towns and of London, we have day scholars at public schools, 1,029,000, and adding 84,000 for the private, the total is 1,113,000, or one in eleven of the population; and a like difference is found as to Sunday scholars. But we may institute the comparison as to all towns of above 50,000, our former case being those of the largest towns. We then shall find that in a town population of 4,880,000, the day scholars are 521,000, or 1-9-4th; and in all the rest of the country the scholars are 1,621,000, or one-eighth. This comparison includes London, which is more deficient than any other place, town or country; the proportion of day scholars being only one-thirteenth, and of Sunday scholars one-seventeenth, that of the great towns being 1-7-3rd, and of the rest of the country 1-6-7th. If, therefore, those towns had the same means of education with the other districts, there would be day schools for 89,000 scholars, and Sunday schools for 86,000 more than they now have. How many years will be required to supply this great deficit? We must always bear in mind that the population is increasing at the rate of nearly 200,000 a year. So that in those towns it is increasing above 30,000 annually, so that to maintain even the present inadequate supply of schools in its proportion to the number of the people, there must yearly be provided an addition equal to about 3,000 scholars, without the least impression being made upon the deficit; and to supply this would require an increase every year, for five years, of day schools sufficient to teach 21,000—which is nearly twice as rapid an increase as has been made during the eighteen years between 1833 and 1851. Having mentioned the diminution in the rate of increase of late years, I must add that this can in no way be ascribed to the aid given by the State, as was apprehended by some warm friends of education; for the diminution has been greatest in Sunday schools, which receive no part of the annual grants. My able and excellent friend, Mr. Baines, of Leeds, though decidedly averse to all interference, never fell into this error. He must have been sensible that the diminution was owing to the extraordinary efforts which had before been made, and chiefly in respect of Sunday schools. He was also perfectly sound in his view of the minimum numbers for whom schools should be provided. Indeed, I always differ with hesitation from one who has done so much and who knows so much upon the whole subject of popular education. The Bill, however, which I now present is grounded partly on the difference that exists between us respecting the facts, and partly on our arriving at different conclusions from such as are undisputed.

I have thought it right to enter into these details that your Lordships might be aware how little it is upon mere vague surmise that those rely who hold the existing means of education insufficient, and the inadequate rate at which these are augmented by the present arrangements. But I am, at the same time, aware that it requires no mere consideration of statistical statements, no aid of calculations to prove both the one of these positions and the other; both the existence of the deficiency and the inadequacy of our present machinery to supply it. For proof of the lamentable fact that the means of popular instruction are deficient in the great towns, and most in the greatest of all, that in which we now are, we may safely appeal to the result of all men's observation; and no one who has read the touching descriptions, given by zealous and well-informed men of the hard task, and too often the fruitless task, which a sense of duty imposes upon benevolent individuals—no one, for example, who has read the Vicar of Leeds' admirable letter to my right rev. Friend (the Bishop of St. David's)—can hesitate to adopt the conclusion that we must provide some help to charity and public spirit, certainly taking the utmost care that it shall not be a substitute for the exertions to which these eminent virtues lead. I have, therefore, resolved again to present, not indeed the Bill of 1837 and 1839, but one framed upon the same principles and confined to the incorporated towns, because it is in large towns that the want is chiefly felt, as I have shown, and because these have the advantage of municipal bodies, which will render it easy to work the plan. The provisions of the former Bill respecting country districts are, therefore, now omitted. But I have made another omission; the establishment of a Board appears no longer so necessary, because upon the whole I am satisfied with the department established in the Privy Council. The Board provided by the former Bill certainly had its advantages, because there was a combination of responsible members of the Government with members irremovable, and who, being professional men, would have performed satisfactorily the duties of the Charity Trustees' Board as far as endowments are concerned which relate to education—a revenue, I believe, of half a million, if all abuses were corrected. Nevertheless, when that Board, established since the Bill of 1839, shall have proceeded in its inquiries and in the performance of its other duties, I can have no doubt that an extension of its powers as well as an increase of its staff will be given, for the absolute necessity of which I can vouch from my own knowledge—[Earl GRANVILLE and other Peers agreed in this statement]—and therefore I indulge the hope that a substitute having been provided in all material respects for the Board proposed in 1839, it will not, for the present at least, be necessary to retain this part of the Bill. That of Lord John Russell, lately introduced, differed in some particulars from the Bill of 1839, and I had some doubt whether I should not adopt one of his additions, the provision respecting local committees of education in the town councils. But, after full consideration, I am clear that it is better to leave this as well as other details to the local bodies. The Municipal Corporation Act of 1835 gives the power by its 70th section of appointing committees from time to time, and the only addition which I shall make to this is, a merely enabling provision that there may be named as members persons not belonging to the councils. The whole of the restrictions upon these bodies in Lord John Russell's Bill I entirely disapprove. It will be found that nothing can be more judicious, more useful for the working of the measure, as well as more safe for securing its favourable reception by these bodies, than to leave the uncontrolled management of the schools under the care of the corporations themselves; and therefore the only restraint that this Bill lays them under is the necessity of abiding by the rules, including the power of inspection, upon the statement of which the power to levy the school rate shall have been granted by the Education Committee of the Privy Council. If those rules are altered without leave of that Committee, then the power to levy the rate may be withdrawn, with the reasons assigned, but the corporation may appeal to the Judicial Committee against the order of recall. I have lastly introduced the same provision as to religious instruction which was in the former Bill. No school can receive the benefit of the rate which is not open to all classes and all religious denominations; nor shall any Catechism be taught, nor attendance on divine service be exacted, without the consent of the parents or guardians of the pupils. Having mentioned my noble Friend's Bill, I must add that his being now both at the head of the Education Committee, and of the Charity Trusts' Commission, will greatly help the work in hand; and this union of functions, which, though now accidental, may always be continued as the regular official arrangement, forms an additional reason for my leaving out of the present Bill all that relates to the Board.

I have sanguine hopes that, applying, as this measure does, to between a third and a fourth part of the country, and to the whole of that portion where the want is most felt, it may produce the salutary effect of greatly lessening, if not wholly removing, the evil now so justly complained of. But I should ill discharge my duty upon the present occasion if I passed over another cause of popular ignorance, beside the want of schools accessible to the working classes—I mean the want of a due estimate among those classes of the value of knowledge, the importance of education. This it is that too often prevents them from sending their children to schools where they can be received without cost, and from keeping them there beyond a very short time, even when their labour can be of little or no profit to themselves. Therefore it is that the importance is incalculable of improving the minds of the parents themselves by the promotion of adult education. It is most satisfactory to know that considerable progress in this has been made of late years. Many establishments have been founded for the improvement of the working classes, under the name sometimes of mechanics' institutes, sometimes of apprentice libraries, sometimes of reading-rooms. Upwards of 1,000 of these are to be found in different parts of the country, chiefly, no doubt, in the considerable towns; and they number above 100,000 members. But, useful as is the tendency of these institutions, and great as the benefits they actually confer by the instruction given at some, the reading and instructive conversation promoted at all, it is unfortunately found that a very small proportion only belong to them of the classes for the benefit of which they were originally designed. Were I to allow a tenth of their members to be of the working classes, I believe I should be above the mark. There are, independent of such institutes, adult schools, to the number of above 1,500, where evening instruction is given to persons almost all in the humbler ranks; and of these it is satisfactory to know that near 40,000 have the sense and the virtue thus to pass their evenings after the day's work is done. But the institutions founded for the working classes, in some few cases even begun by themselves, for lectures and for reading, are almost all in the hands of the upper and middle ranks. When Dr. Birkbeck made the great step, in 1825, of forming such establishments in England, of which he had experience in Scotland, having himself, a quarter of a century before, given the first lectures to working men in the Anderson College of Glasgow, the difficulty was felt by that learned and excellent person and his fellow-labourers, of keeping up the attendance of the artisans themselves. So early as the first year of the parent institution in London, I had become so much aware of this, that in an "Address to the working classes and their employers," I endeavoured to grapple with what we felt as our great difficulty, and suggested the expediency of placing a large proportion of the men themselves upon the different committees of management. Yet all our efforts were vain. I recollect some ten years afterwards attending the meeting of an institute in Lancashire, one of the most flourishing offshoots from the parent stock; and finding in the spacious apartments, with fine library and choice apparatus, no want indeed of company, but all of the upper and middle classes, with hardly a sprinkling of artisans, and perhaps of these few not one who earned less wages than a couple of pounds a week—a most valuable class in all respects, and nothing can be more important than their studying to improve themselves in science; but our anxiety was that those beneath them, the bulk of the working classes, should also make some progress in the acquisition of knowledge; and most of the institutes, I am sorry to say, have very few of the one class, and none of the other.

But it is most satisfactory to find that at length a remedy has been applied in the North to cure this great defect; and I am further gratified to perceive that it is exactly by carrying still more completely into effect the strong recommendation which we took the liberty of pressing upon all founders of such institutes in 1825, namely by leaving the whole management in the hands of working men. I had advised three-fourths; but at that time this had been tried and found insufficient in Cumberland and Westmoreland; and of late the step has been taken by some respected friends of mine at Carlisle, and with perfect success, of making the whole directors working men. At Carlisle this experiment has been tried for the last three years and has fully succeeded. There had been for some time a mechanics' institute which flourished, having upwards of six hundred members with a library and lectures; but the error was committed of placing its management in the hands of only those who paid the highest subscription, eight shillings a year, and consequently there is not such a proportion as might be wished of the working classes. But there are a number of other institutions on a smaller scale, confined to having libraries and news rooms, and these are all under the management of the men, the rule being that they only who live by weekly wages shall be on the committee. Of these one having 210 members has a library of 920 volumes, 60 of which circulate weekly; another of 200 members, a library of 700 volumes, circulating 250 weekly; a third of 100 members and having 156 volumes—all of these independent of newspapers and other periodical publications. Nothing can be more satisfactory than the accounts which I have from Dr. Elliot, who had a great share in the establishment of this principle, and has watched carefully over its success. The men show no jealousy whatever of those who from time to time tender them advice; and they receive whatever aid is offered gratefully, because it is accompanied by no interference with their concerns. I entirely agree with the Doctor that we must, for some time at least, not expect the common workmen to engage in study so much as in reading of a light and amusing nature; but with that no little solid instruction may be combined, as the labours of the Useful Knowledge Society showed. It is no less pleasing to find, from the respectable testimony of Mr. Mounsey and others, that the scenes for which Carlisle formerly was somewhat distinguished, both in the haunts of election agents and in the operations of the streets, have been of late unknown. This, at least, is quite certain, that of the hundreds who belong to these libraries and reading-rooms none have even been suspected of joining in any corrupt proceedings, though from accidental circumstances a more than ordinarily long canvass preceded the last general election. The Carlisle plan as to the constitution of the reading societies has been adopted by my worthy neighbours at Penrith. The working men's reading-room well deserves its name; for there are 360 of that class who belong to it; and though there are several of a higher rank who subscribe their penny a week and avail themselves of the well-supplied library of 800 volumes, the whole government is in the hands of men at weekly wages. My learned friend, Dr. Nicholson, after stating that this is "the cardinal point of their success," that "the reading-room is almost full from eight to ten in the evening," and that "several hundreds of volumes are in constant circulation;" adds, that "the love of reading has been diffused to a very appreciable extent;" and also that "the workmen display as much aptitude for administering the affairs of the institution as any class of persons could do." I may add that Dr. Nicholson is well acquainted with the working classes of different countries, and particularly that he has passed considerable time in Germany.

I trust your Lordships will bear with me for entering into these details, in consideration of the very great importance of the subject. The question I am now dealing with is, how we shall best promote the education of the parents whose ignorance makes them undervalue knowledge, and abates their desire of educating their children. To stimulate, therefore, the working classes themselves, and give them a taste for reading, is the sure way of making education universal. The facts which I have been relating prove incontestably that those classes can be induced to profit by the instruction obtained from lectures and from books, if the simple expedient is resorted to of leaving the management of their literary and scientific concerns in their own hands. What I have recounted as the experience of the northern counties may tend to spread the system, and the principles are of universal application. It should be borne in mind, however, that one help to the working classes in their course of self-education must needs come from those in a different sphere. The providing works of instruction is a duty incumbent upon us—works easily purchased and easily understood. Such was the object of the Society established, near thirty years ago, for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. The accident of having originated it and presided over it must not prevent me from doing justice to the labours of my colleagues—to name but a few of them, unhappily now no more—Lord Althorp, Dr. Birkbeck, Mr. Ricardo, Mr. Mill, Mr. Bethune, who, with a body of forty or fifty other learned and hard-working men, including some of the first names in science and letters of the present age, prepared and circulated, at a price incredibly low, a mass of many hundred treatises upon every branch of knowledge, both speculative and practical. It must, however, be added, that we found something of the same difficulty to which I have adverted when speaking of mechanics' institutes. Many, at least of the works on subjects of science, did not reach the working classes, though of inestimable use in the instruction of those somewhat above them. I speak not of the historical and biographical works, and the practical treatises on the arts, but of the scientific works, though even these were sometimes found to be in demand among classes wholly occupied in daily labour—for example, I well remember our being astonished to find that for some of our treatises upon the higher branches of the mathematics, there was a demand among a set of artisans assembled for their mutual instruction in the eastern parts of the City. But this was the exception; generally, no doubt, the Society's scientific works did not reach that portion of the people. That we had no reason to complain of our success is nevertheless certain. Both at home and abroad we made knowledge accessible and diffused. Our works were translated and circulated in most parts of Europe, not only in remote corners of France, where I have found them in the cabarets of an obscure frontier town, but in the south of Europe, even in Portugal and Spain, and in the East as far as Hindostan; and at home, without at once reaching the working classes, they yet exceedingly helped the education of those above them, and thus prepared the spread of instruction to even the lower parts of the social fabric—it being the invariable rule that knowledge descends, and that to impregnate the basement, you must saturate the layers above. I would fain hope that the labours of the body of which I speak, both by what itself effected and by the exertions of those whom its example encouraged, among others certainly the Society connected with the Established Church, have produced a permanent increase of the stock of useful works, as it has unquestionably lowered the price of them all.

Let me, however, before I close my statement, advert to the greatest of the obstacles which the Society had to encounter—I mean the taxes upon knowledge, both in the duty on paper and the stamp duty. The Cyclopædia, with a sale of 40,000, must have been stopped but for a measure which somewhat lowered that excise. Our publications, however, still suffered greatly by what was left. But the newspaper stamp was of far more fatal influence. It could not reach the Penny Magazine, at least we were fortunate enough never to be considered as news-vendors, though I have felt no little alarm at some recent decisions of a fiscal description, lest the long arm of the Treasury should reach our publication, which at one time had a circulation of, I believe, 220,000, until the Church Magazine most usefully and ably divided the labour and the harvest with us. But we were wholly shut out from one field of exertion, and one which we, more than any other, were anxious to cultivate, because it was there our labours were most wanted—I refer to the country districts. The inhabitants of the towns are gregarious, and they have many helps to acquiring knowledge, as mechanics' institutes and reading-rooms, which the villager and the peasant, the farm servant, or even the bailiff, peradventure the farmer himself, does not possess. To circulate even our least abstruse and most inviting tracts among those classes we felt to be hopeless, if the tracts must go alone. But we knew that there was one method quite infallible of making them read by the country people, I mean accompanying them with intelligence of what was passing in the neighbourhood, matters relating to farming, to police, to sessions, and with more general intelligence, the Court, the Parliament, the Law—in short, wrap up treatises, or histories, or biographies, knowledge of permanent interest, in a newspaper of more ephemeral but more lively interest, and you would assuredly reach the farmer and his bailiff, even the farm-servant and the cottager. This we felt; but we were at once headed back by the stamp. The duty had been reduced to a penny, but that penny was as fatal as the groat had been. The reduction had saved a few pounds yearly to those who could well have spared them, and had increased the gains of the newspapers; but it had both deprived the poor man of his unstamped paper, and it left to our attempts at diffusing knowledge among the peasantry an obstacle altogether insurmountable. We had every estimate made, on all the inquiry we could institute, and but for the stamp our success was certain—for we had the very works prepared which the country people would have best liked, and most profited by; the hawker's profit we could bear, for the Magazine and the Cyclopædia sold for a penny, and yielded a large return to pay the authorship, and even a surplus for other works which we could only publish at a loss; but the penny stamp we could not meet, and our attempt was abandoned in despair. To that stamp the newspaper press easily submitted, as it did to the stringent regulations so very far more severe than the worst of the famous six Acts—regulations which put the existence of every newspaper at the mercy of any dishonest servant—but to this also they have cheerfully submitted ever since 1836, when an hon. Friend of mine, a worthy Baronet (Sir E. B. Lytton), obtained from my noble Friend on the cross-bench (Lord Monteagle) the repeal of three-fourths of the stamp duty—they submitted because they thus obtained protection for their valuable property—a protection which the Society was very far from grudging them. We had no desire to interfere with it—no wish to take off the remaining penny upon daily papers, or three times a week papers, but only on weekly papers, which cannot possibly pirate the intelligence so costly to the proprietors of the daily papers, and therefore so well entitled to protection. Had this burthen been removed from the weekly papers alone, we were secured of the channel by which our publications would reach the class of all others in the community that most required their help, and the most certain to take advantage of it.

I have thus, my Lords, taken upon me to detain you at far greater length than I could have wished, upon the subject of the Resolutions which I am now to propose. I cannot, however, prevail on myself to offer any excuse for this trespass upon your patience, well aware though I am how slender a chance there is of such subjects commanding at the present time any degree of attention. I might almost as well expect men to be moved by propositions to amend the law. These are subjects which sometimes are called vital, and of which it was once said, they had this distinguishing quality, that nobody cared at all about them. That the people have some interest in them can, however, not very well be denied—the question being, in the one case, how they shall be reclaimed from ignorance, in the other how the laws they live under shall be improved.

But having so long occupied you with my statements of the one of these great questions, I shall not further delay you by reading over the Resolutions embodying those statements. It will suffice if I lay them before you, and they are these—

"1. That the increase in the means of education for the people which had begun a few years before the year 1818, when the first returns were made, and had proceeded steadily till the year 1833, when the next returns were made, has been continued since, although less rapidly as regards the number of schools and teachers, but with considerable improvement both in the constitution of the additional seminaries, and in the quality of the instruction given.

"2. That the returns of 1818 give as the number of day schools of all kinds 19,380, attended by 674,883 scholars; of Sunday schools 5,463, and Sunday school scholars 425,533; the returns of 1833, 38,971 day schools and 1,276,047 scholars, and 16,898 Sunday schools and 1,548,890 scholars; the returns of 1851, 46,042 day schools and 2,144,378 scholars, 23,514 Sunday schools and 2,407,642 scholars.

"3. That the population having increased during these two periods from 11,642,683 to 14,386,415 and 17,927,609, the proportion of the day scholars to the population in 1818 was 1-17-25th; of Sunday scholars 1-24-40th; in 1833 of day scholars 1-11-27th; of Sunday scholars 1-9-28th; in 1851 of day scholars 1-8-36th; of Sunday scholars 1-7-45th; showing a more rapid increase, but more especially of Sunday scholars, in the first period than in the second, while the population has increased more rapidly during the second period, its increase being at the rate of 180,000 a year during the first period, and 197,000 a year during the second.

"4. That there is reason to believe that the returns of 1818 are less than the truth, that those of 1833 have considerably greater omissions, and that those of 1851 approach much nearer the truth; from whence it may reasonably be inferred that the increase during the first fifteen years was greater than the returns show, that the increase during the last eighteen years was less than the returns show, and that the increase proceeded during the last period at a rate more diminished than the returns show.

"5. That before the year 1833 the increase was owing to the active exertions and liberal contributions of the different classes of the community, especially of the upper and middle classes, whether of the Established Church or of the Dissenters, the clergy of both Church and sects bearing a large share in those pious and useful labours.

"6. That in 1833 the plan was adopted which had been recommended by the Education Committee of the House of Commons in 1818, of assisting by grants of money in the planting of schools, but so as to furnish only the supplies which were required in the first instance, and to distribute those sums through the two school societies, the National and the British and Foreign.

"7. That the grants of money have since been largely increased, and that in 1839 a Committee of the Privy Council being formed to superintend their distribution, for increasing the number of schools, it has further applied them, for the improvement of the instruction given, to the employment of inspectors and the training of teachers.

"8. That of the poorer and working classes, assumed to be four-fifths of the population, the number of children between the ages of three and fifteen are 3,600,000, and at the least require day schools for one-half, as the number which may be expected to attend school, regard being had to the employment of a certain proportion in such labour as children can undergo; and that consequently schools for one-eighth of the working classes of the poor are the least that can be considered as required for the education of those classes.

"9. That the means of education provided are still deficient; because, of the 2,144,378 day scholars now taught at the schools of all kinds, not more than about 1,550,000 are taught at public day schools, the remaining 500,000 being taught at private schools, and being, as well as about 50,000 of those taught at endowed public schools, children of persons in the upper and middle classes, so that little more than 1,500,000 of the day scholars are the children of the poor, or of persons in the working classes; and thus there are only schools for such children in the proportion of 1-9-6th of the numbers of the classes to which they belong instead of 1-8th, leaving a deficiency of 300,000, which must increase by 20,000 yearly, according to the annual increase of the population.

"10. That this deficiency is considerably greater in the large towns than in the other parts of the country, inasmuch as it amounts to 130,000 in the aggregate of the towns which have above 50,000 inhabitants, and is only 170,000 in the rest of the country; the schools in these great towns being only for 1-11-08th of the working classes, and in the rest of the country for 1-9-2nd of these classes, deducting 50,000 taught at endowed schools.

"11. That the deficiency in the number of the teachers is still greater than in the number of scholars, inasmuch as eight of the largest towns appear to have public day schools with 208 scholars on an average, the average of all England and Wales being ninety-four to a school, that there are assistant and pupil teachers in many of these schools, and paid masters in others, but that there is the greatest advantage in increasing the number of teachers, this being one of the chief benefits of Sunday schools, while the plan formerly adopted in the new schools of instructing by monitors among the scholars themselves, is now properly allowed to fall into disuse.

"12. That the education given at the greater number of the schools now established for the poorer classes of people is of a kind by no means sufficient for their instruction, being for the most part confined to reading, writing, and a little arithmetic; whereas, at no greater expense, and in the same time, the children might easily be instructed in the elements of the more useful branches of knowledge, and thereby trained to sober industrious habits.

"13. That the number of infant schools is still exceedingly deficient, and especially in those great towns where they are most wanted for improving the morals of the people and preventing the commission of crimes.

"14. That while it is expedient to do nothing which may relax the efforts of private beneficence in forming and supporting schools, or which may discourage the poorer classes of the people from contributing to the cost of educating their children, it is incumbent upon Parliament to aid in providing the effectual means of instruction where these cannot otherwise be obtained for the people.

"15. That it is incumbent upon Parliament to encourage in like manner the establishment of infant schools, especially in larger towns.

"16. That it is expedient to confer upon the town councils of incorporated cities and boroughs the power of levying a rate for the establishment and support of schools under the authority of and in co-operation with the Education Committee of the Privy Council, care being taken as heretofore that the aid afforded shall only be given in cases of necessity, and so as to help and encourage, not displace, individual exertion.

"17. That the permission to begin and to continue the levying of the rate shall in every case depend upon the schools founded or aided by such rate being open to the children of all parents, upon religious instruction being given, and the Scriptures being read in them, but not used as a school book, and upon allowing no compulsion either as to the attendance at religious instruction or at divine service in the case of children whose parents object thereto and produce certificates of their attending other places of worship.

"18. That the indifference which has been found of the parents in many places to obtain education for their children, and a reluctance to forego the advantages of their labour, by withdrawing them from school, is mainly owing to the ignorance of their parents, and this can best be removed by the encouragement of a taste for reading, by the establishment of Mechanics' Institutions, Apprentices' Libraries, and Reading Rooms, and by the abolition of all taxes upon knowledge.

"19. That in towns there have been established upwards of 1,200 of such institutions and reading-rooms, with above 100,000 members, but that by far the greater number of these members are persons in the upper and middle classes, a very small proportion only belonging to the working classes; but it has been found in some parts of the country, particularly in Cumberland, that when the whole management of the affairs of the institutions is left in the hands of the working men themselves, a very great proportion of the attending members belong to that class, and both by frequenting the rooms and taking out the books to read, show their desire of profiting by the institution.

"20. That in every quarter, but more especially where there are no reading-rooms in the country districts, the great obstacle to diffusing useful knowledge among the people has been the newspaper stamp, which prevents papers containing local and other intelligence from being added to such works of instruction and entertainment as might at a low price be circulated among the working classes, and especially among the country people, along with that intelligence.

"21. That the funds given by charitable and public spirited individuals and bodies corporate for promoting education, are of a very large amount, probably when the property is improved and the abuses in its management are corrected, not less than half a million a year; and that it is expedient to give to the Board formed under the Charitable Trusts Act of 1863 such additional powers as may better enable them, with the assent of trustee and special visitors (if any), to apply portions of the funds now lying useless to the education and improvement of the people."

EARL GRANVILLE said, that if the noble and learned Lord deemed it necessary to express humility in introducing this subject to their notice, he hardly knew what he ought to say in rising, not to reply to, but to follow the noble and learned Lord in the observations which he had just addressed to their Lordships. He could only say for himself that almost the first act he performed when he became connected with the Committee of Privy Council on Education was to read the volume containing his noble and learned Friend's speeches on education, and he believed it was impossible for any one to have read those speeches of the noble and learned Lord without acknowledging, not only the spirit, eloquence, and ability with which he had advocated a cause not so popular in those times as it now was, but the singular skill with which he pointed out deficiencies, and suggested many means, since adopted, for improving the system of education in this country. With regard to these Resolutions, of course the noble and learned Lord did not mean that their Lordships were to express any opinion upon them, as they had not yet been brought under their notice; and with respect to one or two of the subjects to which the noble and learned Lord had adverted, such as the question of the stamp and mechanics' institutions, he did not intend to trouble their Lordships with any observations on that occasion. The noble and learned Lord had directed their attention to the subject of the national schools and elementary instruction, and had given them a short account of the progress those schools had made since 1818. He gave also a clear abstract of what had been given under the Census return. He (Earl Granville) confessed that he had some difficulty in dealing with those returns, because it was impossible to deduce any sound statistics from returns that gave the mere number of pupils who received instruction. But this, so far from weakening the noble and learned Lord's case, very much strengthened it; and he was ready to admit that one of the principal points he made was, that at this moment, in many districts, there existed a most lamentable deficiency of schools for the labouring poor. It must at the same time be admitted that this was a very difficult point to obviate under the present system, for so long as they adopted the principle—excellent, no doubt, in itself—that the State only gave something in proportion to the amount of local contributions, it was almost impossible to supply those deficiencies. Though he approved the principle on which they acted, because in stimulating persons to give money for education they stimulated them to take an interest in the best of purposes, yet the effect, no doubt, was to make it difficult to set up schools in very poor districts, whether in the country or in towns. The noble and learned Lord had adverted to the limited period of attendance at school. He might mention that at the beginning of this year a minute was passed by the Privy Council Committee, the object of which was to provide for the attendance of boys of ten years of age only half time. This was only an experiment to see if something could not be done to encourage the education of boys at that age. It might or it might not succeed, and he only mentioned it because their Lordships, who took an interest in the success of schools, might be able to do a great deal in promoting the end sought to be attained. His noble and learned Friend well knew the measures that had been adopted from time to time to encourage national education; and he believed it was a well-merited compliment he had paid to the judicious conduct of the Committee of Council on Education since 1846. It was impossible to overstate the advantage which had flowed from the labours of that Committee in improving the quality of the education given. The progress made during the last eight years had been quite remarkable, and, he believed, unequalled in any other country in the world. He was informed by those who had the best opportunities of judging of the quality of the education given in the schools that there was no country in Europe where it could be surpassed. The pupil teachers had been found to be of the greatest possible use, and the system was infinitely superior to the old monitorial mode, where boys were set to teach others before they had themselves acquired either the knowledge or the experience. It formed, also, a good nursery for schoolmasters. The training colleges were scattered all over the country, and the assistance given to these training colleges he regarded as in the highest degree important. There were very few great landowners or manufacturers who did not feel some interest in the establishment of elementary schools in their own neighbourhoods. The Committee of Privy Council had, during the last year, taken measures which he hoped would tend to encourage pupils to remain at school for two years instead of one; and, could this be attained, the result would be most advantageous in the training of pupils. With regard to the schoolmasters, it had been objected that by a rule of the Council they could have nothing to do with those masters whose salaries did not reach 30*l.*, and that this was entirely in opposition to, and subversive of the intentions of the Council; he was happy, however, now to state that the demand for schoolmasters exceeded the supply, and that 80*l.* was often the salary received, and, in many instances, it reached 100*l.* He believed that the system of inspection had been most valuable. He thought that, without it, their efforts would have been comparatively but of little avail; and that their funds would have been wasted, but, under the system of inspection, for every shilling expended they had received a full shilling's worth. He considered that it would be impossible to overstate the advantages that had accrued from having the attention of a large body of highly educated men constantly directed to the subject of national education, and who were constantly in communication with and bringing their experience to the central office, and exerting also an influence on the training schools. He would not trouble their Lordships by entering into details as to the instruction given in these training schools, but would merely refer them to the heading in the minutes before them, under which they would see the subjects on which these masters were examined before they received a certificate. He had heard a great deal said as to the nature of the education given in these national schools, and in one criticism on this subject he concurred, and that was that too much attention was given, particularly in the country districts, to the pupils attaining a most accurate knowledge of the genealogies and the geography of the Old Testament; and he thought that while the greatest attention ought to be given to the Scriptures and to the fundamental principles of Christianity, if the time of the scholars was occupied so much by mastering the details to which he had alluded, that this necessarily prevented them from acquiring knowledge which would be much more useful to the children of the labouring classes. A great deal had been said on—and it had almost become a cant phrase,—“common things,” and the advantage to be derived from more instruction in them. Lord Ashburton had, in an excellent speech, done much to bring this subject before the people, and he (Earl Granville) trusted that it would be followed up. At the same time, it would be hardly fair to allow their Lordships to think that this subject had been overlooked in the training schools and establishments. On visiting any of these establishments, particularly those under the senior inspector, acting under the general order of the Council, it would be found that lectures were given on the elements of political economy as affecting wages; also on the materials of dress, modes of cookery, and on mechanical powers, mensuration, &c.; and, in those schools attended by girls, not only was cookery attended to, but sanitary means and regulations, and also attendance on and attention to the sick. He had been told by one of the inspectors who had been long under the committee, that in this district, not only around the metropolis, but in the country, day after day, instruction was given of the most useful character on many of these subjects. He might mention, to show the confidence the Committee had in their present system, the increase that had taken place in the schools and teachers during four years. At the end of 1850 there were 1,717 schools, and 4,660 Government apprentices or pupil teachers; in 1851, 2,600 schools, and 5,607 teachers; in 1852, 2,277 schools, and 6,180 teachers; and at the end of 1852 there were 2,546 schools, and 6,912 teachers; or, in other words, there was at the end of 1852 an increase of nearly 50 per cent over the numbers of 1850. With regard to the abuses of charities, he thought he was perfectly right in saying that the powers in the hands of the Commissioners ought to be increased. He believed, however, that that Board had acted most zealously; and numerous applications had been made to them by trustees to place schools on a more efficient footing. The Commissioners had gone into these cases, and almost invariably had to say, “Your case is a good one, and we hope your wishes may be complied with; we have not the power to help you, but you must go to the Court of Chancery.” The applicants, however, did not seem to like the notion of going into Chancery, and, therefore, did not follow up this suggestion. He considered that amendments ought to be introduced on this subject, and most probably a measure would be introduced next Session to effect this, and he trusted that such a measure would receive the favourable consideration of their Lordships. The last point that had been mentioned by the noble Lord was as to the mode of establishing schools to supply the deficiencies which they so much lamented. It was impossible for him (Earl Granville) to express any opinion on this at present, and he could only say that all the Members of the Government were most anxious on this subject, and would gladly avail themselves of any opportunity of establishing a more enlarged system of education, and they were determined to push with the greatest possible vigour their present means and powers. Their Lordships would see, from the fate of the Government educational measure of last Session, and that of the Scottish measure of this, and also from the evidence received before the Irish Committee on Education, that there was a great practical difficulty in the way of introducing any new system of education; they, therefore, must act on the old song, and be sure "that they were off with the old love before they were on with the new," and they ought to beware of taking any steps which would prove prejudicial instead of favourable to the object they were so desirous of attaining. It was impossible to discuss this subject too much, and great advantage would be derived from having it discussed at public meetings so as to bring it as much as possible under the attention of all classes. He tendered his thanks to the noble Lord for having brought this subject before their Lordships, and for his excellent speech, by which he had cleared away false impressions created by a passing joke made by him in some remarks made early in the Session, and the noble Lord had also by his speech of to-night proved that his efforts in behalf of one great object of his life had not in the least degree diminished.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY desired to call the attention of their Lordships to the necessity of dealing differently with the metropolis to what they did with the country districts. In the metropolis they had not the same agencies to work through—they had 2,500,000 of people, and no mutual feelings existing between the employers and employed, and consequently there was a great deficiency of the means of education. In one parish that had come under his notice two or three years ago, there was no school for the children of the poor; during the last three or four years there had been one school established. There were other parts of the metropolis as badly off, in which the clergyman could not act, and the people were too poor to do so. He thought, at least, that the same assistance ought to be extended to these parts of the metropolis as to the country districts. He considered that national education was in a most hopeful state, for its development in the country had of late years exceeded that of any other, and it had become not only the wish of the State, but of the people. He believed, however, that until the employers of labour took an interest in this subject, and felt the duties imposed on them of requiring all children, previous to entering their employ, to submit to an educational test, and also of affording them all facilities of acquiring knowledge after they had entered into their employ, the children would not be enabled sufficiently to derive the advantages from the means of education supplied to them.

LORD CAMPBELL rose to confirm the statement of his noble Friend with reference to the metropolis. It had always been found that where there were no means of education crime prevailed, and that education tended to lessen it. He regretted to say that in the metropolis crime had most enormously increased, particularly among juvenile offenders, and it was, therefore, of the last importance that the metropolis should be attended to. It was there that there was the most crying necessity for the interference of the State; there was no local feeling to aid in educating the children, nothing but absolute poverty and destitution, and the condition properly required by the Council, that there should be some local donation, could not be complied with, and it was the very poverty of these metropolitan districts that rendered their case so hopeless.

LORD BROUGHAM, in reply, again adverted to the pamphlet which had been published by Dr. Hook, of Leeds, and addressed to one of the right rev. Prelates, which contained as much enlightened and sound and liberal doctrine as was ever written by any man. He (Lord Brougham) was of opinion that religious instruction ought to be given in all schools receiving assistance from the State, subject to the qualification respecting Dissenters, and that Scripture ought to be read in those schools; but he agreed with Dr. Hook that the Bible ought not to be made a school-book or lesson-book.

The further Debate on the said Motion put off, sine die.

YOUTHFUL OFFENDERS BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, stated, that its object was, that, in the case of youthful offenders, there should be a power, in addition to inflicting some slight punishment, of sending them to reformatory schools. He felt that this was one of the most difficult subjects with which a Legislature could have to deal, because, desirable as the subject was—and necessary as he believed it to be, that the Government should make an effort to provide for it—he could not but feel that they were liable to be met by the objection, that if they gave a person a good education because he had committed an offence, they might be placing their criminals, in fact, in a far better position than those who had been guilty of no crime at all. Still, there was a very natural and growing feeling that in the case of youthful offenders, at all events, the attempt ought to be made; and it was proposed by the present Bill to sanction that attempt, not by establishing any general system, such as that which existed in France, but by proceeding in a more humble way. There were many reformatory schools at present existing, which had been established by the voluntary efforts of benevolent and honest-minded individuals; and what was proposed was, that the Inspectors of Prisons should examine these schools, and that whenever they reported of them favourably, and expressed an opinion that they were likely to effect their object, there should be a power to send juvenile offenders to them, to undergo the discipline and to receive the education which they had been established to carry out. If the school proved inadequate to the accomplishment of its professed object, the Secretary of State would have power to interfere, and to prevent any other offenders from being sent to it; and if any offender, having been once sent, should leave the institution without a licence, he would be liable to punishment for so doing. He hoped that by adopting this system, they might be able to effect, to some extent, what had been effected to a considerable extent in France—that the juvenile offenders sent to these institutions would forget their vicious habits in them, and would be restored as respectable and useful members to society. It was an attempt, at all events, in the right direction; and although many persons would probably be of opinion that it did not go far enough, he thought it was better that they should advance by degrees upon a matter of so much importance, than that they should run the risk of failure by attempting too much at once.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, that while he cordially supported the Bill as far as it went, he must confess himself one of those persons to whom the noble and learned Lord had just referred, who thought that a great deal more might have been done in the same direction. There was one part of the Bill upon which he wished to make one remark. He thought that, instead of sending these juvenile offenders to reformatory schools, in addition to the punishment of imprisonment, they should be sent there in lieu of it, and not be exposed, for however short a term, to the contamination of a gaol. He believed that the whole mischief was done in sending them to our ordinary gaols at all, and that the discipline and control to which they would be subjected in well-regulated reformatory schools would be found punishment enough. He had read the greater part of the evidence which had been laid before Parliament on the subject, and he thought it strongly preponderated in favour of the opinion which he had just expressed.

LORD CAMPBELL, in giving his assent to the Bill, said, he would take that opportunity to remind the House that, shortly after his return from the last spring circuit, he had called the attention of their Lordships to the enormous mischief and inconvenience which resulted from there being no means of dealing with small offences, except committing the parties charged for trial at the assizes or sessions, which led to their being retained in gaol for twice or three times the period for which they would have been sent to prison if they had been tried and found guilty at the moment. At the trial they often pleaded guilty, and, in consideration of their long previous confinement, were dismissed perhaps with a single hour's imprisonment. The inconveniences which resulted from such a state of things were considerable; and his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, when he spoke of those inconveniences, had promised that the attention of the Government should immediately be directed to it; but the Session was now drawing to a close, and no Government measure had been introduced, while a Bill which had been introduced into the other House of Parliament by an hon. and learned Friend of his (Mr. Aglionby), and some of the clauses in which would have embraced this subject, had been recently withdrawn. He wished to ask his noble and learned Friend, therefore, whether something could not yet be done? for he was sure that, notwithstanding the Sessional order which fixed to-morrow as the latest day for reading any Bill a second time, such a measure as that to which he had referred would be voted "urgent," and would receive the favourable consideration of the House.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE concurred warmly in the object of the Bill,

The Lord Chancellor

now relate to their Lordships a case of hardship under a will. A gentleman died, leaving an only daughter, to whom he bequeathed all his personal property, leaving to a distant relative an estate charged with a heavy mortgage. The father of course expected that his daughter would receive the entire of his personalty without deduction, but the devisee of the landed property claimed to have the debt upon the estate paid out of the personalty, and several thousand pounds were thus deducted from the inheritance which the father believed he had left his child. These were two cases of very recent occurrence. The object of the Bill was in no wise to interfere with wills or with settlements, but simply to give effect to the intentions of testators, and he hoped their Lordships would sanction it. The first clause of the Bill provided that where no provision was made by will to the contrary, all mortgages should be defrayed out of the property mortgaged, and the second clause provided that where a party directed his property to be sold for the payment of incumbrances, it should be treated as personalty instead of realty.

Moved, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

LORD REDESDALE said, he felt bound to oppose the second reading of the Bill, which he regarded as a step towards altering the law of succession of landed property in this country. He was not convinced by any of the arguments of the noble Earl that such a Bill was necessary. The case quoted was one in which the will had failed to carry out the wishes of the testator, but this occurred on many occasions, and was not a sufficient reason for a change in the law. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out the word "now," and add the words "this day three months."

LORD CAMPBELL was sorry to hear that there was any opposition to the Bill, having believed that a measure which was so much in accordance with the dictates of justice and equity would have passed unanimously. The Bill did not interfere with the law of primogeniture, to which he was as much attached as any of their Lordships; and when in the House of Commons he had opposed a Bill providing that, in case of intestacy, the land should be equally divided amongst the children. It did not interfere with real estate in the least degree, but merely enacted that personal estate should be divided as personal estate, among the widow and children, instead of, as in many cases now, the whole of it in fact going to the heir. It merely corrected a doubtful decision of the courts of equity. In Scotland they had no such absurd law as that existing in England, and yet there the laws of primogeniture were in full force and effect. He trusted the Bill would be read a second time.

EARL GRANVILLE, on behalf of a noble and learned Lord (Lord St. Leonards), who was unavoidably absent, suggested the propriety of reading the Bill a second time pro formâ, and delaying further discussion upon it until it went into Committee.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL supported the second reading of the Bill, and thought it astonishing that so unjust a regulation as that with which it proposed to deal could ever have existed in England.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the House ought to know exactly what the law was before they came to a vote upon the matter; for he thought that if the law were well understood, there could not be two opinions as to the justice of the measure. Suppose a man inherited an estate from his father that was charged with a mortgage of 10,000*l.*, that he also possessed 10,000*l.* in the funds, and died intestate, leaving an eldest son and several other children; the law in that case gives the estate to the eldest son, but gives it cum onere—that is, subject to the mortgage—and the personalty is divided amongst all the children; but suppose the man had inherited the estate free from any charge, or had purchased it and afterwards mortgaged it, investing the mortgage money in the 3 per cents, and then died intestate, any person would say that the same rule ought to apply; but the law steps in and says the mortgage is a debt, and must be paid out of the personal property, to the injury of the younger children. This evil is proposed to be corrected by the first clause. He hoped there would be no opposition to the Bill. He would not consent to anything that would shake the institution of primogeniture; but it seemed to him that the refusal to pass such a measure as that before the House was the surest means of bringing that institution into discredit. If they agreed to the first clause they would necessarily agree to the second, which carried out the same prin-

Legislature could not do—to apply a different principle to one description of commodity from that which was applied to every other—and they interfered with the principle of supply and demand. Having referred to Calvin as among the distinguished men who had doubted their policy, and to Jeremy Bentham as having dealt the first great blow against them, the noble Marquess concluded by expressing an earnest hope that their Lordships would consent to the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD CAMPBELL expressed his great satisfaction that the usury laws were about to be entirely swept away. From his long experience in courts of justice, he could bear testimony to the mischievous effects which they produced. They had been practically swept away in all cases except where real security was given; but in the cases in which they were retained they led to a good deal of litigation, and proved most disastrous, and even ruinous, to those whom they were avowedly intended to protect. They had given a great deal of employment to the Incumbered Estates Court in Ireland, and he believed that many estates in Ireland which might otherwise have been disincumbered had been brought to the hammer through the operation of those laws.

LORD BROUGHAM said, it was almost needless to express his concurrence in what had fallen from Lord Campbell; the usury laws were not merely bad commercially, but also morally, and on grounds both commercial and moral nothing could be worse than those laws. The usury law had been denounced by Bentham, and in the same volume he also demonstrated the policy and injustice of law taxes, which it was to be hoped would soon meet with the same fate as the usury laws were about to meet with.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR also supported the Bill. The usury laws could always be defeated by a person who was willing to resort to something which bordered upon fraud. Building societies had been exempted from their operation in order to encourage the industrious classes to make small weekly or monthly investments out of their earnings. But the exemption had been taken advantage of by people who had capital to lay out, and who found that, by making use of these societies, they could obtain real security for their money without being subject to the restrictions which the usury laws imposed.

The Marquess of Lansdowne

This fact had been brought prominently before him in a case which had occupied his attention in the Court of Chancery during the last two or three days, and he thought it was a strong reason for placing these laws upon a rational footing, and for enabling people to do openly and directly what they could now accomplish by indirect and crooked means.

LORD REDESDALE would not oppose the second reading of the Bill, but thought it ought to have been introduced earlier in the Session, that there might have been more time for consideration.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, every matter of detail had been omitted from the Bill, and the principle was one which did not require any long discussion.

Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

REAL ESTATE CHARGES BILL.

EARL FORTESCUE moved that this Bill be now read a second time, which he said had been sent up for their Lordships' approval from the other House of Parliament. The Bill was intended to make a salutary alteration in the law relative to charges upon real estate. Those Members of their Lordships' House who were conversant with the law of real property were aware that, by the law as it at present stood, if a man borrowed a sum of money and gave a mortgage on his real estate for the same, and afterwards died intestate or without specially providing for the exemption of his personal property from the charge on the real estate, the whole of his personal property would be taken to discharge the debt before the estate on which the mortgage existed could be rendered liable. This state of the law had given rise to many cases of hardship and injustice. He knew many cases in which the most lamentable consequences had ensued from ignorance of the law in this respect. In one case, a man had purchased a house and lands worth 1,500*l.*, 700*l.* of which he paid, leaving the remaining 800*l.* as a mortgage upon it; he died suddenly and intestate, leaving an eldest son, twenty-two years of age, and six younger children. The eldest son took out letters of administration, called in the personal estate belonging to the father, with which he cleared the estate of the 800*l.* mortgage, and left his brothers and sisters to come upon the parish. This was a case of intestacy; and he would now relate to their Lordships a case of hardship under a will. A gentleman died, leaving an only daughter, to whom he bequeathed all his personal property, leaving to a distant relative an estate charged with a heavy mortgage. The father of course expected that his daughter would receive the entire of his personality without deduction, but the devisee of the landed property claimed to have the debt upon the estate paid out of the personality, and several thousand pounds were thus deducted from the inheritance which the father believed he had left his child. These were two cases of very recent occurrence. The object of the Bill was in no wise to interfere with wills or with settlements, but simply to give effect to the intentions of testators, and he hoped their Lordships would sanction it. The first clause of the Bill provided that where no provision was made by will to the contrary, all mortgages should be defrayed out of the property mortgaged, and the second clause provided that where a party directed his property to be sold for the payment of incumbrances, it should be treated as personality instead of realty.

Moved, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

LORD REDESDALE said, he felt bound to oppose the second reading of the Bill, which he regarded as a step towards altering the law of succession of landed property in this country. He was not convinced by any of the arguments of the noble Earl that such a Bill was necessary. The case quoted was one in which the will had failed to carry out the wishes of the testator, but this occurred on many occasions, and was not a sufficient reason for a change in the law. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

LORD CAMPBELL was sorry to hear that there was any opposition to the Bill, having believed that a measure which was so much in accordance with the dictates of justice and equity would have passed unanimously. The Bill did not interfere with the law of primogeniture, to which he was as much attached as any of their Lordships; and when in the House of Commons he had opposed a Bill providing that, in case of intestacy, the land should be equally divided amongst the children. It did not interfere with real estate in the least degree, but merely enacted that personal estate should be divided as personal estate, among the widow and children, instead of, as in many cases now, the whole of it in fact going to the heir. It merely corrected a doubtful decision of the courts of equity. In Scotland they had no such absurd law as that existing in England, and yet there the laws of primogeniture were in full force and effect. He trusted the Bill would be read a second time.

EARL GRANVILLE, on behalf of a noble and learned Lord (Lord St. Leonards), who was unavoidably absent, suggested the propriety of reading the Bill a second time pro formâ, and delaying further discussion upon it until it went into Committee.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL supported the second reading of the Bill, and thought it astonishing that so unjust a regulation as that with which it proposed to deal could ever have existed in England.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the House ought to know exactly what the law was before they came to a vote upon the matter; for he thought that if the law were well understood, there could not be two opinions as to the justice of the measure. Suppose a man inherited an estate from his father that was charged with a mortgage of 10,000*l.*, that he also possessed 10,000*l.* in the funds, and died intestate, leaving an eldest son and several other children; the law in that case gives the estate to the eldest son, but gives it cum onere—that is, subject to the mortgage—and the personality is divided amongst all the children; but suppose the man had inherited the estate free from any charge, or had purchased it and afterwards mortgaged it, investing the mortgage money in the 3 per cents, and then died intestate, any person would say that the same rule ought to apply; but the law steps in and says the mortgage is a debt, and must be paid out of the personal property, to the injury of the younger children. This evil is proposed to be corrected by the first clause. He hoped there would be no opposition to the Bill. He would not consent to anything that would shake the institution of primogeniture; but it seemed to him that the refusal to pass such a measure as that before the House was the surest means of bringing that institution into discredit. If they agreed to the first clause they would necessarily agree to the second, which carried out the same principle. It was to this effect—that when a testator directed real estate to be sold for the payment of debts, any surplus remaining after the discharge of the debts should be considered as personal property, and not retain the character of real estate, as it did under the present law. The proposal, in fact, was, that where there was no direction the property should go in the manner in which it might be fairly supposed to have been intended. He hoped the Bill would be allowed to pass the second reading.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, that the tendency of the existing law was to keep real property together; but this Bill, if passed, would have a tendency to sever it. It was clear that the object of those who had introduced the Bill in the other House was to destroy the law of primogeniture, and to favour personal against real estate. He trusted their Lordships would refuse to sanction the measure.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY thought that, as the object of the Bill was merely to make reasonable and just what was now most inequitable and unjust, it ought to be agreed to by their Lordships. He did not, however, altogether understand the operation of the measure.

After a few words from Lord CAMPBELL in explanation, as to the effect of the Bill upon creditors, showing that it would not in any way affect their rights, LORD REDESDALE said, he would not divide the House, on the understanding that the Committee should not be taken before Monday.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Bill read 2^a.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

DUCHY OF CORNWALL OFFICE BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be read the third time upon Tuesday next."

MR. AYSHFORD WISE said, this was another of those Bills which were being hurried through the House without due explanation or time for consideration. The object of this Bill was stated to be to facilitate the transfer of the Duchy of Cornwall offices from rooms in Somerset House to a new house to be erected for that purpose. In order to carry this out, it was proposed to give the Duchy 16,889*l.* for their present premises, and also to pay half the amount of the excess above that sum which the new premises might cost. Now, before he assented to this Bill, he wished to be satisfied that the Duchy of Cornwall had a vested interest in the premises in Somerset House under the 59 Geo. III., a matter on which he entertained considerable doubt. Of course, if there was such a vested interest, it would be necessary to pay for it. But even in that case he strongly objected to pay any portion of the additional cost of the new premises. The revenues of the Duchy now amounted to 57,000*l.* per annum; 13,000*l.* per annum was paid in salaries to officers, and the Council were laying by 25,000*l.* per annum for the Duke of Cornwall. Under these circumstances, he could not assent to charge the nation with any part of the cost of building an ornamental building in Pimlico for the convenience of the Duchy Council, who were administering what was always contended to be private property whenever Parliamentary inquiries were talked of. He thought that some further explanation should be given before the House consented to read the Bill a third time, for it was read a second time on Friday after midnight, had gone through Committee on Saturday, and was again before the House on Monday morning; and this adjournment was the more necessary, as the Supplementary Estimates were fixed for this week, when this Vote of 16,889*l.* would be taken. He wished to have a copy of the contract, and an estimate of the proposed works, and of the value of the rooms now occupied at Somerset House. He had taken some trouble to ascertain whether the Duke of Cornwall had a vested interest, but all he could find was an Act of the 15 Geo. III. c. 33, which stated that His Majesty having purchased Buckingham House and the large gardens adjoining, wished to settle that palace on the Queen instead of Somerset, or, as it was then called, Denmark House, and proposed to give the nation Somerset House in exchange. This arrangement having been completed, the Palace was converted into offices for public business, such as for Stamps, Navy, Ordnance, and the Duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall. He did not see how the Duke of Cornwall obtained any vested right by this arrangement, and it would be very difficult to prove to him how a few rooms, worth, perhaps, 2,000*l.*, could create a claim for a consideration of 16,889*l.*, or even double that sum, which this loosely drawn Bill might entail upon us. As a representative of the people, he protested against these constant attempts to take the public money for such unnecessary, and, he must add, such unjustifiable purposes.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, the only object of this Bill was to give to the Duchy of Cornwall precisely the same holding in the public offices to be established at Pimlico as it now enjoyed in Somerset House. In order to build those offices it would be necessary for him to come to the House for a Vote of 16,889*l.*, and he would on that occasion explain the reasons for the proposal, if the House wished. The removal of the offices of the Duchy of Cornwall was entirely for the convenience of the Inland Revenue Department, and it was thought to be well worth paying half the excess required for the new offices to have the additional accommodation at Somerset House for that department. He would reserve any further explanations until the House went into Committee of Supply.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he objected to appropriating the public money to any such purpose, for, if they affirmed such a principle, there was no knowing where the expenditure would stop, and the nation had already spent hundreds of thousands in beautifying and adorning edifices in that quarter. If it was necessary for the convenience of public business that the space occupied by the offices of the Duchy of Cornwall should be devoted to other purposes, why not give them an equal number of rooms at Whitehall or some other public office. But he must say he could not understand why it was necessary to erect a magnificent set of buildings for this purpose. Many noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen possessed estates producing 57,000*l.* per annum, and they did not require a large building for the transaction of their business. Until the whole matter was laid before the House, he should offer his decided opposition to it.

MR. HENLEY said, this Bill stood in precisely the same category as the preceding Bill; it was read on Saturday for the second time, and he, with other Members, knew nothing about its contents. He demurred greatly to the principle laid down in the Bill with respect to the payment of only half the unknown expenses of the Duchy of Cornwall. The Bill pledged the country to an unlimited amount. There was no estimate of expense, or of the probable cost that would fall on the country, by transferring the offices from Somerset House to the new building in Pimlico. This sort of bargain the country ought to be no party to. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would consent to postpone the Bill until they had the Estimates before them, and heard the explanation.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) correctly understood the nature and object of the Bill. It was thought convenient for the public service that the Inland Revenue Department should be removed from the offices it formerly occupied. The premises in Broad Street accordingly were sold, and they realised upwards of 100,000*l.*, and the department was removed to Somerset House. When it had removed to Somerset House it was found that there were certain offices there established by Act of Parliament which were wanted for the Inland Revenue Department. Well, the question was, whether the House would refuse to sanction such an arrangement as that proposed or not. The Duchy of Cornwall had no wish to remove. If it was the wish of the House that there should be sufficient accommodation for the Board of Inland Revenue, of course they would carry that wish into effect; but he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the House ought to have full information, and he had no objection to postpone for some days the consideration of this Bill in order that that information might be afforded. The Bill was good for nothing unless the Vote in Committee of Supply was granted. All that the Duchy of Cornwall could wish was, that if they were turned out of their rooms in Somerset House, they should have other rooms in which to conduct their business. There could be no need to erect a great building for that purpose. He would move to postpone the third reading till Thursday.

MR. DIVETT said, he thought a postponement would not altogether meet the case. He considered the proceedings of the Council of the Duchy of Cornwall tyrannical and overbearing in the extreme, and he was not disposed to vote away the public money for the purpose of building offices for their convenience. He would, therefore, move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Thursday next," in order to insert the words "upon this day three months," instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words 'Thursday next' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 18: Majority 61.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^o on Thursday next.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

Bill, as amended, considered.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would now move the insertion of the following Clause—

"And whereas doubts have also arisen as to whether the giving of refreshment to Voters on the day of nomination or day of polling be or be not according to law, it is expedient that such doubts should be removed; be it Declared and Enacted, that the giving, or causing to be given, to any Voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such Voter having polled or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket to enable such Voter to obtain refreshment, shall be held and be taken to amount to bribery or treating, as the case may be, within the meaning of this Act."

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

Mr. FRESHFIELD said, that as the Bill stood at present, it was illegal to give refreshment to voters for corrupt purposes, but by the present clause, which was extremely general in its nature, it was proposed to make it illegal to give refreshments to any one about to vote or who had polled. At the time of the North Cheshire Election Committee the noble Lord expressed himself to the effect that the law intended to punish only those who gave refreshments for the purpose of corruptly influencing the electors, and he seemed to think there could be no objection to issuing refreshment tickets to a moderate extent, but not with any view of corrupting the electors. He (Mr. Freshfield) would suppose that 4,000 fourpenny tickets were issued. If they were divided between thirty and forty houses, those places would become dépôts for the electors to meet, just as a turnpike or a milestone might. That seemed to be the opinion of the noble Lord in 1840, and Sir Robert Peel agreed with him, that the gist of the whole matter with which they had to deal was the intention, but now they were prepared to say that every kind of refreshment given to voters must necessarily be given corruptly. He hoped the House would not affirm the clause.

Mr. HENLEY said, he thought this clause went much too far, as, by it, if any person not having the slightest concern in the election gave a voter a pint of beer he would be liable under it. He thought the treating clause in the Bill quite sufficient, and could not understand why they wanted to carry the law further. The hon. and learned Attorney General knew as well as any one that when voters came together there was a great deal of what was called good fellowship; what was termed a dry election was unknown, and, do what they would, they would not be able by an enactment to introduce a change in the habits of the people of the country. He believed that by making the law so stringent it would remain a dead letter, and they could not commit a more absurd mistake than to imagine that the more severe the law was the more efficacious it would be to put down corruption. If the present clause was adopted, the 4th or treating clause would be all moonshine, and had better be struck out. The only result of enacting such laws as this, which visited innocent hospitality with the same penalty as corrupt treating, would be, that while the great fish would slip through the net, the little fish, whom every one thought should be let go, would be caught. He believed that if they agreed to this clause they would have such a shower of qui tam actions after the next general election, that they would be obliged to pass another Act to stop them. He thought it would be far better to leave the law as it stood, and should certainly vote against the clause.

Mr. SPOONER said, he wished to know whether if a voter had travelled 100 miles, and either before or after the election received a glass of beer, that was to be considered bribery?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, without hesitation, that the clause passed on Saturday rendered the payment of any expense whatever connected with travelling by the candidate, except the actual expense of locomotion, illegal. With regard to what had fallen from the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), they were all aware that a person giving meat and drink for the purpose of corrupting the voter was guilty of treating, but there was another question not legally decided as to whether the giving of refreshment to a man coming a distance to the poll could be termed "corrupt treating," and it was of the utmost importance to Committees of that House that that question should be decided. The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire seemed to think it would introduce breaches of hospitality, but he (the Attorney General) did not know why. If a man met his friend or neighbour at market and asked him to come home and dine with him, it was not because he came to market, but because he met him away from home, and so it would be when a man went to the poll and met his friend who entertained him, that entertainment would not be on account of his voting. But, with respect to the candidate and the voter, he thought it ought to be decided by the House whether voters should have refreshment given them or not. He was of opinion that they ought not, because it would be well to encourage in voters a feeling of independence, so that they should feel they were under no obligation to the candidate, and that they gave their vote in the exercise of a duty and a privilege which the country conferred upon them. The system of refreshment tickets might lead to many abuses, as some voters might have come to the election with their minds not quite made up, they might meet with persons who would entertain them by means of refreshment tickets, and thus influence them. He was strongly of opinion that refreshment tickets should be made illegal, but he considered that the House ought to decide the whole question.

Lord ROBERT GROSVENOR said, the principle of this clause seemed to be that the candidate's friends should not be allowed to do by means of refreshment tickets that which the candidate himself was precluded from doing, and so far he agreed with it: but he considered the clause, and the penalties embodied in it, far too severe. What the different Election Committees wanted to know was the opinion of the House respecting the legality or otherwise of refreshment tickets, and, if they were legal at all, to what extent? He should vote for the second reading of the clause, but he hoped, when it came to be considered in detail, it would be modified so as to lessen the penalties; for he quite agreed with the right hon.

Member for Oxfordshire, that as it stood the clause regarding treating was quite superfluous and had better be struck out.

Mr. BANKES said, from the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, it was clear that the legal ingenuity of the hon. and learned Gentleman only enabled him to step out of the difficulty pointed out by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner). He thought the clause ought to be so worded as to effect its purpose without doing injustice and attempting impossibilities.

Mr. MORRIS said, he wished to inquire of the hon. and learned Attorney General whether a person would not be allowed to give refreshment to a voter after the election was over, when it could not be said that he was under any influence in consequence of refreshment?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: According to the construction of the clause, it would be treating, and, consequently, illegal.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he would put the case of a Member going down into the country to give an account of his stewardship, and his friends assembled together at dinner—would it be legal, he asked, to contribute towards the payment of any portion of the expenses connected with such dinner? If they might pay the expense in the one case and not in the other, their legislation was absurd. Nothing could be more common than a landlord calling his tenants together and explaining to them his political views, and he (Mr. Hildyard) did say that it was a most desirable thing that a representative should have frequent opportunities of calling his constituents together—of explaining his conduct and satisfying them that he had acted honestly and uprightly. Hon. Gentlemen had very arduous duties to perform, and it was of the utmost consequence that they should stand well with their constituents, and be able to remove any misapprehension that might have existed in their minds. Were they to stigmatise a man who chose to pay a portion of such expense as a person who bribed? He believed some most stringent penalties inserted in the clauses were placed there and contended for, not so much on account of hon. Members desiring purity of election as to save themselves expense. No doubt, if persons distributed refreshment with a view to influence their election it was corruption, but not so when that refreshment was issued indiscriminately as an act of hospitality.

He did not deny that much corruption had existed, of which it was the duty of that House to prevent a recurrence; but he believed there were many instances in which that corruption could be traced to publicans. Nine times out of ten they were at the bottom of the secret; in a large number of cases the charges of the publican were for ten times as much as had been supplied, and much of that which had been supplied had been consumed by those who were not voters. He very much regretted that the proposition which had been made at an earlier stage of the Bill, for the supply of moderate refreshment tickets, had not been acceded to. He felt convinced that a considerable number of the independent voters would not avail themselves of them; and, while they would secure the poorer classes of voters against actual loss in consequence of their attendance at the poll, they would form a salutary check against the charges of publicans, and the Legislature would slowly and gradually, assisted as it was by public opinion, be enabled to strike at the main evil. But the present clause, from its generality, interfered with those with whom the Legislature never intended to interfere. Her Majesty's Attorney General said, he saw nothing in the clause which prevented a man inviting home a voter whom he met to take some refreshment with him; but how would it be if it were served in the servants' hall, and how fine would be the distinction between giving a man luncheon in the servants' hall and allowing a publican to supply it! He thought, on the whole, it would be far better to let the Bill stand without this clause, and restrict penalties to those who gave refreshment with corrupt intentions. If, however, they were determined to retain this clause, the better course would be to legalise the issue of such moderate refreshment tickets as to the Legislature might seem necessary.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said, if the House would consider the position in which the question now stood, they would see that the Bill already provided severe penalties against persons who gave meat, drink, or entertainment to any voter with a view of corruptly influencing him. What formerly applied, under the Act of William III., to a particular period, now applied to the period previous to, during, and after the election. But a question also arose as the giving any sort of entertainment to a voter on the day of nomination and election, and whether or not the House would agree to a clause imposing all the penalties which referred to corrupt treating during the election. That being the case, he thought it necessary that they should consider whether or not such refreshment tickets were prohibited by law; and they all knew there had been many cases before Election Committees where candidates had been unseated on account of having given such entertainment, while there had been other cases in which all the candidates agreed to give moderate refreshment to voters. That state of the law was very inconvenient and incongruous, and it was very desirable the House should decide the question. It had been proposed by Sir Edward Buxton and others, to give a limited amount of refreshment, not exceeding 2s. in value; but the objection to that was that they could not well limit the amount of refreshment to be given in that way, and it would be attended with this inconvenience—that every voter who came up could put in a claim, and thus a general system of treating would arise. Now, it did not seem to him to be very unreasonable that about once every three years there should be two days when it should not be lawful to give meat or drink to persons about to vote. Many poor men went out to their work, taking their food with them, and after staying all day returned home in the evening, and many persons in a higher sphere of life were accustomed to pass a much greater number of hours than the period of the day when an election was taking place without taking more refreshment than they could conveniently carry with them; and therefore he did not see the force of the argument about the inability to attend from want of refreshment. On those grounds he certainly thought they might safely adopt the provisions of the clause, but, as to the amount of the penalty, he did not attach very great importance to it. Their object was to declare, by Act of Parliament, whether they would allow or prohibit that mode of entertainment; and, if they determined to prohibit it, he should not object to the course of attaching a smaller penalty.

Sir FITZROY KELLY said, he fully agreed that it was quite necessary to settle the law by a decision of the whole House, and the only question was, whether they would adopt the clause with or without modification? He considered that to give refreshment tickets to voters would be nothing more nor less than to legalise a general system of treating, which it was one of the objects of the Bill to put down; and he therefore opposed any system of the kind. There seemed to be some reason why a smaller penalty should be substituted, but he trusted that the House would allow it now to pass, and at some further stage see whether some modification could not be introduced; there would be abundant opportunity of moving for a reduction of the penalties.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that the noble Lord the President of the Council would make an election time a fast, but the hon. and learned Attorney General's construction was totally inconsistent with that of the noble Lord, and he must say he could not draw the fine distinctions which the Attorney General entertained, and thought, if they imported the clause into the Bill, it would have to be construed strictly.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, it was all very well for hon. Gentlemen to sneer at going without one's dinner, but how would they like it themselves? He would appeal to Mr. Speaker whether he had ever seen 100 Members in the House between five hours of half-past seven and half-past nine. He should support the proposal for allowing moderate refreshments.

MR. WINN KNIGHT said, he believed, if the voters were not allowed any refreshment whatever, the Bill would have the practical effect of disfranchising a large number of voters who could not afford the expense of attending the election.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, he considered that the hon. and learned Attorney General had done much by his answer to the question which had been put to him that evening to render the question still more complex and difficult than it was before. He (Lord A. V. Tempest) wished to see bribery and corruption put down as much as any one, but he could not consent to the introduction of a clause by the noble Lord which rendered hospitality illegal. [The noble Lord then continued, amid loud cries of "Divide!" to speak until the hands of the clock pointed to ten minutes to four, when he observed that he believed by the rules of the House a division on the subject could not take place that day.]

Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would take the third reading in the evening.

MR. HENLEY said, he understood the third reading was fixed for Thursday.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the Oxford University Bill stood for that night, but he had no objection to fix the third reading of this Bill for Friday. He regretted, however, that the Bill had not advanced as he expected, and as it would have done but for the obstructions thrown in the way.

MR. HENLEY said, the noble Lord was not justified in making that statement, as there had been no disposition shown by him or those who sat near him to obstruct; indeed, if they had chosen, they could easily have prevented the Bill advancing a stage on Saturday, instead of which he had suggested a course which might save time.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not wish to cast any imputation on the right hon. Gentleman of waste of time.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, he wished to ask the noble Lord whether he meant that expression to apply to him? If he did, he was much surprised. He entertained conscientious objections to the Bill, and, therefore, while he was in the House he should not be deterred by the observations of the noble Lord, or any hon. Member on that side of the House, from expressing his objections.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to say there was no objection to the noble Lord's expressing his objections so long as he confined himself to the question.

THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE—SUPPLY— VOTE OF CREDIT.

House in Committee.

The QUEEN'S Message read, as follows—

"VICTORIA REGINA.

"Her Majesty, deeming it expedient to provide for any additional expense which may arise in consequence of the War in which Her Majesty is now engaged against the Emperor of Russia, and relying on the experienced zeal and affection of Her faithful Commons, trusts they will make provision accordingly." V. R.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Mr. Bouverie, I rise for the purpose of asking the Committee to agree to a Vote of 3,000,000*l.* in Supply, usually denominated a Vote of Credit. In performing this task, I think it quite unnecessary to travel through the negotiations which preceded the breaking out of hostilities, or to the causes of the war in which we now find ourselves engaged. I am ready to acknowledge at all times the willingness with which this House concurred with Her Majesty in recognising the necessity of undertaking that war, and the readiness with which it has granted the supplies which have been asked for by the Ministers of the Crown. I have likewise to acknowledge that—having at the commencement of these hostilities stated to the House that it would tend greatly to impede the public service if questions were asked from time to time with respect to the mode of carrying on the war—the Members of this House have been remarkably forbearing in putting questions which might have embarrassed the Government with respect to the conduct of naval and military operations. I have therefore, in the first place, to return the thanks of the Government to this House for the support we have received in the arduous task which we have had to undertake; and, in the next place, I have to state that—which, indeed, is well known to the House—that large expeditions have been fitted out; that, with regard to our Navy, two large fleets of Her Majesty occupy the Baltic and the Black Seas—that they are undisputed masters of those seas, and that the enemy has not ventured to come out of their ports to encounter Her Majesty's arms in either of those seas, which have been hitherto considered as the peculiar domain of the Russian navy. While it must be admitted that this circumstance is gratifying, it no doubt would have been more gratifying to our gallant seamen if they had been able, in fair battle, to measure their prowess against that of the enemy, and to have reaped some of those laurels which have been so amply the share of our forefathers. But, Sir, I may perhaps be allowed to state, somewhat more in detail, the increase which has been made to our naval force in consequence of the Votes of this House since the beginning of the year 1853. Under the head of first, second, and third rates, of steam-vessels we had, on the 1st of January, 1853, only one; on the 1st of July, 1854, we had seventeen. With respect to sailing line-of-battle ships, we had in January, 1853, eleven; we have now eighteen. Therefore, while the steam-vessels of war have increased from one to seventeen, the sailing vessels have increased from eleven to eighteen. The whole number of steam-vessels, which were then 100, are now 139, and the sailing vessels, which were 109, are now 120; and the total number has been increased from 209 to 259. The seamen afloat have also been augmented from 28,189 to 47,595, and the marines from 5,721 to 9,605; so that the total force of these services, which, on the 1st of January, 1853, was 33,910, is now 57,200. With regard to our Army likewise, we have been enabled, by the great exertions which have been made, to place on the Turkish shores a military force exceeding 30,000 in number, a great part of which was lately at Varna and its neighbourhood. I shall, of course, not notice in this House the various criticisms that have been made with respect to the operations of our fleets and armies. As I have already said, great forbearance has been displayed on this subject. The operations of the war have, on our parts, but just commenced, and no person who is acquainted with naval and military operations would agree in those remarks that have been made, depreciatory either of the conduct of any of our admirals or that of any of our generals. But it is impossible not to notice in this place, that while our exertions have been directed to making preparations for war, that ally whom we went to succour—the Turkish army—has performed acts of valour and prowess which are deserving of the highest admiration. In the course of last year, when negotiations were in suspense, it was frequently represented that if we went to the assistance of Turkey we should be extending a useless aid to a decaying State—that we should be seeking to raise an empire already fallen; and, to refer to the language of the Foreign Minister of the Emperor of Russia, it was said, and said by him no later than at Olmutz, that it required but a flip from the Emperor of Russia to overthrow the whole Ottoman empire. So far is it from this being the case that we find the Emperor of Russia, having occupied the Principalities at first with only a small force, and having devoted a whole year to preparations with the avowed purpose that in the month of May in the present year the operations of the campaign would begin with the siege and capture of Silistria, the Russian army which crossed the Danube for that purpose (whose numbers, though not reported at first with specific accuracy, are now stated to have amounted to 80,000 men), have been driven back and repulsed from the outworks of that fortress; and after a siege in which feats of valour were performed worthy of the greatest examples of siege operations either in ancient or in modern times—worthy of Saguntum or of Saragossa—the Russian army has been compelled ignominiously to abandon that object of their attack. Although I have it not in my power to recount any actual operations of war, one circumstance has taken place of too much importance to be passed over in this cursory notice of the present situation of affairs. It was thought by many persons that, however motives of policy might induce the Governments of England and France to combine in an alliance against the aggression of Russia, yet that the wars in which the two nations have so frequently been engaged had left such feelings of national animosity that the two countries could not be induced to any cordial mutual co-operation either by land or sea. We have seen, however, not only the armies of the two nations combined in the neighbourhood of Constantinople with the most friendly feelings, but we have also seen within the last few days a considerable French military force embark on board English line-of-battle ships:—in short, every circumstance that comes under our observation indicates that nothing can be more cordial and friendly than the feeling displayed by the armed troops and seamen of the two nations. While it is impossible not deeply to regret the interruption of peace, still I must say that the establishment of such cordial feelings between two nations which have so often encountered each other in arms, and whose history teems with accounts of many a well-fought field on either side—the establishment of cordial feelings with a nation so near and so powerful as France, is in itself a great security for the future maintenance of the amicable relations between the two nations whom we should ever wish to see united.

In referring now to the present state of affairs, and the necessity which exists for this Vote, I shall refrain altogether going into any details as to the services for which this large sum may be required. With the plan of operations undertaken in Turkey, the Commissariat expenses may amount to a very considerable sum; the Ordnance expenses will also, no doubt, be much greater than they have hitherto been. Some expenses must likewise be incurred for the Navy and for transports—especially for the later operations—which have not been included in any of the Votes which have passed this House. But it is quite impossible to frame anything like a clear estimate of what those services may require, as they will greatly depend upon the nature of the operations which our admirals and our generals may think fit to undertake. Under these circumstances I feel it would not be consistent with our duty to go into any particular estimates with respect to the application of the sums for which I have now asked. Speaking generally, I should think, so far as we can at present foresee, that nearly 2,000,000*l.* will be absorbed in the services to which I have alluded. But we may have other calls upon the resources of the nation, and more especially, among other things, a question has been raised, or rather suggestions have been made, that a large body of Turkish troops might be joined with our Army, and receive pay from the British Government. That is one way in which it may be thought fit to apply part of the resources which I have named; but I avowedly ask for this Vote with the view that Her Majesty's Government may apply the money from time to time for services rendered necessary by the prosecution of the war. I ask the Vote confessedly without an estimate, on the ground that as the usual time of the prorogation of Parliament has nearly arrived, we may be enabled, while Parliament is not sitting, to direct the resources with which we ask you to intrust us to the attainment of such success as may lead to an honourable peace.

I shall now touch upon two other points, and shall do so because, it being near the time of the prorogation of Parliament, I think it is fitting to give to this House as much information as, consistently with the public duty of the Government, I may be able to afford. When I addressed the House last year, nearly at a similar period to the present, and stated that negotiations were then proceeding, I was above all careful not to say anything which would tend to disturb the train of those negotiations or to diminish in the least degree the chance of their success. We are now more certainly at liberty in that respect, and our exertions must now be undisguisedly directed in a different manner to the attaining by the force of our arms and the strength of our alliances that just and honourable peace both for Turkey and for ourselves which we have been unable to procure by our negotiations. In adverting to the present state of Europe, every one is naturally anxious to learn what will be the part taken by Austria on this very important question. I have always maintained that whatever might be the interest of England and France in defending and protecting Turkey, the interests of Austria were much greater. It is impossible to conceive of the Emperor of Russia, if he should succeed in what must now be considered as his designs, namely, the effective control, if not acknowledged dominion, over the Principalities, and an increased and predominant influence in Turkey, without his having at the same time a complete command over the Government of Austria. I cannot conceive how the independence of Austria could be maintained if Russia were to extend her power in the way in which she now evidently intends to do. But in order fairly to consider this question, it is necessary to bear in mind the difficulties with which Austria must have to deal, now that upon more than one side of her empire the Russian armies can approach to no great distance from her capital; and that it would have been imprudent in her to commit herself to arms against Russia unless she had been fully prepared. We must also remember that with regard to two of the kingdoms submitting to her sway, those kingdoms have been in very recent years so greatly disturbed as to make the peril of entering into hostilities greater than it would have been had no such state of things existed. It has, therefore, been the policy of Austria, while declaring that she concurs with us in our objects, to attempt as long as possible by negotiations to obtain a settlement of the question in dispute. Austria has more than once declared that the principles which Her Majesty's Government has laid down, and the objects which Her Majesty had in view, meet with her full approbation; but that she does not despair of Russia evacuating the Principalities and agreeing to terms of arrangement which would secure the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe. Very lately Austria has sent to the Emperor of Russia a message—which has been published in the newspapers within the last few days—asking Russia to evacuate the Principalities—asking her to fix a time for that evacuation at no remote period. With this message Austria transmitted to St. Petersburg the protocol of April, agreed to at Vienna between the Four Powers, in which it is declared that the object of the Four Powers was, that Turkey should be attached to the system of Europe; that that kingdom should form part of the general balance of power in Europe; and that arrangements ought to be carried into effect by the general consent and concurrence of the other Powers of Europe in order to obtain that settlement. An answer has been received from the Government of Russia—an answer which, for my own part, I should hardly call evasive—but which pretended in some sort to be a compliance with the request of Austria. But in the first place Russia does not profess herself ready to fix any time for the evacuation of the Principalities. She declares in effect, that now that war has been declared, that now that the English and French are engaged in hostilities against her, and are superior to her in the Black Sea and in the Baltic, where her fleets do not leave their ports, that there remain only the seat of war in the Principalities and the neighbourhood of the Danube where she can hope to restore the balance, and by the success of her arms obtain victory for herself. She therefore declines evacuating the Principalities. She declares, to be sure, that she is ready to adopt the principles contained in the protocol of Vienna of the 9th of April, those principles being plainly declared to be the evacuation of the Principalities, the granting of privileges and rights to the Christian inhabitants of the Sultan by the Sultan, in such a manner as to ensure these rights; and likewise that a treaty or convention should be entered into between the Four Powers and Turkey assuring those rights. Now, without criticising this reply, there is this objection to it, which all those who have read the protocol will readily admit to be a fair one, and that is, there is a complete omission of that which is the essential part and foundation of the protocol—namely, that Turkey should in future form part of the general system of Europe. That question is the one which is at the bottom of the differences on which Russia and Turkey were engaged in the last war; it is the foundation of the war in which we find ourselves at present engaged. Ever since the victories of the Empress Catharine, the Government of Russia has considered the relations between Russia and Turkey so peculiar that Turkey could not form any alliance with other Powers except with the general supervision of Russia, and that, the greater part of the subjects of Turkey being Christians, they were to look to the Emperor of Russia as their protector and supporter, in spite of and in contradiction, if need be, of their own Government. The object of the Four Powers is, on the contrary, that the Sultan having the right, which he has exercised, of confirming by solemn acts the privileges of his Christian subjects, should be admitted to form part of our general system, should be permitted to govern his own people by the exercise of those sovereign rights which belong to sovereignty in itself, and, forming a part of the general system of Europe, should not look for protection solely to Russia, but should look to the Powers of Europe, singly or united, to maintain him, as they maintain the other States of Europe in their possession. Such, however, being the answer which the Emperor of Russia has given, the Government of Austria—which had informed us of what they intended to do in each of three cases—namely, of the reply being affirmative, negative, or evasive—has considered this reply as evasive, and has asked the Governments of England and France to communicate to her what is their opinion of the proposal which has thus been made. I should have said that not only does the Emperor of Russia require that England and France should be parties to any arrangement by which the Principalities should be evacuated, but that an armistice should be concluded by which we should not by our troops or our fleets in the Black Sea—and I suppose in the Baltic—attack his troops or his fleets while he is evacuating the Principalities. Our answer is, that we cannot admit that this proposal of Russia affords any grounds for peace, and that we must continue to obtain by the force of those armies and fleets which are already engaged in the war such conditions as we may deem necessary for a just, an honourable, and a safe peace. With respect to Austria and the part she may take when she knows our answer, all I can say is, that, although she might be mistaken as to her policy—although I think she has been mistaken in not joining sooner and more frankly with the Western Powers in endeavouring to curb the ambition of Russia—I cannot believe she will forfeit the engagements into which she has entered. Austria has entered into engagements, not only with the Western Powers, but with Turkey. She has declared to the Western Powers, that if the Principalities are not evacuated by Russia, she will use forcible means in order to compel their evacuation. She has stipulated, in a convention with the Sultan of Turkey, that she will endeavour to secure the evacuation of the Principalities by negotiation; but if these negotiations should fail, then that she will resort to other means, and that she will be ready to furnish the number of troops necessary for that purpose. I conceive from these declarations and by these engagements that Austria will be bound to take part in the attempt to drive back Russia from the unjust aggression which she has attempted. Whether Austria may act with that hesitation and delay which have been unfortunately already prolonged too much, or should attempt to gain from St. Petersburg some better and some more satisfactory assurances, I am unable to say. We have, of course, no control over the councils of the Emperor of Austria. With respect to the policy of Austria I have no doubt; neither have I any doubt that she will honourably fulfil her engagements; but, with the difficult circumstances which surround her, with but a poor half-and-half support from the kingdom of Prussia—that she may think it necessary to attempt once more to obtain a favourable answer to her representations at St. Petersburg I cannot say. I have stated this much in order that the House may be in possession of the actual facts of the case so far as I can afford the information. I have stated some things which have not recently taken place, but have also stated the answer which we propose to give to Austria. There has been as yet no formal communication from the Court of Austria on the subject of the answer of Russia; I am, therefore, only speaking of what is contemplated and intended by the British Government when that answer shall have been received.

But, Sir, I think it fair to the House, though on a former occasion I refused, and must refuse now, to bind the Government in any way with respect to the conditions of peace to which Her Majesty's Government would agree, because the conditions of peace must always depend upon the state of the belligerents at the time when negotiations are entered into—yet I think it is fair that I should state what I think is the nature of the conditions which I consider would be absolutely necessary to justify us in assenting to any treaty of peace with Russia. While the negotiations were going on last year, if the Sultan's Ministers had thought proper to advise him to agree to the Menchikoff note, or if at a later period they had advised him to agree to the Vienna note without alteration or subsequent explanation, I believe the people of this country, seeing that the Turkish Government was satisfied to enter into these engagements, and to take the assurances thus offered, would have been well pleased that no war should have broken out, and that the continuance of peace, for a time at least, should have been secured. But the Turkish Government having failed to accept those terms, and having declared that the proposed conditions threatened the independence of Turkey—having refused at all risks and at all hazards, while her alliances were uncertain and her forces were considered by no means equal to those of Russia, to yield to conditions which she thought ignominious, her position is now entirely changed. We are engaged in war—engaged in support of Turkey, with the view of defending her from aggression, and it behoves us to see in any treaty of peace which we may make that we do not leave Turkey in as bad a condition as, or possibly even in a worse condition than, when we promised her our succour and assistance. Let the House consider for a moment what are the dangers to Turkey of a treaty of peace similar to those which existed previous to the continuance of this war. That question has been elucidated by the very clear and masterly despatch of the noble Lord now at the head of Her Majesty's Government, written soon after the Treaty of Adrianople was signed. I intend to read but one passage from the despatch; but that document is one which exhibits those dangers in the strongest light. The despatch states—

"The modes of domination may be various, although all equally irresistible. The independence of a State may be overthrown, and its subjection effectually secured, without the presence of a hostile force, or the permanent occupation of its soil. Under the present treaty the territorial acquisitions of Russia are small, it must be admitted, in extent, although most important in their character. They are commanding positions far more valuable than the possession of barren provinces and depopulated towns, and better calculated to rivet the fetters by which the Sultan is bound."

The despatch goes on to show in what manner this power is secured to Russia. For many years—five-and-twenty years—Russia was content, without any increase of territory, and without bringing her augmented influence to the arbitrement of war, to rest satisfied with the conditions of the treaty. These conditions gave very great power to the Emperor of Russia; and now that the position has been changed it behoves us to consider, not the securities into which he had entered under the Treaty of Adrianople, but the securities which may be had from a Power having had the advantages of the Treaty of Adrianople, and having, moreover, the will and the disposition to push those advantages to the utmost, and to extend her influence even to the subjugation of Turkey. Now, Sir, I say we are justified in so considering the question, because, in the first place, the occupation of the Principalities by Russia was effected under the most flimsy pretences. In the next place, we know, from correspondence which has been produced before the House, that the Emperor of Russia had a fixed idea in his mind that the empire of Turkey was about to fall, and that her neighbours were justified in securing a part of the spoil to themselves. We know more particularly that the possession of those provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia by Russia, under the title of a protectorate with nominal chiefs, was a part of the scheme which the Emperor of Russia had formed in his own mind. We know, moreover, that after a long reign—exhibiting, I must say, great forbearance in many instances of temptation—forbearance in not interfering with the affairs of other nations of Europe—forbearance in not attempting conquests—of the two parties in Russia known by the names of the German party and the Muscovite party, the latter has recently obtained the sway, and that it is the fixed plan and purpose of that Muscovite party to establish what is called a Southern Russia, and that the seat of that Empire of Southern Russia is to be Constantinople—I say, with the knowledge of such a state of affairs, we ought to endeavour to obtain valid securities against acts of aggression similar to that which has so recently taken place. I hold, therefore, that it is impossible that the arrangements which were made by the Treaty of Adrianople with respect to the Principalities shall again be renewed—arrangements which gives the Emperor of Russia a predominant voice in the political affairs of Wallachia and Moldavia—which gives him the power of control in cases where he thinks the affairs are not conducted to his satisfaction, and which, by the destruction of all the Turkish fortresses, gave him facility at any moment for occupying with his army the two provinces, containing 4,000,000 of inhabitants. I say that the integrity of Turkey and the balance of power in Europe could not be secured by reverting to the status quo ante bellum, which would confirm such arrangements as regards Russia and Turkey. But, Sir,

tion of that great and important river—then followed the Treaty of Adrianople. At each step she has weakened Turkey; she has kept Turkey in that situation in which, without giving immediate alarm to Europe, she could dictate at Constantinople. Late years have seen a considerable change in the government of Turkey. I will not say that change has extended to all the interior, or to all the pashas and governors; but the Government of Turkey has seen that there are new and improved modes of government, consisting in dispensing equal justice to all her subjects, whatever might be their religion, which might make Turkey stronger as a Power than she had ever been while her power rested upon the ascendancy of the Mahomedan race, and the subjection and degradation of every other race. These great improvements in Turkey have excited the jealousy and apprehension of Russia. You will see that in no case has the Government of Russia, which has always pretended to be anxious for the extension of the privileges and the promotion of the good of the Christian subjects of Turkey, been favourable to those amendments and enlightened reforms which the Government of Turkey has carried out. On the contrary, the language of Russia has always been, “Turkey must fall unless her ancient Mahomedan maxims are kept in force—Turkey must fall unless her ancient Mahomedan system is kept up in full vigour—Turkey must fall unless the separation between the Mahomedan and the Christian population is duly preserved and strengthened.” Such being the language of Russia, who can doubt what is the ultimate object of that Power. Going from step to step, augmenting her territory, increasing her influence, alienating the Christian subjects of the Porte from their allegiance, her final and ultimate object—which was commenced about the middle, or perhaps before the middle of the last century, and which may not be carried out for some time to come—must be the subjugation of the Ottoman empire and the absorption of a great part of it in her own dominions, while other portions which would remain nominally independent, would in effect be dependent upon her influence and her authority. Such a state of things would be so dangerous to Europe, that we, on our side, must not stop till we obtain some security against such a consummation being reached. She, on her side, I have no doubt, will not stop till she is assured by the events and by the calamities of war, by such repulses as she lately met with at Silistria, and by other and more formidable losses and discomfitures, that the great project of her ambition cannot be executed against the consent of Europe. It is in this mighty contest that Europe is engaged; and I think I should be deceiving this House if I were to tell them that, engaged with such an enemy, with a Sovereign of immense power, of great influence, and of great talents, we may hope for a speedy termination to such a contest. But of this I am sure, that if we were to shrink from that contest—if we were to patch up a peace which would be hollow and insecure, we should lose our Allies, we should lose the confidence and respect of Europe, and Russia would be placed, not in the position which she held previous to the breaking out of hostilities, not in the position which she held from 1829 to 1853, but in such a position that the Emperor of Russia would then justly be called that which by some of his courtiers and flatterers he has been already called—the arbiter of the destinies of Europe. It is our business to prevent that consummation. To prevent that consummation this House has willingly and almost unanimously, not only voted immense supplies, but has been content to forego those blessings of peace which were never more rightly called blessings than during the last few years. We have been willing to forego many advantages to our commerce, and many political and social improvements which might be delayed; but having made these present sacrifices for this great object, let us, at all events, take care fully to secure that object; let us see that, while we can trust with implicit confidence in the gallantry of those men who are placed at the head of our fleets and armies, no weakness in the councils of this kingdom shall prove that those councils are unworthy of the soldiers and sailors whom we have sent to fight the battles of their country on remote fields and on distant seas.

Sir, I have one word more to say with regard to the Vote which I shall put into your hands. I have been informed since I came into the House that it is the intention of an hon. Member to propose in some form or other—I care not in what form—some restriction upon the authority of the Crown with regard to the prorogation and with respect to the reassembling of Parliament. Sir, it is better to say at once that while the right hon. Gentleman opposes the Member for Buckinghamshire may be fairly entitled to contend in argument that it is expedient to have an autumnal Session, and while it may be the advice which the Ministers of the Crown themselves may give that Parliament should again meet in the course of the autumn, still it is not the part of the Ministers of the Crown to accept at the hands of Members of this House restrictions on their freedom in giving to the Sovereign such advice as they may think proper. Circumstances may make it very advisable to meet Parliament again soon, looking to the state of Europe or to new alliances that we may form; but, on the other hand, there may be circumstances in public affairs which would induce the Cabinet to think such a meeting inexpedient. We must be left at full liberty to give such advice as the circumstances of the times, at the time, may seem from us to demand. At the commencement of the century the Coalition Ministry of Lord Granville and Grey were asked by the Sovereign to bind themselves as to the advice which they might give him with regard to a particular measure to which he felt the strongest repugnance. Lord Granville and Lord Grey said that it would be unbecoming in them, as the advisers of the Crown, to bind and fetter themselves by any such engagement. The engagement which those noblemen refused to enter into with the Crown, we must refuse to enter into with the House of Commons. We must, as I have said, be at full liberty to give such advice to the Crown as we may think proper at the time. If we merit at all the confidence of this House—if we are to be intrusted with the disposal of the vast resources of this country—if we are to direct this great war, and negotiate with the Powers of Europe—we must be unfettered as to the time at which we may advise Her Majesty to take the advice of Parliament. There can be no unwillingness on our part to call for that advice, because we have experienced the support and the strength which, during this Session, we have derived in the face of Europe from the unanimous—the nearly unanimous—opinion of the representatives of the people. Anything that happened or was said before the meeting of Parliament might have been represented, and not unnaturally represented, as the impulse of a single meeting, or the opinion of a single individual; but the voice of Parliament could not be mistaken. That voice has pronounced that we are engaged in a just and necessary war, and I am sure it will equally declare that that war is not to be concluded but by a just and honourable peace. Sir, I beg to place the Vote in your hands—

"That a sum, not exceeding three millions, be granted to Her Majesty, to enable Her Majesty to provide for any additional expense which may arise in consequence of the War in which Her Majesty is now engaged against the Emperor of all the Russias."

Mr. ALCOCK said, that notwithstanding the readiness of the House of Commons to vote vast supplies, there was a large portion of the people who believed that the Government had not conducted the war with becoming vigour. There was a general impression abroad that the way to cripple the power of Russia, and bring her to terms, was not to operate on the banks of the Danube, or in Asia, but to attack the Crimea, and take possession of her fleet in the Black Sea. Such was the opinion, among others, of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, Lord Lyndhurst, and the Times newspaper. It was also the opinion of General Macintosh, an officer of high reputation, who had lately published a book on the subject. But what did Lord Aberdeen say? He said, "I will not attack the Crimea at all. I don't intend to touch the Russian fleet in the Black Sea." These were not his exact words, but they expressed accurately enough his intentions; and only a short time ago he stated in another place that his object was to push the English army forward to the Balkan Mountains, with a view to encounter the Russians on the Danube. If such were really his recommendation, nothing could more clearly prove that he did not wish to attack the Crimea or any of the vulnerable parts of Russia. For what purpose had he sent out a cavalry force at an expense equal to one-half of the whole cost of the war up to the present time? Not surely to act against Russia in the Crimea, where alone she could be attacked with effect, because General Macintosh said that no cavalry were wanted in the Crimea, inasmuch as there was a Circassian cavalry force in the neighbourhood which might be employed at little or no expense, and which was equal, if not superior, to any regular cavalry in Europe. General Macintosh was of opinion that 150,000*l.* or 200,000*l.* distributed among the Circassians would enable them to assist effectually in the great object of attacking the Russians in the Crimea. So also with respect to the Persians, who might readily be induced, by a gift of 100,000*l.*, to send an army of 40,000 or 50,000 men to assist the Turks, and drive the Russians out of Georgia and Armenia, thus rescuing some of the finest countries in the world from the clutches of an ambitious and despotic Power.

MR. BANKES said, that as one of those Members who had certainly not interrupted the Government during the progress of the war, he thought the present a fitting occasion to offer a few remarks. The statement of the noble Lord appeared to him to be, on the whole, of a satisfactory character; but he feared the noble Lord spoke his own sentiments only, not those of the Cabinet. The noble Lord had said, he understood there was some Member of the House whose intention it was to offer a proposition binding the Government, to call Parliament together again in the autumn, and he added that he thought such a proposal would interfere unduly with the prerogative of the Crown. He (Mr. Bankes) knew not if any Member intended making such a proposition, but it appeared to him very desirable that there should be an autumnal Session, and he did not see why a respectful Address might not be presented to the Crown upon that subject, without in any way trenching on the Royal prerogative. The noble Lord had himself admitted, that he had hitherto found in the support of the House of Commons a tower of strength in the prosecution of the war; that tower of strength might be wanted again in the autumn, and might be found as beneficial then as it had been before. The noble Lord had made one remark, which appeared to deserve special notice. The noble Lord had intimated that a subsidy would probably be asked for our allies, the Turks. Now he (Mr. Bankes) was far from saying it would be improper to encourage the action of that brave people in this way; but after all they had heard in this House about the days of subsidies being at an end, this must be looked upon as a very important point, and it was one upon which he could not but think the Government ought not to enter without the immediate counsel of the House of Commons. When they were told of the vacillating conduct of the Court of Vienna, he would like to ask the noble Lord whether he was quite sure Austria was not waiting for a subsidy? And if she were, whether the noble Lord was inclined to show such an indulgence to that Power as well as to the Turks? However disposed he might be, under the peculiar circumstances in which Turkey was placed, to be induced, by such arguments as might be brought forward by the Government, to accede to a proposition which should lead that gallant people still to continue the struggle which up to this time they had so gallantly maintained—however disposed he might be to such a course as respected Turkey, with regard to Austria he could hear of no such proposition with any degree of patience; and therefore he thought it would be most inexpedient for the Government in any way to sanction the principle of subsidies, without first procuring the sanction of the House of Commons. There were, then, in his view, many reasons why Parliament should not meet later than November; and it would be no attack upon the prerogative of the Crown, if that House should intimate that the condition of the country was such, either as regarded its internal or its external relations, that they humbly submitted to Her Majesty it was not desirable she should release Members from their duties for any considerable period. If such a proposition were made, so as not to assume the form of any attack upon the prerogative of the Crown, or upon the conduct of the Ministry in carrying on the war, he avowed that he should be very much disposed to accede to it. We were bound to remember that the people of this country had great confidence in that House, and, because they entertained that confidence, had hitherto gone with it in the course taken upon this question. If, however, that House were not sitting during many months, when the pressure of the war taxation was beginning to operate, the people might begin to doubt whether it was expedient at such a cost to maintain the bravery of a falling nation. Deeply should he regret if these sentiments should supersede the more generous ones which ought to animate this nation; but, when they remembered the extension of the income tax to classes hitherto exempt, he thought it would be generally conceded that there was great danger of dissatisfaction springing up among the constituencies, unless their representatives were sitting prepared to answer for their conduct, and to give explanations of the line of policy which it might be thought proper to pursue. With regard to the operations of our land and naval forces, the nation at large would be better satisfied to wait for the striking of some great blow, if those who were the accredited guardians of the State were here to answer any charges which might be brought against the Government. Although the House had sanctioned and willingly agreed to the very large demands hitherto made upon the people, the people, perhaps, might not be entirely satisfied, even up to the present moment, with the mode in which the money had been expended. It might seem minute criticism, but with regard to that arrangement which was made the other day—he meant the establishment of the new office of Minister of War—he was bound to say that the public were very far from being satisfied. They considered that a very unnecessary degree of expenditure had been fixed upon the country, perhaps for ever. Granted that it might be right to have a new office of Minister of War, was it necessary to continue that of the Secretary at War also—was it necessary to make that multiplicity of arrangements which had been made for the purpose of effecting that which appeared so simple an object? In his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War (Mr. Sidney Herbert), whose able speech upon the subject of the new arrangements showed his practical acquaintance with every detail connected with his office, should have been appointed the new Minister, and in that case an unnecessary charge would not have been laid upon the country. When he was told that it would be trenching on the prerogative of the Crown to intimate that Parliament should meet again in the autumn, he must be allowed to say that there had been occasions when the Opposition did not consider it trenching upon the prerogative of the Crown to exact such conditions. What was the case as regarded the Government of my Lord Derby? The history of that period was not so far back that we should forget it. That noble Lord was forced to give a pledge, or something approaching to it, that after the dissolution of the Parliament of 1852, the House should again assemble in the November of that year. It did assemble, and on these grounds—It was said, “You are a new Government—you have not had the opportunity of stating your principles, or the line of policy you will pursue.” At that time it was not considered trenching on the prerogative of the Crown to require that the new Parliament should meet for that purpose—and a very legitimate purpose it was. How stood the case now? We had not a new, but a coalition, Government, formed of very discordant materials—at least they were once discordant, but whether or not so at present the secrecy of the Cabinet would not allow him to say, though it was occasionally evident the harmony of their course was not always uninterrupted. They had heard different language used by the Minister in this House from what had been used by the Prime Minister in the other; and therefore he thought they were justified in expecting that, as Lord Derby was required to meet Parliament in November, so, also, should Lord Aberdeen, that the country might know from time to time the principles on which this important war was being conducted. The strong and explicit language used by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) was very satisfactory; but how do we know that that very evening exactly opposite language had not been held in the other House? True, they might have some "explanations," some old papers moved for, and things raked up from the grave of oblivion, to show that long ago the noble Lord the Prime Minister was a very sagacious and far-seeing man. But what they wanted to know was as to the present line of conduct to be pursued, what the noble Lord would do, and on what terms and principles he will negotiate peace. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had told the House that there must be some great and tangible security for the preservation of peace for the future, that Sebastopol must be denuded of her fleet, and that Turkey must not be menaced by such a stronghold. This was language which the country would hear with very great satisfaction, for he did believe these were the sentiments which were generally entertained throughout the kingdom. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) could not do impossibilities: but they were assured everything would be done to obtain an honourable peace. But, in another place the noble Earl the Prime Minister might hold out a middle course, and qualify the words of the noble Lord opposite; therefore how could we hope that this war would be short, and that the peace to follow would be honourable? The result would be that we should have neither peace nor war, but be held in a vacillating condition, having all the disadvantages of war without any of the blessings of peace. He (Mr. Bankes) saw, therefore, in this and many other considerations, reasons why it might be a very great advantage, however great the personal sacrifice to Members of this House, however great the sacrifice to the noble Lord and his Colleagues—who, no doubt, wished to get rid of the House of Commons on the "early-closing" system—why it would be very desirable that Parliament should be called together again in the autumn; and, therefore, if such a proposition as had been alluded to were made, clear of any objection as to its trenching upon the prerogative of the Crown, and clear of any matter implying censure of the Ministry, that proposition would have his vote.

MR. HUME said, he should not have addressed the House but for one or two circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House appeared to wish it to be understood that the noble Lord had not spoken the sentiments of the Cabinet, but had only been giving utterance to his own opinions. Now, he (Mr. Hume) had certainly understood the noble Lord to state, not his own opinion alone, but the opinion which, at the present moment, was entertained by Her Majesty's Government. Although differences had existed before, he thought it would be a pity that upon so important a question any idea should go forth to the country that there was a difference of opinion in the Ministry now—the head of the Government in one place expressing a certain opinion, and a Member of his Cabinet in this House a different opinion. He should be glad to see the matter put beyond the possibility of question. Unless there was union in council there could be no success in action; and it would not be desirable that it should be supposed that there did exist any want of union. He had heard a great outcry about a Coalition Ministry; now, he (Mr. Hume) saw no possibility of any Government at all without coalition. Let the right hon. Gentleman attempt to form a Government which would give satisfaction to the country and to that House which was not a Coalition Ministry. Times were altered, and he was very glad to see the followers of Sir R. Peel joining the old Liberals in that House, who received them with great pleasure. He hoped, therefore, that what they had just heard from the noble Lord was the joint opinion of the Cabinet, and would be carried into effect. He was sorry to hear his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Alcock) indulge in criticisms as to the conduct of the war. If the hon. Member were Minister of War, he (Mr. Hume) would be very glad to listen to him on the subject; but when he heard complaints as to the little which was being done, he turned to the page of history—he could find no parallel instance in which so much exertion had been made, and so many troops, fully equipped, sent to so great a distance in so short a time as had been done since the breaking out of the present war. He must acknowledge that when Sir Charles Napier was appointed to the Baltic he was rather afraid that the operations under him would be too rapid and too hasty; but, on the contrary, it now appeared that Sir Charles was a man who could consider before he acted, and, he hoped, when the time came, act with effect. With regard to the question of subsidies—and it was upon this that he wished to call the attention of the Committee—he did not think the advance of money would be a good or a wise scheme. During the late revolutionary war we had advanced 66,000,000*l.* of subsidies, every shilling of which he could show had been misapplied, that they had not tended to advance the object for which they were given, that a vast proportion was wasted, and that the system tended rather to paralyse than to excite the energies of the people to whom they were given. The Turks had now, without our assistance, kept the Russians at bay, and, while the English and French troops had not come into contact with the enemy, they had gained the victories, and to them the honour was due. The Turks had done all this without money from us, and, if we once began to supply them with money, the House must not believe that their efforts would be what they had been. When the Russians were driven from the Principalities, as he hoped they soon would be, the Turks would require less expenditure for carrying on the war, and their empire would, he believed, supply plenty of means. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Banks), that he should be sorry to see the granting of any subsidies, even to Turkey, resolved upon by the Ministry without the sanction of that House, for he thought he could see reasons so powerful and so cogent, that the House would never agree to any subsidy again. We went to war in aid of the Turks; let the Turks, then, rouse themselves and collect all the means in their power and all the resources they could command; but let us not begin by offering or giving any hopes of a subsidy. In conclusion, he hoped that upon the Vote asked for by the Government for the further prosecution of the war there would be no difference of opinion, so as to hold out, either to our Allies or to our opponents, the belief that there was likely to be any division on the part of that House, or any want of energy in bringing this war to a satisfactory conclusion.

MR. KNIGHT bore testimony to the bravery of the Circassians, and to the necessity of giving them an ample supply of arms, and the importance of securing them as auxiliaries in this struggle. That people were thoroughly at enmity with the Russians, and they could give us most efficient assistance in the war. The Circassians were a people who were trained to arms from their earliest childhood—every man was a soldier—and when well drilled could easily be converted into most efficient infantry, riflemen, and cavalry; and he hoped that what had appeared in some of the German newspapers with reference to a rupture in the relations between this country and that nation was entirely without foundation. In his opinion, the best means of enlisting the Circassians in our behalf would be to take Anapa, and to place a Pasha there, and then restore the Turkish rule, for although the people might be unwilling to fight in our behalf, they would willingly fight in behalf of the Turks. With respect to subsidies, he differed entirely from the hon. Member for Montrose as to their being never desirable. When the Emperor Napoleon was at Boulogne the question to be considered was, where the battle was to be fought; and as it was difficult to raise men in England, it became expedient to hire men to fight on behalf of this country, and to choose some other ground than this country itself for the battle-field, and as in that case subsidies had been found necessary to accomplish that purpose, so other cases might occur in which subsidies might be found equally desirable.

MR. BLACKETT said, he had no doubt the reception given by the House to the remarks the noble Lord had made that night with regard to Sebastopol would be echoed from one end of the country to the other. But the noble Lord had omitted altogether to refer to what had in reality been the main business to which the power of the Government had been directed for the last six months. Great activity had unquestionably been displayed in collecting troops, in equipping fleets, and in forwarding troops and stores to the scene of action; but he thought it must be allowed that those were preparatory measures, and that the whole force of the Government had been directed to diplomatic action. With regard, however, to the operation of that diplomacy, the House was still without any information whatever since the declaration of war was issued. In his opinion, it was a great misfortune that during the last recess the Government abstained from furnishing the public with an account of these negotiations; but since the declaration of war they had only had some papers with reference to the affairs of Greece, and a few legal protocols, which were absolutely unintelligible without some account of their character and bearing, either supplied by diplomatic papers, or, in their absence, by information communicated to the House. He thought that a misfortune, not only to the country, but to the Government itself. He believed they did themselves great injustice by their reluctance to furnish information. He was convinced that that reluctance gave rise to misapprehensions and suspicions which were most probably unreasonable, and tended to diminish the enthusiasm with which the country had entered upon the war, and without which the best and wisest Government would be incapable of conducting a protracted struggle. He felt this so strongly, that he thought the Vote to which the House was now called upon to agree, and in which he heartily concurred, might fairly be made contingent upon a promise on the part of the Government to lay before Parliament papers with regard to their diplomatic efforts, and especially those relating to that centre of activity, the States of the German Confederation. If, in making one or two remarks on the distinctive character of that diplomatic action, he should fall into error, or undervalue the obstacles which the Government had encountered, he must remind the House that the silence of the Government left no alternative but either to vote the money silently as it was asked, or to incur the risk of errors which, under the circumstances, were unavoidable. It appeared to him that the main character of the diplomacy of the Government during the last six months had been an excessive anxiety to secure the alliance of Austria, and a readiness to forego almost every advantage, and to risk every disappointment, provided they were sure of that connection. He thought they could not have better proof of it than in the treaty which the Sultan had been induced to agree to with Austria, authorising the Austrian occupation of the Principalities. He said induced, because, although this country was no party to that treaty, it was idle to suppose the Sultan would have concluded it, except at the instigation, or, at least, with the encouragement of the British Ambassador. He mentioned that point to show the extremity to which the Government would go, and the equanimity with which they would bear any disappointment, to secure the alliance of Austria. Now, what had been the result of that course of policy? The noble Lord said he did not despair that Austria would fulfil all her engagements. It was surely not straining the meaning of the phrase to say, at least, that the noble Lord was gradually losing any sanguine hope that such would be the case. He trusted, at all events, that this treaty with Turkey was not intended to pave the way for the permanent annexation of the Principalities to Austria, and he was convinced no course would be more contrary to the public opinion of this country and of Europe than that Turkey should be robbed of those provinces which she had, single-handed, so gallantly defended. Passing that over, he wished to remind the Government that this Austrian alliance would not be an unqualified advantage, and that it would entail unavoidable drawbacks. There was another point on which the noble Lord had touched very slightly, which, however, required very careful consideration, and that was, what would be the result of an alliance with Austria in regard to the other States of Germany? No one could have considered the condition of Germany without being aware that Her Majesty's Government were practically driven to the choice of an active alliance either with the Northern or the Southern States of Germany, and that it was almost impossible to contract an alliance of great intimacy with the southern group of States without risking the alienation of the northern or rival group of States. That being the case, he thought the House had a right to ask what account the Government could give of the Prussian alliance, and what causes had operated to disturb the cordiality which lately existed between this country and Prussia. He would remind the House that, with the single exception of France, there was no country in Europe whose alliance was so desirable on so many grounds as that of Prussia, connected as that country was with us by the recollection of struggles which had been waged in union against other Powers that threatened the peace of Europe, connected also by religious sentiment, and by all the moral and intellectual sympathies common to both branches of the Saxon race. And when added to that, was the consideration that united Germany, in the absence of Poland, would ever be the best bulwark against Russia, and that Prussia was called to fill the place in Germany which Sardinia filled in Italy, as the source from which all measures of national progress and utility proceeded, it was impossible, he thought, to over-estimate the importance and value of a firm alliance between Prussia and England. They all knew the unfortunate circumstances which had given a complexion of hesitation and timidity to the Prussian councils, but it was notorious that on several occasions during the last twelve months there was a prospect of the liberal and anti-Russian party regaining the ascendancy in the councils of that Monarch. They should recollect there had been circumstances particularly favourable to the exertions of able diplomacy, and he thought Parliament had a good right to call upon the Government to show that they had not created any obstacles in their own way by receiving the propositions of Prussia in a lukewarm manner, that they had not raised up opposition by their ostentatious partiality for the rival Court of Austria, and that it was no fault of ours that the enlightened policy was no longer pursued which had made Prussia for many years the centre of German nationality and anti-Russian feeling, and had been conducted by a series of statesmen ever since the Congress of Vienna. They knew that the alliance with Austria was recommended, as placing this country in opposition to what some persons called the revolutionary, but what he thought might be more justly called the constitutional and liberal, party in Europe. His conviction was, that throughout these negotiations Austria had been steadily keeping in her eye her own misgoverned provinces, for the purpose of seizing every opportunity to rivet their chains which might be afforded by our indifference or blindness. In the protocol of the 23rd of May was embodied the treaty between Austria and Russia, signed in the preceding April, and guaranteeing to Austria the security of her non-German provinces. By the Federal

Act of 1815, the members of the German Confederation guaranteed to each other tranquil possession of the German provinces, but there was no stipulation as to the non-German provinces; so that the German troops might be called in to suppress disturbances at Munich or Vienna; but if Austria had risings in Italy, she must put them down by her own powers; and if she could not keep Hungary in order, she had no resource but to go suing to the Emperor of Russia, as she did in 1849. It was now conceived that Prussia should give a guarantee for the Italian and Hungarian possessions of Austria. He knew the noble Lord would say that we had given no sanction to this guarantee; but he thought there was great reason to fear that if the time should come when German troops should be marched from all points, to suppress liberal movements in Hungary or Italy, Austrian diplomatists would point to the protocol of the 23rd of May, and say, "It is too late to protest against a principle which has already been recognised." He mentioned that as no chimerical or imaginary danger, but one against which he would warn the Government; for he trusted this would prove to be no step towards making this country an accomplice in supporting the Austrian system of Government in southern and central Europe.

MR. COBDEN: Sir, the speech of the noble Lord has, in some degree, converted this discussion into a council of war, because the noble Lord has displayed what I believe to be very bad strategy on the part of a general—by revealing the object of the campaign and the future purposes of the war. It is not I, therefore, but the noble Lord, who is responsible for publicly discussing the conduct and tactics of the war, and if I say anything calculated to discourage the course which the noble Lord seems, with the concurrence, I presume, of his Colleagues in the Cabinet, resolved to take, I can only plead, in excuse of the publicity of this expression of my opinions, that the noble Lord has been doing what I should have thought an unwise and a very indiscreet thing—always supposing that in discussing the point of occupying the Crimea and capturing Sebastopol we are not discussing it after the work is done. The noble Lord, of course, knows better than we do what orders have been given to the commanders and what are their intentions; and if at the time we are speaking an expedition has gone to the Crimea and captured Sebastopol, it is clear it can do no harm discussing the matter here. It is obvious, I think, that supposing the noble Lord to speak the opinion of the Cabinet, very important changes have occurred in the progress of these events. The noble Lord has told us that the war cannot be concluded by the resumption of the status quo, but that the Government are determined to take material guarantees for the future peace of Europe by taking possession of the great southern stronghold of Russia. Now, we have one advantage in discussing this question to-day. We need none of us be under that apprehension, that feeling of prostrate panic, in which we have been so long accustomed to speak of the power of Russia. I have never joined in that tone, but I have been very much laughed at because I would not join in it. I have never, in the least degree, feared the aggressive power of Russia, always bearing in mind that there is a difference between the power of Russia for aggression and for defence—because I have ever rigorously drawn a line between those two powers. I have been the subject of considerable ridicule on account of the opinions I have formerly expressed on this subject; but will any one now bring forward the old argument of the danger of Russia overrunning Europe, and reviving the invasion of the Huns and Goths, when this deluge of barbarism has been broken into spray against the mere outwork of a third or fourth rate fortress? Why has Russia shown such impotence in the abortive attempt against Silistria? It is simply because Russia has to march an army nearly a thousand miles—from Moscow to the seat of war—before they come to the field of operations, through almost impassable roads, and without a mile's transit by means of railways. According to the marches of our troops it is a three months' journey from the southern capital to the field of operations; and that accounts for these enormous armies on paper being dissipated and vanishing away before they can face an enemy. Every one who has been in Russia, or who has studied the subject, must be well aware that, however mighty the armies Russia can support when spread over that vast territory which figures as about one-half of Europe, besides a large portion of Asia—that however gigantic her armaments may appear on paper—it is utterly impossible, from the nature of the country and of its population, that her armies can ever be concentrated in great masses on any one point. Take, for example, the case of the battle of Borodino. The Emperor Napoleon had given twelve months' notice of his design, having 600,000 troops and all the Continent at his disposal. Yet, with all the preparations consequent on this long notice, no more than 150,000 Russians could be collected to oppose him, and a large portion of them were clothed as peasants, and only armed with scythes. And every one must be aware, who has seen the villages of wooden huts of Russia, and how rarely the traveller comes upon a town with one stone building in it—with a population so scattered, that if you attempt to concentrate troops, the addition of twenty men in a village for a month would eat up all the surplus provision and all the accumulated capital of the place—that it is impossible to concentrate troops and march them simultaneously on any one road. These difficulties must be apparent to every one, and with this last experiment I hope we have had conclusive proof that there is no fear of Russia marching out of her own territory, and invading and conquering the civilised world. I have said again and again, and been ridiculed for saying, that Russia could not carry on a single campaign across her western borders without coming for a loan; and she has not finished a campaign of the present war before she sues in forma pauperis at Amsterdam, and tries to raise money as a loan. I hope, therefore, that I—and those who hold the opinions that I do—need not talk again on this subject under the fear of having it cast in our own faces that we are the friends of Russia. I wish to look this bugbear fairly in the face; but when I speak of the difficulty or impossibility of Russia invading the rest of Europe, on account of the thinness of her population, the impassability of the roads, and the want of means to support her armies, I give the very reasons why we should not invade Russia. The moment you leave your vessels and the points of supply which you can command, you place yourselves in the same difficulties and the same dangers in which Russia is placed the instant she attempts to cross her own frontier. We come, then, to this question. Knowing these facts, and being fully aware of these difficulties, it seems that the Government are not content with going to war to restore Turkey to what she was, but you will make war on Russia and take possession of a portion of her territory. I take it for granted that the Cabinet mean not merely to go and take Sebastopol—that would be nothing if you came away again—but to occupy the Crimea; and I tell the noble Lord this—unless the thing has been already accomplished, he has been guilty of very great indiscretion, because he has given notice to the enemy that that is the point of attack, and that that should be the point of defence. If the noble Lord has in his possession statements from the commanders of the forces in those regions, telling him that the thing is impracticable—telling him that Sebastopol is another Gibraltar, and that it cannot be taken—if he has heard, and if he believes that—and future times alone can settle that point—then he has committed worse than an indiscretion in what he has said to-night. But in this council of war which we are holding, it is not an unimportant question to ask what is the nature of the climate of the Crimea, and what is the disposition of the people towards Russia. It seems to be everywhere taken for granted that, because the people are Mahomedans in religion and Tartars in origin, therefore they must be disaffected towards Russia, and have sympathy for the Turks. Now, that would be an important element in the chances of success, if it were true. But is it so? I have lately been reading a most reliable book on this subject—Mr. Edmund Spencer's Travels in the Crimea—and recollect he is not a defender of Russia—he is as much in favour of a war with Russia as any man is or out of this House. He says that such is the nature of the climate, and so great the danger from fevers in the steppes and valleys of the Crimea during the summer months, that it is almost impossible for a stranger to avoid sickness; and that the Englishmen employed by Count Woronzow complained to him that they were certain to be attacked with fever if they went out in the heat, or if they partook of milk or eggs, or even water, after eating fruit. This was the description of the Crimea by a most competent authority. Now, I have that opinion of the French and English armies, especially when in the presence of each other, and stirred by mutual emulation that I can scarcely conceive of anything which human being can do that they will not accomplish. But I must remind the House and the noble Lord that against these fevers and diseases of which I have spoken, the strongest and most powerful men will be as impotent as the merest child—nay, they will be still more liable to attack from these diseases. All persons who have travelled in the Danubian provinces tell you, that when on board the steamer the captains intimate to them, as evening comes on, that they had better go below to avoid the river fever. But your soldiers can take no such precautions: they must bivouac in ditches; they must, of necessity, do that which in the case of other men would involve the grossest imprudence; they must expose themselves to every risk, and cannot hope, therefore, to escape disease. I trust, therefore, that this element in the difficulty of the enterprise has been taken into calculation by the noble Lord. With regard to the disposition of the population of the Crimea, I have seen assurances given as glibly as you please that that population is most eager to throw off the Russian yoke, and to return to the allegiance of the Turks. But what says Mr. Spencer on this point? He tells us that, even though the Tartars are willing to acknowledge the Sultan as their spiritual head, they have no desire to become his subjects in temporal affairs, for in all his wanderings over the country he had not met with a single Tartar who was anxious to return under the sway of the Turks. The Tartars would tell him that they preferred the rule of the Emperor of Russia to that of their old tyrant the Turk, because they knew precisely the taxes which Russia demanded from them, but they remembered their flocks and herds were never safe from the grasp of the Turkish pasha. Now, in my opinion, before you take possession of the Crimea and hand it over to the Turks, it is important that you should know the feelings of the population. This is not a mere strategical operation; it is a great constitutional question. In my opinion, you have no right to say to the population of the Crimea, "You must become Turks, or English, or French;" you ought to leave them to settle that question for themselves, for it is against all right to dispose of territory in spite of the will and desire of the population. I would not have said this if the noble Lord had not told us that the Government had made up its mind upon the question; and if I did not believe that the time will come when the noble Lord will be anxious to see that excitement allayed which he, as much as any man in the country, has produced—I mean the time when the absurd expectations as to what is to be done in this war must be disappointed—when the people are to be brought to another tone than that which it has suited statesmen to keep them in for the last six or seven months. The noble Lord will not be sorry, then, that something has been said now calculated to diminish the enthusiasm and the too sanguine expectations that have been raised on the subject by the noble Lord himself. But there is another and a far more important point involved in this question. If I have rightly read the protocol which has been issued by the German Powers in relation to this matter—and it appears they are now united as one—they seem to have laid down this fundamental principle as the basis of their entering into negotiations with the Western Powers—that there should be no diminution of the territories of Russia as a consequence of this war. I understand that Austria and Prussia, and the whole of Germany, are as averse to taking away any portion of territory from Russia as they are opposed to Russia seizing upon any portion of Turkish territory. They stand by the settlement of Vienna, and I take it that the apportionment of the Crimea and of Bessarabia were included in the settlement of Vienna as much as the other territories in Europe. When, therefore, the noble Lord says that England and France mean to take the Crimea from Russia, I warn him that that may be held by the German Powers as releasing them from their quasi alliance with us, and may even set them in antagonism to the Western Powers. This will be a source of great future embarrassment to the noble Lord.

But I am anxious now to say one or two words upon another part of the question. Now that there is no longer a chance as to the power of Russia—now that no one any longer entertains a fear that she will overrun the rest of Europe—I think it may be possible for us to pay a little more respect to the rights and immunities of weaker communities; and I am anxious, therefore, to bring under the notice of the House our proceedings with regard to the Christian populations of Turkey. I have not brought down with me the blue books relating to Greece, and therefore the House need not fear the inflection upon them of long extracts from these blue books; but I wish something to be said in this House to show that we do not neglect or forget those who have not the power at present to do justice to themselves. In speaking of the Greek Christians of Turkey, let it be at once understood that I do not raise any discussion as to the kingdom of Greece. I do not defend King Otho, or his Ministers, or his Queen. I admit that all which the noble Lord—all which Mr. Wyse—all which our Consuls in that part of the world have said with respect to the Court at Athens may be founded in truth and justice. I have not a word to say in defence of them—they are not my clients. But I may say a passing word with respect to the kingdom of Greece—and if the creation of that monarchy has not been followed by all the success which so many sanguine Philhellenes expected, I do not think that that is attributable to the Greek people. I am willing to admit that there has been a complete failure in the Greek monarchy, but there has been no failure in the Greek race. They have done more than any other people, sunk for many hundreds of years in most abject slavery, would have done in the same period—they have done far more than enough to justify the good opinion which was formed of them, and to inspire their friends with hope and confidence for the future. When I speak of the Greek race, therefore, I do not mean to speak of the Greek monarchy, that miserable blunder of diplomacy which cut off from Greece the provinces of Thessaly, and Epirus, and Macedonia, the cradle of the Hellenic race—which imposed upon the poorest part of the country and the most devastated by civil war a monarchy, a civil list, an army and navy, a diplomatic corps, and all the paraphernalia of a great and powerful monarchy—which saddled them with a loan of 2,000,000*l.* sterling, of which not more than 20,000*l.* was spent on objects beneficial to Greece. It was not surprising that all this should break down, and that Greece, unable to bear these burdens, should have lost all hope of paying its debts, and should have become the battle-ground of intrigue among the three guaranteeing Powers. The Greeks I wish to speak of are the Greeks who have been left under the sovereignty of the Porte. The Duke of Wellington was in power when the Greek monarchy was founded, and wishing to retain territory for Turkey, he cut off from the Greek monarchy Thessaly, Epirus, and Macedonia, the very cradle of the Greek race. The consequence of the absurd line of demarcation he then made was, that considerable numbers of Greeks from the Turkish provinces had emigrated into the kingdom of Greece, and those who remained had never abandoned the hope that the day would come when they might be able to rejoin their fellow-countrymen in the monarchy of Greece. They believe that they have found this opportunity when they see that Turkey is involved in a war with Russia, and the Greek race under Turkish rule, seizing the opportunity, instantly rose in rebellion. I am not going to deny that Russia, acting through the medium of the Court of Athens, has favoured this insurrection; what I maintain is, that the Greek race under the Turkish rule, having found this opportunity to rise in rebellion, have availed themselves of it as they would have done if Turkey had been involved in a war with France or England, for the Greeks look upon all wars with Turkey as a war in their favour. Now, I will not go so far as to turn round and protest that this is all the secret intrigue and manœuvre of Russia, because the founders of the Greek monarchy cannot exculpate themselves from the charge of being the cause of this movement; they have no right to describe it as being all the work of Russia, or to pretend that the Greek race would not have risen if, instead of the Emperor of Russia, some other Power had been at war with Turkey. The official papers published by the Government, the letters of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, the communications from our Consuls in various parts of Turkey, all predict that a revolution is about to take place; and even Lord Clarendon, in a letter to the Earl of Westmoreland, distinctly says that in case of a war with Russia the Christians will rise in rebellion, not in aid of the Russians, but in aid of themselves. Well, then, the insurrection thus predicted, and justified by a long course of tyranny, abuse, and iniquity, stated by English authority to have been practised by Turkey against her Christian subjects, having broken out, what is our course with regard to the Christian population of Turkey? The moment that insurrection takes place, we use every means in our power to put it down or discourage it. Our Consuls issue proclamations, our ships of war are sent upon the coast, for the same purpose; we even express a wish that Austria should draw a military cordon round the frontiers, and matters go so far that one of our gallant captains (Captain Peel), being instructed to go to Prevesa, and to assist in putting down the insurrection, demurs to his instructions, and tells the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands that he does not consider it any part of his duty to put down insurrection in the Ottoman territories. There is, therefore, no doubt that, partly by moral means, partly by means of a more material kind, England and France have succeeded in putting down the insurrection of the Greek Christians in Turkey. But are we not thereby in some degree committed to these Greek Christians? Have we not pledged ourselves to them beforehand that we will see justice done to them? We have it again and again stated by Lord Clarendon and by the other Ministers in Parliament that one of the objects of this war is, that we should secure the rights of the Christian population in Turkey. That may be right or it may be wrong. Lord Derby and his Friends have all along declared that we ought not to mix ourselves up in the internal affairs of other States. I must confess that I am much of the same opinion, and predict that hence will arise one of our future difficulties; but, however this may be, you have involved yourselves in promises which you cannot evade, and having put them down when they rose in insurrection, it is due to that population that the House should feel its responsibilities and see justice done to them according to the declarations they publicly uttered. He would say that on another ground also—that of expediency—this should be done. Let it be remembered that, after all, three-fourths of the population of Turkey in Europe are Christians; and though you may find, in a time of war, that the Turks, who are the only part of the population that are armed, alone fight the battle of the Sultan, yet depend upon it when the time of peace arrives—if it ever does arrive in our day—you will find that you cannot go on maintaining the permanent ascendancy of that race. Mind that the Christians are the sole progressive element in Turkey. I know I am liable to be met with the statement, "See how the Turks have fought." The Turks always have fought well, and it is to be remembered that most of the Turks now in arms are not European Turks—they are brought from Asia, and many of them from Egypt; but what I have always found deficient in the Turks is, not military prowess, but the elements of progressive civilisation. I may be subject to a six months' taunt for the statement, but as sure as I speak from this spot, so sure is it that when the time of peace comes, the Christian population—who are the only progressive population in Turkey, and, without bigotry, I say progressive because Christian—the Christian population of Turkey in Europe will rise into the ascendant in the eyes of statesmen. The Emperor of Russia knows that fact well, and therefore he is constantly appealing to the sympathies of the Christian race—therefore he promises to be their protector—therefore he appeals to their prejudices, if you will, for he knows that eventually and permanently they will govern the destinies of Turkey. Even now all the external commerce of Turkey is carried on by Christians. I can scarcely find a single Turkish merchant in any one of the great towns of England. All the merchants are Greeks, born subjects of the Porte, but all have left their native country and become naturalised in others. The wealth, the intelligence, the prosperity of Turkey in Europe are all the possession of the Greek merchants. I do not mean to say that the Armenian race are devoid of intelligence—they have distinguished themselves as bankers, as architects; but what I mean to say is, that the Greek race, par excellence, contains in itself the elements of progress; and this is the people whom you are alienating from your sway. I have no hesitation in saying that, by the course you have taken in putting down the insurrection in Turkey, you have discouraged their attempts to emancipate themselves from the slavery under which they suffer, and you have, in a great measure, put yourselves in a state of antagonism towards the whole Greek race. There is no doubt that we are unpopular among them, and that they are not heartily anxious for our success. But this question of our conduct towards the Christian population in Turkey gives rise to another consideration of great importance. You are now at the beginning of war. You know not how soon it may break out in other localities. What are these outbreaks in Spain, but the mere echoes of the cannon that are fired on the banks of the Danube? Who knows where it may explode next? Faint murmurs have already been heard in Italy; and we all know that very great dissatisfaction exists among some of the largest States on the continent of Europe. I want to know then, once for all—is it to be understood, in case of a war on the Continent, that we are to ally ourselves with the sovereignties and against the nationalities? I ask this with the most perfect fairness and impartiality, because I am against all interference either on the one side or the other. I have proclaimed it over and over again, that I would not go to war to help either the one or the other. But what I want to know is, whether this war is to be carried on elsewhere on the same policy that it has been carried on in Turkey? We have helped to put down the Greek Christians in Turkey, in comparison with whom the Hungarians and the Italians have no grievances to allege against their Governments which could for a moment be set in contrast with the grievances that the Christians in Turkey have to endure, for the Christians in Turkey are not only deprived of all liberty, but of all law. The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard) shakes his head. I put to him this question, Can a Christian in Turkey be a magistrate? can he be a cadi? The hon. Member knows as well as I do that the laws of Turkey are administered according to the Koran, and no Christian could administer law according to the Koran. I want to know, then, whether this same policy is to be pursued towards other countries. No doubt, a great delusion has prevailed in the minds of the people of this country as to the purposes and objects of this war. We have all seen and experienced it. There is a row of hon. Gentlemen below me who have largely shared in that delusion. I know their sentiments. Of course, I do not presume to be the exponent of the opinions of the hon. Member for West Surrey; but we know that the others sympathise largely with Hungary and Italy and the other nationalities. [Cheers.] The hon. Gentlemen cheer me. Those hon. Gentlemen who used to be called Young India may fairly be considered as the representatives of the delusion which is shared in by multitudes out of doors. They have all along been under the impression that this war was undertaken in defence of the interests of Hungary and Italy, and other oppressed nationalities. Now, is that the case? We have lately heard an eloquent voice raised among us, giving utterance in the English language, never better expressed, in some of the most populous districts of our country, to the sentiment distinctly declared that this was not a war undertaken in the interests of Hungary, but that it was a war against Hungary, and in the interests of the oppressors of Hungary. Now, is that true, or is it not? I know these hon. Gentlemen are great admirers of the Hungarian chief to whom I have alluded, and they will admit that he is as good a judge of what is for the interest of his own people as they can be, or any one else. Yet that eminent man has declared that this war, as it is at present carried on, is a war to increase the power of the oppressors of Hungary, and to rivet the chains by which Hungary is bound in subjection to Austria. I wish to know the opinion of these hon. and deluded Gentlemen on this matter. I have heard them resorting to a device that is more ingenious than logical—crying out that the Government is not carrying on the war as they ought to do, and that we ought to have another man at the head of the War Department, or for another head to the Government itself—calling out, in fact, for Lord Palmerston, and all this they have done in the interest of the Hungarians and Italians. But what say the illustrious chiefs who are entitled to speak the sentiments of the down-trodden nations to whom I have referred—what do they say on this point? To my own knowledge, the chiefs of Italy and of Hungary have proclaimed it without stint or reserve, that so far from their hopes and aspirations resting on the noble Lord, when the noble Lord had an opportunity of giving these nations moral support—and no more was then asked of him—he would not utter the faintest whisper in their behalf; and if there is any man in the Cabinet whom the leaders of these nations are least disposed to rely upon at the present moment—I speak it advisedly—it is the noble Lord whom these hon. and deluded Gentlemen are constantly calling upon to assume the helm in a war that is to be managed, not for the interests of Austria, but for the interests of Italy and Hungary. I do not say this in disparagement of the noble Lord, for I never asked the noble Lord to go to war, and I do not think that he is the author of the great imposture that has been practised in his name. But there are many who are weak enough to labour under the delusion in the House, and there is a great mass of the people out of the House who are under the impression that the noble Lord when in the Cabinet was constantly and assiduously acting in favour of these nationalities, and that if the war were carried on under his auspices assuredly it would be brought to a conclusion satisfactorily to the suffering people. The delusion has been happily exploded, and that is a most important fact. You have a good deal of popularity with respect to this war amongst the masses. I have never denied that fact, and though I have been called a demagogue, yet I have never stooped to shape my course according to the fleeting popularity of this or that among the mass of the people. Nay, I have to confess that there is so much of stubbornness in my nature that when a popular cry is got up on one side, I am disposed to examine the other, and see if there be any truth in its favour. Well, the delusion has been to a great extent dissipated, mainly, I believe, through those eloquent harangues to which I have already referred—which were listened to by thousands—which have since been extensively read, as they deserved to be, for they are lessons in the English language, though produced by a foreigner—and they have produced a considerable change in the public mind. A day of reckoning must at last come between the Government and the people, as to the objects and purposes of this war. I believe that, when this object has been explained, it will be found that it has not been undertaken in the interests of Hungary and of Italy. I never believed that an alliance formed between Lord Aberdeen, the Emperor Louis Napoleon, and the Grand Turk, could be entered into in favour of revolutionists. That is indeed a delusion which surpasses all the popular delusions that have existed in modern days; but whatever delusion exists out of the House it is always sure to be represented by somebody within its walls. The time will come when this war will be stripped of all the popularity that has been attached to it from the supposition that we were fighting in the interest of nations, and then will come the bald and naked statement that you are fighting to maintain the balance of power. But I do not think that popularity will be long maintained for an object of that vague nature. There has been a burst of enthusiasm in this country because it has been thought that we were going to fight for somebody's freedom. The noble Lord has now made his plunge—it was some time before he could make up his mind to take it; but in stating what were the objects of the war he has used phraseology with respect to Turkey which is rather calculated to discourage those who thought that the people of Europe were interested in the matter. He tells us that we have gone to war for the sovereign rights of the Sultan of Turkey—he spoke of the rights of sovereignty, and that we could not allow any one to interfere with them, the rights of sovereignty of the Sultan, as the representative of all Turkey. Now, I do not think that the people of this country will continue to bear a heavy pressure of taxation only for the purpose of maintaining the sovereign rights of the Sultan of Turkey. The people of this country are too much interested in the independence of nations, and when it is once found that this is a war for the advantage of an individual and a class, it will not long be popular in this country. But are we not in danger of depopularising this war elsewhere? I have been at some pains to get information as to the opinion entertained of this war in America. I am not speaking of the papers conducted by Irishmen. No, they are not Irishmen, because there is one of them at least whom every Irishman must repudiate—the man who goes from Ireland advocating freedom, and settles down in New York advocating black slavery—that man I am sure every Irishman will repudiate. But look at the more respectable journals in America. A considerable change has come over their opinions, with regard to the present war in Europe. No doubt they all agree, as we all agree, that Russia has made an unjust and wanton aggression upon Turkey. But the people of America, like the people of England, had the idea that this war was to lead to a general bouleversement, and that out of it something would arise favourable to freedom. But they begin now to see that this is to be a war of dynasties and of diplomatists, and that little or no concessions are to be made to the people, and with dynastic or territorial wars they have no sympathy. I observe, also, that a considerable change is taking place among the periodicals of Germany, and particularly in Prussia. In Prussia there has always been a very strong sympathy for the Greeks. Several of them have indulged in severe remarks upon our conduct to the Greek Christians in Turkey, and one of the members of the present Chamber of Berlin observed, in a speech lately delivered, that he had always hitherto been a great admirer of England, and looked upon her Government as a model in regard to freedom of Government, but that he had altogether changed his opinion since he had seen her conduct towards the Greek Christians. That feeling is likely to spread; and remember it cannot be concealed—for you have already published in your own official papers that the Greeks have grievous oppressions to complain of: therefore you are your own judges, and will be your own judges if you now say that these oppressions do not exist. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe was sent to Turkey, because the Government had confidence in him, for the purpose of seeing that her internal affairs were better managed, and that he might protect the Christians from the oppressions they had to endure. The noble Lord finds himself in some embarrassment. The Turks have, hitherto, been fighting their own battles; and, though I am a peaceable man, if I had been War Minister the Turks would not have been left to fight their battle by themselves, because I like to do a thing in earnest when I undertake to do it. You have allowed the Turks to do everything, and you are involved in this difficulty—it is not likely the Turks will be very docile in listening to you henceforth in the internal affairs of Turkey. You have put down the Greek insurrection, and you have made a promise that justice will be done to them; but it is likely that the Turk will take his stand upon his sovereign rights, and say he will not allow any person to interfere in the internal affairs of his country. You have gone further than you should have gone in Thessaly and Macedonia. I have seen the papers, though they have never been laid before Parliament. The Consuls exhorted the Greeks to lay down their arms, and even threatened them if they did not lay down their arms. There was a pressure put upon the Christian population of Turkey, but always with the promise that England and France would see that justice was done to them. But not only had the British Consuls in Greece held out these promises to the Greeks, but Lord Clarendon and other Ministers had made the same declarations—the Allies were therefore involved in serious obligations. And as you are going now to have possession of Turkey, for probably a long time—for he must be a sanguine man who at my age thinks he will live to see the English and French troops taken away from Turkey—it is not out of place for him to put in a word in favour of those who are helpless now because they are disarmed, and who, according to your own statement, have been oppressed. I beg again to be understood that I do not defend the monarch of Greece; I am not champion of the King or Queen of Greece; but I speak for the Greek Christian population in the Turkish territory, who are the great support of the country and carry on all its commerce. I presume, according to the declaration of the noble Lord, that we shall have many opportunities of discussing this war question. The noble Lord has expressed the opinion and intentions of the Government, and until we have a change of Government I think we shall not be likely to have peace. For myself, for the reasons I have stated, I think it would be just as likely that you should take a part of the United States and keep it permanently, as that you should be able to seize a portion of the territory of Russia and retain permanent possession of it. If that is to be your task, and if you will not be content with driving the Russians out of Turkey, you have involved this country in a war which one or two additional screws of the income tax will not satisfy. You will have more taxation to bear, and before you have much experience in it, the people will become a little more dissatisfied. The noble Lord is a great reader of history, and I should be astonished if, before he committed himself to this policy, he did not recall a passage in the Stowe Papers recently published by the Duke of Buckingham. I quote from a recent number of the Quarterly Review. The passage is this—

"Indeed Lord Grenville declares, that a blind and unreasoning eagerness to go to war is one of our most fixed national characteristics. In a letter to the Marquess of Buckingham, dated April 28, 1797, published in the Courts and Cabinet of George III., he says, 'It is a curious speculation in history to see how often the good people of England have played this game over and over again, and how inconvertible they are in it. To desire war without reflection, to be unreasonably elated with success, to be still more unreasonably depressed by difficulties, and to call out for peace with an impatience which makes suitable terms unattainable, are the established maxims and the regular progress of the popular mind in this country.'"

Mr. LAYARD: Mr. Bouverie, Sir, after the opinions I have expressed in this House, and the course I have pursued, it will not be anticipated that I am about to throw any difficulties in the way of Her Majesty's Government in obtaining additional supplies for carrying on the war. One thing, however, appears to me to be absolutely necessary, and on this I think the Committee will be disposed to concur with me—that before voting the estimate before us we should receive distinct, positive, and satisfactory assurances as to the real object Her Maesty's Government have in view in carrying on the war, and as to the general results with which they will be disposed to be satisfied before concluding a peace. I am willing to admit that we have this evening heard from my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council declarations which are satisfactory as far as they go. I confess that when my noble Friend commenced his speech I scarcely anticipated such a termination to it. My noble Friend appeared to me to be addressing the Committee in a more subdued tone than that which has hitherto characterised his speeches on this great question; but he warmed as he proceeded, and concluded by pointing out what our true policy and what our object should be in prosecuting this war, in words which commanded the unanimous approbation of the Committee, and which will, I am convinced, prove equally satisfactory to the country. There are, however, still one or two matters of great importance which require explanation, and upon which I trust we shall have some information from Her Majesty's Government before the conclusion of this debate. Considering the part I have taken in this House upon this question, I should not be discharging my duty were I not to bring these points under the notice of the Committee, and in endeavouring to do so I shall have more need of its indulgence than I have ever hitherto had when addressing this House. But before entering upon the principal object of the debate or the general policy of the Government, I am anxious to say a few words in reply to what has fallen from my hon. Friend—and I trust he will permit me to return the compliment he has paid to those who are sitting below him, by adding my "deluded"—Friend the Member for the West Riding; for although these Gentlemen may be "deluded," yet my hon. Friend seems to me to be labouring under still greater delusion, as I shall presently show, than perhaps any other Member of this House. Long before I had the honour of a seat in this House and of enjoying the personal acquaintance of my hon. Friend, I was accustomed to read his speeches with great admiration, but then they were on subjects with which my hon. Friend was intimately acquainted. I wish I could say as much upon the present occasion, but I am bound to say I feel surprised that a Gentleman of the well-known abilities and acuteness of my hon. Friend should be capable of making the speech which we have just heard from him, abounding, as it did, in the most extraordinary and most palpable inconsistencies. My noble Friend has principally dwelt upon three points: the comparative strength of Russia, the condition of the Greek population, and the obligation which our policy imposes upon us with regard to the revolutionary element in other European States. Now, I am ready to meet him upon the three points. What is his position with regard to the first? He declares that the strength of Russia has been enormously exaggerated, and that we now see that, like a great wave advancing towards the shore, when she meets a rock she breaks into mere spray. But let me ask if that rock were not there might she not, instead of breaking into spray, roll onwards and carry everything before her? We are that rock—we are endeavouring to break the force of the wave, and to render it harmless. Are we to allow her to gain strength day by day until she becomes formidable and is really able to threaten Europe. Now is the time to meet her, when she is, as my hon. Friend states, neither strong nor formidable. It is not by waiting until she has absorbed the greater part of Turkey—until she has gained over to her its Christian population—as we have just heard from my hon. Friend she has absorbed and gained over the Tartar population of the Crimea—that her strength will be diminished, and that we shall be better able to contend with her. Surely, such would not be a wise policy—every day's delay could but add to the danger. The argument of my hon. Friend appears to me to be of all others the one which should induce him to give his support to the war. With regard to the second argument advanced by my hon. Friend, I must remind him that he has again fallen into the error which he has repeatedly committed, and which is by no means peculiar to himself, of mixing up all the Christian races inhabiting the Turkish empire and calling them Greeks. Every one who is acquainted with the nature of these different races—their antagonism in language, feelings, habits, and even in some cases, in religion, is aware how absurd such a proceeding is, and how impossible it is to maintain any argument based upon such an assumption. As I have already more than once pointed out how little we can judge of the feelings and opinions of one race by those of another, I will not recur to the subject. In order to show the oppression to which the Greeks, as he calls them, are subject, he asked me whether a Christian in Turkey can become a cadi or a magistrate? As to a Christian becoming a cadi, my hon. Friend does not appear to be aware that a cadi is the administrator of the Mussulman law, as based upon the Koran, and he might as well ask whether a Mussulman could become Archbishop of Canterbury. With regard to a Greek becoming a magistrate, there is no doubt whatever that he can. By the Tanzimat, or reformed system, the local administration in which the provinces and districts of the empire is carried on by a council formed by the pasha, or governor, the head of the Mussulman law, the bishop, or head man of the Greeks and Armenians, and whatever other Christian sects may be found in the country, and, with a liberality not even known in this country, by the chief of the Jewish community. It is, unfortunately, true that in most cases the power falls almost entirely into the hands of the Mussulman members of the council; but for this the Christians themselves are to blame. They are too generally men of bad character, given to drunkenness, and other vices. They soon become objects of contempt to their Mussulman colleagues, and are not consulted in the administration of public affairs. If, on the contrary, the Christian members of the council were men of character and spirit, and would assert the rights which had been bestowed upon them, and which the Sultan had now solemnly admitted to belong to them, they would undoubtedly in that case, although perhaps for a time exposed to difficulties and persecution, obtain the position which has been ceded in principle to them. If in such cases, when the pasha is disposed to prevent them enjoying the authority which has been given to them, they appealed to the Porte, I have no doubt that in that case they would obtain complete redress. The fact is, that as yet the Greeks, or rather let us say the Christians, of Turkey, want character, courage, and principle to enable them to become independent. Let me ask my hon. Friend, now that he is drawing comparisons between the Turks and Greeks, whether, if the Greeks had been in possession of Constantinople and of Turkey in Europe instead of the Turks, they would have been able to resist the aggression of Russia—whether they would have made the noble stand which the Turks are making for their national independence? I have not a doubt that, long ere this, the whole of what now constitutes the Turkish dominions in Europe would have been swallowed up by Russia, had it been in the hands of the Christians. My hon. Friend is accustomed to address me as if I were a Turk. Now, let me set him right upon that point. I am not more of a Turk than he is himself. I have endeavoured, from the very commencement, to make this question a great European, and not a Turkish question. It is not whether the Turks are to remain at Constantinople, but whether Constantinople is to fall into the hands of Russia. I believe that the Christians of Turkey, whether Greeks, Sclavonians, or Armenians, have great qualities—qualities which may one day render them fit to hold rank as an independent nation, and to become a real check upon Russian aggression in the East—and I believe, moreover, that the time will come when they will be ready and able to assert their independence; but I have no hesitation in saying that that time is not yet come, and that, in endeavouring to force it on, you will render it far more remote than it now is, and perhaps will render impossible the accomplishment of that which you now advocate. I believe, and I think no one acquainted with the condition of the Christian populations of the East will be inclined to deny, that if you had left Greece, not under the direct government, but under the protection of Turkey, as in the case of Servia, she would have been far more prosperous at this moment, far nearer the fulfilment of that destiny which may be in store for her, and ready to receive, as an addition to her territory, those provinces which might have been better annexed to Greece, even in the interest of Turkey, than left under the dominion of the Sultan. I cannot but contrast the happy and independent condition of Servia, with the miserable state of Greece. Instead of being erected into an independent State, and burdened with all the expenses and annoyances of a court, a diplomatic service, and similar establishments, the curse of an infant State, the Servians were left under the protection of the Porte, the only thing which interfered with their liberties and independence being the so-called protection of Russia. I cannot better illustrate the result of this state of things in Servia, than by quoting from a document which has been laid upon the table of this House—the protest of the Servians against the occupation of their territory by Austria. They declare—

“As far as concerns internal insurrections, we fear them now less than ever. The whole nation is perfectly convinced that its most precious interests impose upon it the maintenance of tranquillity and order, and the avoidance of anything that could involve it in the war, and turn Servia into a battle-field. Filled with a deep gratitude to the suzerain Court for the privileges which have been graciously confirmed to them, and for the attitude which they have been allowed to hold during this war, the government and people of Servia are too much alive to their own interests, and too much attached to the happiness of their country, to hesitate a moment as to the line of conduct to be followed. Their consciousness of their own situation will preserve them better than any threats whatever from all false and injurious measures.”

Would that Greece, alive to her true interests, and mindful of what she owes to Turkey and to Europe, had held similar language and pursued a similar conduct! She would have been in a very different position to what she now is, and would have given more hope to those who are her real friends and well-wishers. My hon. Friend declares that there was a spontaneous rising throughout the Turkish frontier provinces in favour of the Greeks. I deny this altogether. Not anticipating a Greek debate, I am not provided with extracts I had made from the blue book, and from authentic letters from those personally acquainted with the subject, which would prove beyond a doubt that the Greek population, when they did rise, were forced into insurrection, and induced to join the invaders by false statements. The moment the English and French Consuls informed them of the real state of things, and that England and France had not united with Russia against Turkey, as had been falsely declared by the Greek agents, they returned to their allegiance to the Porte; and I could quote many instances of the extreme cruelty exercised by the so-called patriots to compel the inhabitants of Turkish villages to join them. I will only allude to the conduct of General Grivas at Mezzovo, which is described in the blue book. The third argument dwelt upon by my hon. Friend is this, “that as we have aided the Porte in putting down the Greeks, we must also aid Austria to put down the Italians and Hungarians in case they should rise.” I am surprised that my hon. Friend should have drawn such an inference. Why did we interfere in Greece? Because the Greek Government endeavoured to raise the Christian population of Turkey and thereby to aid Russia, and to impede the action of the Allies. We were bound, even by strategical considerations alone, to interfere, and Her Majesty's Ministers are perfectly justified in the course they have pursued. Had the Greeks risen against their own Government, in favour of a constitution, or for any other reason, we should not have meddled with them. If the Italians were to cross the Adriatic, to incite a rebellion in Turkey, or the Hungarians to enter Bulgaria for a similar purpose, we should, of course, look upon them as hostile to us, and act accordingly. With their own affairs we should have nothing to do. My hon. Friend has stated that the Liberal party in Europe are opposed to this view, and he has particularly instanced M. Kossuth as denouncing it as a war waged in favour of the interests of the oppressors of his country. I have the greatest admiration for the eloquence and abilities of the great Hungarian leader, and I should deeply regret to find him impeding this country in the prosecution of this just war. Let me ask what his own case is. A fugitive from the vengeance of Austria, he received sympathy and protection in Turkey. He owed his very life to the Sultan, who risked war with his then most powerful neighbours to defend him. At that time, I have reason to believe, my hon. Friend himself wrote letters to the Turkish Minister in London, urging the Porte to persevere in its determination not to give up the Hungarian refugees, and promising that if at any time the Porte needed his assistance and support, they should be heartily given to it. Is the hon. Member now fulfilling his pledge? The Porte has rendered its greatest services to the Liberal party in Europe. Not only Hungarians, but Poles and Italians, and men of those countries who had been compelled, from political causes, to fly their native land, have received protection and the most hospitable treatment in Turkey. They have received employment in her cities, and command in her armies. If the Liberal party were now to be found allied with her enemies, they would indeed be guilty of the grossest ingratitude. I trust we shall have no further discussion on the subject of the Christians of Turkey. The time is not come for it yet. The Christians are most undoubtedly entitled to protection, and we are under certain obligations to insist upon that protection being afforded them. Although there have hitherto undoubtedly been numerous cases of oppression and injustice, yet, on the whole, they are far less numerous than is generally believed. We have done much towards preventing their recurrence, and that hitherto without straining our influence in Turkey too much, or having recourse to undue interference. All we have to do is, by the assistance of our Consuls—very intelligent and prudent men for the most part—to bring to the notice of the Porte such cases as occur, and redress will generally be given. My hon. Friend attributes the want of character of the Christians, and their inability to govern themselves, to Turkish misgovernment and to their being under a Mussulman yoke. That such is not quite the case, surely the actual condition of Greece is sufficient to prove; and I may further point to the island of Samos, which governs itself under Turkish protection. The fact is, we can never hope much of the Greeks until their national character is modified by education and intercourse with Europe. I believe that this end will be best accomplished by leaving the Christian population of Turkey for some time to come under the Government of the Sultan. This may appear a paradox; but owing to various causes—principally to the perfect freedom they enjoy both in political and religious matters, to the spread of Protestantism, to the increase of commerce—the Christians of Turkey are rapidly improving, and only require a continuation of the present state of things to render themselves ultimately competent to form a great and prosperous Christian empire.

Let me now turn to the speech of my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council. The noble Lord has asked for a considerable grant to carry on the war, and there is no doubt that after the speech we have heard the Committee will willingly vote the supplies required, if only convinced that the money is to be properly expended. As my noble Friend has alluded to the various objects to which the sum demanded is to be applied, I may be allowed to make a few observations upon them. The noble Lord has told us that a considerable portion of it will be applied to the Commissariat. Now, I have carefully avoided, for some months, alluding to the conduct of the war, not because I was satisfied with the mode in which affairs were conducted, but because I felt that I should be insensible to the magnitude of the contest in which we were engaged if I did not know that under the very best management some failures, some over-sights, and some disasters, must ensue, and that it would ill become us to appear continually as the assailants of the Government. I have, however, all along felt that the Commissariat had not been in that state in which it ought to have been, considering the very liberal sums voted to the Government on that account. Everybody is aware that when the Duke of Wellington took the command in the Peninsula he found the Commissariat, notwithstanding the enormous sums which were expended upon it, in a most hopeless condition. He at once applied himself to remedying this great defect, well knowing that a good Commissariat was essential to the success of the Army. In the month of May, 1809, he drew up a celebrated minute, entering most fully, and with a knowledge of details and principles which showed his master mind, into every particular connected with the subject. The Commissariat henceforth formed one of the most efficient branches of the service, and to it may be attributed in a great measure the success of those glorious campaigns which have rendered the Duke of Wellington's name immortal. At the close of the war, however, the system which he had introduced fell into disuse. The Commissariat was transferred to the Treasury—men acquainted with the active duties of the field were no longer employed, and it was prophesied by those well acquainted with the subject that whenever a war broke out again we should be exposed to the same difficulties; and have to incur the same needless expenses, as when we first engaged in the Peninsular campaign. These prophecies have been fulfilled. I do not wish to attribute to the Government the results of a system which they received from their predecessors, and for which they are not responsible, and I should not have said a word on the subject had it not been that the Government were warned upon every point early in the winter, and that all the difficulties to which we have been exposed could have been avoided had the Government taken proper measures, and listened to the advice tendered to them. I speak now from personal knowledge, not from any vague reports. Those who had the management of the Commissariat were told that the country about to be occupied by our armies was deficient in beasts of burden and in the means of transport. They were told that it was only by sending into distant parts of Asia Minor and to the islands that the necessary animals could be procured. Every suggestion they received, to the very places indicated, have been justified by the result. Again, the class of men to be organised as camp followers were pointed out to them. Many gentlemen were named who were admirably calculated to be the means of intercourse and communication between the army and the natives. However, it would seem that a rule had been made not to employ one person acquainted with the resources of the country or the manners and languages of the inhabitants. All that was done was to send a gentleman from the Treasury to Constantinople to make inquiries. After one or two weeks' residence he drew up a report upon the history, government, policy, manners, and resources of a country, of which it might almost be said that the more one lives in it the less one knows of it. In fact, the population and resources of adjoining provinces differ so essentially that a perfect knowledge of the one would only mislead you as to the other. But the report of this gentleman was printed and circulated in the army as directions for the Commissariat officers! No wonder that when our army landed they found themselves deficient in the necessary supplies. The accounts which appeared in the Times, although at first denied, are now admitted to be correct, and notwithstanding the horror that appeared to be entertained at the presence of a Times' correspondent, it cannot but be admitted that those gentlemen have done much towards calling public attention to and remedying abuses. I hold in my hand extracts from several letters, which I will read to the Committee—

"If we are badly off here then, what may we expect to be there? But I see no present possibility of getting there. We have only just carts enough to bring us our daily rations of bread. We have no organised waggon train, and to the absence of it, I presume, may our present delay be attributed, and indirectly, if not directly, nearly all the inconveniences we are suffering from. Here again our shrewd Allies beat us hollow. Before the French landed they had bought waggons, bullocks, or mules, &c., and brought with them a regular waggon train. The commissary in charge of the light division told me that at the present moment we have only thirty regular commissariat carts for the whole army, and only one field ambulance. They had, as they imagined, a number of bullock carts of the country ready for use, but either from some misunderstanding about wages, or from a more attractive offer elsewhere, the men absconded with their bullocks and left us crippled. We fear being compelled to leave our tents behind, not having means to carry food for the baggage animals. Our arrangements for the sick and wounded are alike deficient. I have just been to the Commissariat folk, and they tell me they cannot even give to the hospital the bullocks and drivers required to take the hospital marquee and stores."

A private letter from Varna states—

"With regard to the hospital establishment it is very defective. I have heard many complaints from the surgeons. They have not supplied us here with a single pannier for conveying medicines—and with the army in movement, we were forced the other day to borrow from the French, who kindly offered it, a conveyance to take a sick man from their camp to Gallipoli. Ask the question in the House, and you will be told that you are misinformed, or it will be denied altogether."

Had it not been for our excellent Consul, Mr. Calvert, I do not know what our troops would have done on reaching Gallipoli. He had to provide them with quarters, to look after their commissariat, and to be the organ of communication with the local authorities. It is fortunate we had such a Consul on the spot. The Committee is probably not well aware of the multifarious duties which are imposed upon a British Consul in the East, and of the nature of the requirements which he is expected to possess. He is a judge, both in civil and criminal suits, and is called upon to adjudicate upon every variety of case from a murder to a divorce. He must be a diplomatist and politician, and he is the political agent at the petty court of a pasha. He must be well versed in commercial and maritime law, as he is the authority to which merchants and seamen must apply, and he is generally the agent of Lloyd's. He must speak with fluency half a dozen languages, and, add to all this, he is expected to entertain, at a salary of 250*l.* a year, from which all manner of deductions in the way of Foreign Office agency and income tax are made, every traveller who chances to visit his district. He must, indeed, be a phenomenon—and Mr. Calvert may fairly be quoted as an instance of such a phenomenon. But for his services our troops would have met with great difficulties, and would undoubtedly have been exposed to great hardships. The noble Lord has stated to the Committee that a considerable portion of the sum to be voted this evening will be required for the transport service. A noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) has already in another place called the attention of the country to the enormous sum which has already been expended in transporting our troops to the East, and has ably pointed out the defects in that branch of the service. It would be instructive to have a return of the various sums paid for demurrage upon vessels engaged for this purpose by the Government. I am informed that on the Himalaya alone nearly 20,000*l.* was expended on account of some change of plan in keeping our troops at Malta. I do not now wish to blame the Government for what has happened, which may, as in similar cases, be attributed to a defective system; but such facts ought to be known, that their recurrence may be prevented. Let us look also at the number of accidents which have occurred to us, whilst, as far as I can learn, not one has happened to our Allies. Surely this must show great defect and mismanagement somewhere. One of our principal sources of failure and expense is the neglect, so apparent in everything connected with the prosecution of the present war, of taking precautionary and other measures in proper time. Why, I cannot but ask, were not British Commissioners sent last year to the Turkish camp to ascertain the real condition of the Turkish army and the prospects of the campaign. Had this step been taken we should not have heard last year, as we did in this House and elsewhere, that the Russians might march unimpeded to Constantinople. Even the Spanish Government, little interested as it must be compared with ourselves in this war, sent General Prim as a military Commissioner to the Turkish camp. Had we taken a similar step how many mistakes we should have avoided. That the presence of a few English military men of recognised ability and of experience would have been of the utmost importance to the Turks is now fully proved by the gallant defence of Silistria, which would not have held out had it not have been for the counsels and encouragement given by two British officers, Captains Butler and Nasmyth, one of whom, unfortunately, has not survived to reap the reward to which his courage and skill so fully entitled him. It might be said that the defects of which I complain have undoubtedly hitherto existed, but that a remedy was now applied by the formation of a new department and the nomination of a Minister at War, under whom the various branches of the military service would be consolidated. But, unfortunately, the change announced by the Government has not been carried out either to the satisfaction of the House or the country. A Minister of War has been named, but the old system appears still to exist with all its anomalies and abuses. It is true that the Government has promised that the consolidation shall ultimately take place, and that the required changes shall be made; but, unfortunately, this Session has been more fruitful in promise than in performance. My hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding has taunted some of those who sit beneath him with a predilection for a certain noble Lord who is supposed to have been pre-eminently qualified to fill the office of Minister of War. But my hon. Friend has much exaggerated. No one, and I less than any one, would wish to say one word against the noble Duke who now holds that high position. I believe him to be eminently qualified from his known integrity, his habits of business, and his great industry, to discharge the arduous and responsible duties of his office. But this is no personal question. I wish to raise it above any personalities. What are the facts of the case? The noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton was believed in the country to represent certain opinions, and to be identified with a certain policy, which, whether rightly or wrongly, I will not pretend to say, were supposed to be guarantees that this war would be carried on with increased energy and for certain great ends. The noble Viscount had earned a great European reputation by his vigorous and decisive policy in a question almost parallel with that which arose last year, and which has led to this war. I do not wish, under present circumstances, to do more than to allude to this case; but the Committee will remember that when we were on the very brink of a war, peace was maintained by the decision and vigour of action of the noble Viscount. The noble Viscount's long experience in the public affairs of Europe as Foreign Minister of this country, and his no less intimate acquaintance with the conduct of war, seemed to point him out as the man peculiarly qualified for the direction of this great contest. His appointment to the Ministry of War would have been accepted in Europe as an earnest of our determination to carry on the war with due vigour, and would have been worth an army to us. The Duke of Newcastle—perhaps erroneously—has the reputation of being a Member of that party in the Cabinet which is opposed to the war, and which has embarked with reluctance in any hostilities whatever. His appointment was consequently looked upon as a triumph of that party in the Cabinet which is known as the peace party. It is on this account alone that his nomination was calculated to create distrust in the intentions of the Government both at home and abroad. Many appointments have recently been made by the Government which have caused great dissatisfaction. I have often heard it said—and, indeed, one of my correspondents from the East makes a similar remark—why does not the Government allow some great firm to contract for carrying on the war? This question, however ludicrous it may appear, is based upon a very good common-sense view of the matter. If my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkwall (Mr. Laing) were to build a new Crystal Palace, or the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Stevenson) were to undertake some great railway in a foreign land, they would not employ this man, because he was first-cousin to a celebrated engineer, or that man because he had been two or three years longer in the trade than another contractor; but they would seek out those who, by their abilities, experience, and knowledge, were best calculated to carry the undertaking to a successful, speedy, and economical conclusion. It is upon the same principle that the public wish appointments to be made; and until appointments are made upon this principle we shall ever have to complain of failures and fatal errors. In speaking of the public service I may allude to a notice of Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Poole which has appeared for some time on the papers, relative to Persia, and which I regret has not been brought before the House. It is certainly not right that at such a crisis as the present the head of our mission in Persia should be absent from his post. The affairs of the mission are now confided to a gentleman, who, while speaking of him with every respect, I cannot say I believe to be competent to the discharge of the most important duties which must now devolve upon him. Had it not been for the Turkish Ambassador at Teheran, a man of consummate abilities, indeed of real genius, I believe that Persia, by this time, would have openly sided with Russia. Persia is now of the utmost importance to us as an ally; more especially as the Ottoman troops have hitherto been unable to contend successfully with Russia in Asia; and, I believe, that had our mission been in good hands, we might, by this time, have secured her active co-operation.

I will now turn to the speech of my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council. That speech was undoubtedly in many respects highly satisfactory to the Committee, and will, I believe, prove so to the country. But unfortunately that noble Lord is not the Prime Minister, upon whom, after all, the conduct of the policy of this country depends. The noble Lord has made speeches in a similar spirit before that which now occurred. But a very few days ago I considered it my duty to call the attention of the House to a speech which had been made in another place by Lord Aberdeen. In consequence of the notice of a Resolution which I gave, that noble Earl volunteered an explanation, which, unsatisfactory as I confess it to have been to me, I accepted, and, in conformity with what appeared to be the general feeling of the House, I withdrew my notice. But it is of the utmost importance to have the history of that speech in mind, as precisely the same thing might occur again. It was this. A noble and learned Lord, deeming the time come when some definite explanation should be given by the Government as to our relations with Austria and the German Powers, brought that subject forward in another place in a speech of singular eloquence, rendered still more remarkable by the great age of the noble orator, who seemed to be uttering the wisdom founded upon the knowledge and experience of almost two ordinary lives—in which, with masterly clearness, he pointed out the disastrous effects of the ambition of Russia, and the only means by which that fatal lust of conquest and aggrandisement could be effectually checked. The noble Earl the Minister for Foreign Affairs enlarged upon the speech of Lord Lyndhurst, and pointed out, in words worthy of the occasion, the only true policy of England. The leader of the Opposition (Lord Derby), in a candid and generous spirit, expressed his full concurrence in the sentiments which had fallen from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and declared the satisfaction with which they would be received by the country. It might reasonably have been supposed that even the Government would have rejoiced at an unanimity which would have enabled them to persecute their war with vigour and energy. But a fatal impulse induced Lord Aberdeen to rise, and, without any apparent reason, to make a speech, which completely destroyed the effect of the statements of the Foreign Minister, and again plunged the country into doubt and alarm. Now, unfortunately the very same thing may occur again. Unfortunately Lord Aberdeen is the Prime Minister of this country. It is to him we are to look for the policy of the Government. He may, as recent events have shown, dismiss a Minister at any moment without notice or consultation with his colleagues. During what I may almost call their temporary suspension of the constitution, even the noble Lord who has spoken this evening, and that noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton might be told at any time that their places had been disposed of, and that their room was more desired than their company.

It will be remembered, too, that last autumn, whilst negotiations of the utmost importance were going on, upon which the very question of war or peace depended, decisions of the most momentous character were come to by only two or three Members of the Cabinet, who met together without reference to their colleagues. In such a state of things we should be ill discharging our duties—ill fulfilling the important trust placed in us—if we were to allow the House to separate without obtaining the most distinct and positive assurances, not from one Member of Her Majesty's Government, but from the Government generally, as to their real policy, and the objects and ends of the war. Let me now turn to the speech of Lord Aberdeen, to which I have alluded, and to the explanation which must, I presume, be received as the solemn declaration of the noble Earl of his opinion and policy. The noble Earl in his first speech had laid down three principal propositions, namely, that Russia had not enlarged her territorial possessions by the Treaty of Adrianople; that the only use she had made of the power gained by that treaty, was to afford, in a time of great need, valuable aid to Turkey; and that, if we could only secure a peace for twenty-five years on the same terms, we might consider ourselves exceedingly fortunate. Now, the noble Earl prefaced his explanatory statement by the declaration that there was nothing in his first speech which he had to retract or contradict. It is true, he admitted, that although the Treaty of Adrianople had conferred no very considerable territorial possessions on Russia, it had nevertheless given her territorial positions, even more important than possessions, as they called her to exercise an influence which must alternately secure to her the large accession of territory which she undoubtedly desired. With the exception, therefore, of this point, the other declarations of the noble Earl remain uncontradicted. We must consequently examine how far they are consistent with the truth, and with the true policy of this country. In order to justify himself, the noble Earl had produced a despatch, written by him to our Ambassador at St. Petersburg, some time after the signing of the Treaty of Adrianople, and communicated, it is asserted, to the Russian Government. That despatch is, no doubt, an admirably written document; there is scarcely a sentiment in it with which I do not heartily agree, but the question naturally occurs why, with the knowledge of the views and the policy of Russia which this despatch displays—why, with these facts before your eyes, did you permit the Treaty of Adrianople to be concluded at all. It was very easy to protest after it was too late; this step should have been taken before. Let us for one moment recur to the circumstances under which this treaty was obtained; they are of very great interest at this moment in illustrating, to a very remarkable degree, the policy which had been pursued by Lord Aberdeen on the present occasion. In a selection of documents, the authenticity of which is admitted in a well-known speech by the noble Viscount the Member for Tiverton, I mean the State Papers, which appeared some years ago in the Portfolio, is a despatch from Prince Lieven to Count Nesselrode, written some time before the signature of the Treaty of Adrianople. It appears that the Russian Ambassador wished to enlist this country in the cause of Russia during her war with Turkey, and that he applied to the Duke of Wellington, who, however, showed great alarm at the probable results of the contest, and appeared inclined to oppose the views of Russia. Prince Lieven then had recourse to Lord Aberdeen, who was Minister for Foreign Affairs. In a despatch to the Emperor, he reports the results of this interview with that statesman.

“As he (Lord Aberdeen),” he writes, “was acquainted only imperfectly with our conversation with the First Minister, he laboured, when he learnt the details of it, to soften the disagreeable impressions that might have been left upon us by his language at the commencement of it, by the reiterated assurance that at no period had it entered into the intentions of England to seek a quarrel with Russia. Public opinion was always ready to burst forth against us (Russia). The Government (British) could not constantly prove it, and it would be dangerous to excite it on questions of maritime law that touched so nearly the national prejudices. On the other side, we could reckon with entire confidence upon the well-disposed (bienveillante) and friendly disposition of the English Ministry, which struggled against them (the national prejudices). Public opinion was pronounced against us because generally in England it took the side of the Whig—but, au reste, the British Cabinet was far from not wishing us success; on the contrary, it wished us success, prompt and decisive, because it knew that it was the only means of terminating the war, which could not be regarded except as a great misfortune, since it was impossible to foresee its results. The English Minister entered into long directions to demonstrate that we lent to him intentions that he could not have, and ended by saying that the Cabinet of London desired that the war should be terminated to the honour and advantage of Russia.”

The language held by Lord Aberdeen at that period, as reported in this despatch, corresponds, I believe, exactly with that held by the noble Earl during the negotiations which preceded the war. At that time I had good reason for believing there was a strong hope felt and expressed that the Russians should be successful at Khalafat and elsewhere, because success might lead them to moderate their terms, and might then smooth the way to a peace. Fortunately for the honour and interests of this country, those who had thus hoped were disappointed. Lord Aberdeen has declared that at the time of the Treaty of Adrianople the Russians displayed great moderation, as they might have marched upon the capital. But we now learn, from undoubted sources, that so far from the capital being in danger, it was the remains of the Russian army that was in the most imminent peril. Out of the 25,000 men who reached Adrianople, scarcely 8,000 were fit for active service, the rest being utterly helpless from disease, and Mustapha Pasha was advancing upon them with from 50,000 to 80,000 fresh troops. I have been told that when Sir Pulteney Malcolm informed Admiral Hayden, who commanded the Russian blockading fleet in the Ægean, of the signature of the treaty, the latter jumped out of bed, and, embracing the bearer of such welcome intelligence, exclaimed, “We are saved.” Let the House remember that Lord Aberdeen himself stated in his despatch that that treaty was accepted by the Porte at the persuasion of the British Ambassador—his own brother. The French Court at that time was well known to be in the direct interests of Russia, if not to have secret understanding with her. The noble Earl has declared that so far from the Treaty of Adrianople having led to any aggression on the part of Russia on Turkey, it has enabled Russia to confer a signal service upon the Porte. How far is such a statement warranted by facts? In the first place let it be remembered that the secret article of the Treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, that signal service to which Lord Aberdeen alludes, was made directly in favour of Russia, as it expressly states, closing the Bosphorus and Dardanelles against the ships of war of all other Powers. The indignation which that secret article created throughout Europe cannot be forgotten. But what has the Treaty of Adrianople enabled Russia to do in Servia, in the Principalities, on the Danube? Of Servia I can speak with some confidence; and, now that twelve years have elapsed since the events to which I refer occurred, without betraying any diplomatic secrets. I was employed in that province on a secret mission when the revolution of 1842 broke out. It was a national movement against the reigning Prince Michael, who had become a mere tool of Russia, and had incurred the popular resentment. He was expelled. Our Consul General there misunderstood the cause of the revolution, and protesting against it, lowered his flag, and left the country. I took a different view of the subject. Lord Stratford, then Sir Stratford Canning, did so also, and supported the Porte in her recognition of the change. Russia, however, placing a sense upon the Treaty of Adrianople which it could not bear, insisted upon a new election of a Prince, the expulsion of the leading men of Servia, and the cancelling of the act of recognition of the Porte. What course did Lord Aberdeen take? Why, he justified and approved of the conduct of Russia, admitted the construction he had placed upon the Treaty of Adrianople, and, in replying to Lord Beaumont, who brought the subject forward in another place, declared that—“ Nothing could exceed the state of horror of the Servian people, from the excesses which had been committed by those who had arrived at power. The noble Lord (Lord Beaumont) had distinctly referred to the revolt as an attempt of a free people to exercise their just right to elect their chief; but, so far from this being correct, the revolt was the effect of a corrupt bargain with the Pasha of Belgrade and two or three ambitious Servian chiefs. The revolt possessed no character of a patriotic and national movement; and so far was he from entertaining the apprehensions expressed by the noble Lord opposite, that Russia would move 50,000 men into Servia, he had very little doubt that in a short time we should see the youth at the head of the Government but too happy to make his escape from that people over whom he now reigned.”

It would be difficult to point out any prophecy which had proved so utterly false. The Prince, then elected, is still the chief of the Servian nation, and that province, under his administration, has attained that condition of prosperity and independence which renders him the hope of the Slavonian population of Turkey. The conduct of Russia in the Danubian Principalities had been more successful than in Servia. From a mere right of interference, she has gradually arrogated to herself a right of actual occupation; and Wallachia and Moldavia have become, in her eyes, mere Russian provinces. Such having been the policy of Russia since the Treaty of Adrianople, fully justifying the results which Lord Aberdeen predicted from that treaty, is it not surprising to find that Ministers for Foreign Affairs of this country last year, whilst Lord Aberdeen was Prime Minister, thus addressing their own Ambassador at St. Petersburg to the Emperor of Russia. Lord John Russell's despatch of February 9, 1853, runs thus—

“ Upon the whole, then, Her Majesty's Government are persuaded that no course of policy can be adopted more wise, more disinterested, more beneficial to Europe, than that which His Imperial Majesty has so long followed, and which will render his name more illustrious than that of the most famous Sovereigns who have sought immortality by unprovoked conquest and ephemeral glory.”

Lord Clarendon writes to Sir H. Seymour, March 23, 1853—

“ They (the Government) feel entire confidence in the rectitude of His Imperial Majesty's intentions, and as they have the satisfaction of thinking that the interests of Russia and England in the East are completely identical, they entertain an earnest hope that a similar policy there will prevail.”

It was such declarations as these, Sir, which acted as an encouragement to the Emperor of Russia, and mainly led to the state of things which ended in this war.

As the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council has alluded to the policy of Austria in his speech, it is necessary that I should say a few words upon that subject. After the Russian forces had crossed the Pruth and war became inevitable, the Government, instead of at once taking their stand upon the great principles involved, threw themselves as a last resource into the arms of Austria, and she became for a time the arbiter of the peace of Europe. This I believe to have been a very fatal error, one which has led, and which will inevitably lead, to great evils. Austria, from the very commencement, had held but one language—that which she demanded, and was prepared to demand, was a return to the status quo ante bellum. This policy had been formally announced in State papers, to some of which even the representatives of France and England are parties. In every treaty and protocol which has hitherto emanated from Vienna, this principle is most distinctly laid down. If Austria hereafter should refuse to go a step further, we have no cause to complain. We might, in the first instance, have been persuaded that such would have been her policy. In treating with nations, we must inquire what their real interests are; by this alone will their policy be guided. Now, what are the interests of Austria in this contest, and what is her position? Her dominions are made up of a number of distinct races, some of which, from various causes, are disaffected to the Government and ready to rise against it. Austria must, therefore, be anxious to avoid any event, such as a war, which might lead to disturbances within her own territories. Again, Austria is a representative of the despotic principle in Europe, of which Russia also is a representative. Austria has received signal aid from Russia in quelling a great revolutionary movement, and she naturally looks to Russia alone for future help under similar circumstances, which must sooner or later inevitably occur. The interests of Austria are, therefore, opposed to any hostility with Russia. On the other hand, she cannot join Russia against England and France, because she knows that the loss of her Italian provinces would follow, and that she is quite unable to resist a great maritime Power. Although her true policy thus prevents her uniting cordially either with Russia or ourselves, still it is essential to her interests that the Principalities should be evacuated and should be as much as possible withdrawn from the influence of Russia. The reason is obvious to those acquainted with those countries. Austria knows full well that the moment the Danubian Principalities are brought completely under the influence of Russia, the intrigues of that ambitious Power will be brought to bear upon the Slavonian populations of Servia, Bosnia, and ultimately of the adjoining Slavonian provinces of Austria. In the Turkish Slavonian provinces the interests of Austria are of precisely the same character as those of Russia. Such being the position of Austria, it is evident that her true policy was one of strict neutrality; and I believe we have committed a great political error, in endeavouring to force her to abandon her true policy, and to take part with us. And, if Lord Aberdeen's not very complimentary assertion, "that France is more than a match for Austria and Russia put together," be true, there was surely no need of her alliance. Few statesmen would, at such a time as this, be inclined to deny that it is of the utmost importance to this country, that there should be in the centre of Europe two great neutral Powers like Austria and Prussia. But, notwithstanding all our efforts, we have heard this evening that the course which Austria is prepared to take is still doubtful. And this uncertainty becomes a serious cause of embarrassment to us; as long as it exists, we cannot decide upon the part that our troops are to take in this war, whether they are to remain inactive at Varna, to advance to the Danube to aid the Turks in expelling the Russians from the Principalities, or to be sent at once to Sebastopol? Although the Turkish troops have fought with a bravery unsurpassed behind walls and in entrenchments, yet their utter want of proper officers would render it exceedingly hazardous for them to venture upon a battle in the open field against a Russian army. Unless, therefore, the action of Austria be brought at once to bear upon the Principalities, and the Russians are induced to withdraw, we cannot leave the Turks to themselves. The assurances of the noble Lord with regard to Austria have, it appears to me, been very unsatisfactory; and at the end of his speech I was at a loss to determine whether he had told us that she was with us or against us. There were some assurances of the noble Lord, however, which were undoubtedly highly satisfactory, especially that with regard to the destruction of Sebastopol, the Russian fleet, and of the future relations of the Danubian Principalities with Russia. I might have wished that he had touched upon one or two other points—there is the possession of Bessarabia, and the consequent command of the navigation of the Danube—without a satisfactory settlement of which this war should not be brought to a close. There are the Circassians, who have resisted with extraordinary perseverance and courage all attempts of Russia to take possession of their country and to destroy their national independence. We have now encouraged them to take the field against their oppressors, and aided them in their attempts to drive the Russians from their country. It would be the height of ingratitude to desert them at the conclusion of a war, and to leave them to the vengeance of Russia. I have heard it very frequently said, that no peace would be satisfactory unless the Bosphorus and Dardanelles were opened to the fleets of all nations. But it must be remembered, that as long as Sebastopol exists, and a Russian fleet commands the Black Sea, such a state of things would be in the highest degree dangerous. No one acquainted with the subject can doubt that had the Dardanelles and Bosphorus been open twelve months ago to the fleets of all nations, either the Porte would have been compelled to submit to any terms the Emperor of Russia might have dictated, or Constantinople would have been in his hands. In consequence of the treaty of 1841 the appearance of the Russian fleet at the entrance of the Bosphorus would have been an act of war, and the Turks might have resisted, and if that treaty had not existed, Russia, before a declaration of war, might have entered the Straits under any plea, and might have inclosed a part of Constantinople. If Sebastopol is to fall, no time is to be lost in attempting its reduction. The noble Lord has told us that the Russian fleet is now useless, that it is blocked up in harbour by the allied fleets, and that it dare not venture out to sea. This may be perfectly true, but we must remember that in three months our position will be reversed. It is impossible, as Admiral Dundas has himself reported, for our fleet to hold to open sea after the beginning of November. We shall then be shut up in the Bosphorus, and the Russians, acting upon their policy of avoiding a superior force, and seizing the opportunity of inflicting injury upon a weaker, will arise from Sebastopol, and we may have a repetition of the lamentable event of Sinope. As yet to the Turks alone are due all the successes of the present campaign; they alone have resisted the power of the Czar. I trust I am the last man to clamour for victories, and to show an unworthy impatience, which can only prove an ignorance of the true nature of the great struggle into which we have entered, but I think I may venture to say that, after the great sacrifices we have made, and the magnitude of the military and naval forces sent out from the shores of England, the country may fairly expect some results commensurate to them before the close of the year. But such ends can only be obtained if the Government be determined to carry on this war with energy and vigour, and with a view to such results as would alone have warranted us in entering into it. After the discrepancies of opinion amongst various Members of the Government which I have pointed out, it becomes of the utmost importance that before the conclusion of this debate we should learn what the intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers really are from one of those right hon. Gentlemen who are believed to represent opinions opposed to those of the Lord President of the Council, for instance, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Let satisfactory assurances be distinctly given, and I for one will vote with alacrity any sum which Her Majesty's advisers may think necessary to enable them to carry on this war. But we should not be discharging the trust placed in us by the country if we permitted the House to separate without having received some such declaration from the Government upon which we could entirely rely.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he had not the least desire to interfere with the Vote proposed. On the contrary, he wished to afford every assistance to the Government in carrying on with vigour the war in which the country was engaged. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London had referred in his speech to the wish of some Members who desired that the House should reassemble in autumn. It was his opinion that the House, in voting the money, and in consenting to place the Vote of Credit in the hands of the Government, should endeavour to obtain from the Government some such an assurance. Her Majesty should be asked not to exercise Her power of proroguing Parliament, except for the purpose of reassembling it after a short recess. Such an assurance would give satisfaction to the House and to the country. We were engaged in a war which one of the Ministers had described as a war for the independence of nations, and as a struggle of civilisation against barbarism. The people had come forward nobly to support the Government in carrying on the war, and they had readily made great sacrifices; but they wished the contest to be prosecuted with energy, in order that they might have some compensation for those sacrifices. They were anxious that these sacrifices should not be made without obtaining equivalent advantages. But the people of the country looked to the conduct of the war with a jealous eye, and, he might safely add, with feelings of apprehension, and with a certain degree of suspicion. Their apprehensions were not aroused as regarded the enemy, much less by any mistrust as to the prowess of their naval and land forces; but the suspicion was, that some of those who were in power had not their hearts in the war, and were not honest in their intentions to prosecute it with vigour. He had no doubt that this was the general opinion of the country. Men of all parties concurred in opinion that the Minister now at the head of the Government was not the man who ought to be in power during the continuation of a war like the present. He repeated that this was the general opinion; and however placemen and Peelites might flatter themselves that it was not so, he assured them they would find it out if they would only go among the people. It was his firm belief that if a meeting were to be held in Drury Lane Theatre, in order to express the opinion of the public upon the mode of proceeding adopted by the Prime Minister, the place would be full from the gallery to the pit, and that it would be unanimous in condemning him. The people were ready to give their money to carry on the war; but they wanted to have value for it. When they saw vast armaments proceeding from this country, armaments as great and as grand as any we had ever sent forth, and that nothing was accomplished by them, they could not help being possessed with suspicions that, somehow or other, orders had been given to their gallant commanders which prevented them from using the power at their disposal. They could not help believing that directions had been given to carry on the war against the great "gentleman" of Russia in a gentlemanlike way, and not to press him too far. The people of England also saw that those who had been most engaged in resisting him diplomatically, who had most exposed the designs and pretensions of the Emperor of Russia, and who had done most to present him to the world in his true colours, had not, when they returned to their own country, been received with any marks of special favour. Sir Hamilton Seymour, who had conducted the important mission of which he had charge in a manner that did infinite credit to his temper, ability, and ca-

pacify, came home lately, and it was supposed that hardly any reward would have been too great for him. But what reward had Sir Hamilton Seymour received? What mark of royal favour had Her Majesty been advised by Her responsible Ministers to confer upon him? Yet we saw at the same time Russian noblemen visiting this country during the war, and treated as the favoured guests of Cabinet Ministers. All these were things which made an impression upon the people of this country, and inspired them with distrust of the Government, or at least of its head. To be sure, the House had to-night heard a very spirited, an able, and a noble speech from the noble Lord the leader of the House; and he (Lord D. Stuart) could not help, whilst listening to that discourse, experiencing the common feeling of three-fourths of the House—what a pity it was that such a statesman, who could utter such sound, noble, and truly British views, should only occupy a comparatively subordinate situation in the councils of the country. The distrust entertained of the Government in the country was general, but it was confined to the Prime Minister. Nor could any one be surprised at it, for, at the very moment when the noble Lord was, in such eloquent sentences, expounding the policy of the country, Lord Aberdeen was in another place uttering a speech of a different description, a speech which he had been told deserved the reproaches of the country for its lukewarmness and faint-heartedness. What was the use of the noble Lord the leader of that House making vigorous declarations so long as they were counteracted by another Minister, more powerful, in another place? There was only one thing which could dispel the distrust in the Government that had so long existed, and which had grown more and more till it had reached the highest pitch. He believed, if the Ministry had thought proper to advise Her Majesty to appoint a certain Minister as Secretary of the War Department, the country might have been reconciled to the Government of Lord Aberdeen. He believed that if his noble Friend the Home Secretary had been appointed to that office, his name would have been a guarantee to the people for the war being carried on with vigour and energy. There was no doubt that the very name of Palmerston carried with it an amount of moral force equal to a whole army. His noble Friend's name was known in war as well as in peace; and wherever it was known it was both loved and feared, for it was synonymous with the power and the strength of England. It was rumoured, however, that the Prime Minister had declared, or had been heard to say, that so long as he was in power Lord Palmerston should never have the conduct of the war. The opinions he had expressed he firmly believed were the general opinions of the country. Let the House consider whether they were founded in truth. If they were only senseless clamour, it was the duty of the House of Commons to show that they had no foundation. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had spoken of the great armaments sent out from this country. Grand armaments they were; but up to this time they had produced little or no effect. He gave every credit to those at the head of departments for the extraordinary promptitude with which they had equipped and sent them forth;—all honour to them for that!—but he must observe that they ought to have been prepared much sooner. The army ought to have been sent to the neighbourhood of Turkey before war was declared, in order that it might have acted at once. In war, promptitude was everything. No one knew that better than his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He had always shown great promptitude. Look at his conduct with regard to Portugal. When he had made up his mind, action immediately followed. The same occurred with respect to Greece. But in the present case, though the army was sent out with great promptitude and in admirable order, did it go out to fight the enemy? No; it first went to eat oranges at Malta, then to Gallipoli, and then to Sentari. At length it got to Varna, and at Varna it had since remained, unable to move because there had not been the forethought to prepare proper means for its advance; the Commissariat was not ready. That department had not provided horses or mules, or beasts of burden of any kind. The army, therefore, was yet at Varna—very well as a demonstration, but unfit for action. Some-what similar observations might be made as to the Navy. What was wanted, both in the Black Sea and in the Baltic, was vessels of small draught. No operation on the Danube could be undertaken without them. An officer in the fleet when in the Bosphorus, whom he knew, poohpooched the idea of our going to war, “because,” said he, “we have no vessels of shallow draught, and we can do little or nothing without them. Nor yet in the Baltic were there any vessels of shallow draught. He was credibly informed that we had no steam-vessel in the Baltic which drew less than eleven feet; but what was required in that sea was not vessels drawing eleven feet, but steamers drawing five and three feet. Many weeks ago a naval officer, now holding a command, mentioned this. He was asked, why not go to the Admiralty? “Oh,” he said, “I should only be snubbed.” The officer took care not to go to the Admiralty, and therefore he was not snubbed, but he got a command. He believed it would be possible to procure steamers of 200 tons drawing only three feet, which would carry one or two heavy guns. Vessels of this kind he was told were built in America fit to navigate any sea in the world. There was, however, nothing of the sort in the Baltic fleet. [Sir J. GRAHAM said that was a mistake.] If the statement was made in mistake he was happy to be corrected; but such statements had been made, and if the right hon. Baronet was incredulous, he could give him references. At all events, a great many useful hints might be taken in this respect from our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic. It was perfectly evident that the war in the Baltic must be carried on by means of bombardment, if at all. To do that there must be mortars; but he was informed that in the Baltic fleet there was no such thing as a mortar. He had been assured that when Admiral Plumridge went to Sveaborg, he found there seven ships of the line and three others moored in the ice. Why were they not attacked? It would have been easy to attack them, but why were they not attacked? The supposition was, that there were orders not to press Russia too hard. Cronstadt, no doubt, was a very formidable place, but he was assured it was accessible upon the north side to vessels of a very considerable size, and that if twenty vessels were sent there with mortars, towed by steamers, the place might be bombarded and the fleet destroyed. But there were no mortars in the fleet. Heavy guns it certainly had, but no mortars. The castles in the Morea were taken by means of mortars. Something of the same sort might easily have been done against Cronstadt. Cronstadt might by this time have been laid in ruins; and he had this opinion of the gallant officer who commanded the fleet that he would have done it, if he had been supplied by the Government with the requisite means, and if he had not received orders to hold his hands. When the people saw these things, it was not surprising that they were dissatisfied, and that they should imagine that some person having preponderating influence in the Government could not be in earnest in this war. Though the Committee might be ready to vote the money required for the war, he thought it would not be desirable for Parliament to separate without having some assurance as to the time of its being reassembled, because there was a fear that, when Members were away, the head of the Cabinet would be most desirous of bringing the war to a conclusion, no matter how; and that negotiations would be entered into which would result in an ignominious, an impolitic, and an unlasting peace. It would be, he believed, perfectly constitutional in him to move an Address to Her Majesty, praying her not to prorogue her Parliament. He had come down to the House to-day firmly resolved to make such a Motion; and he had consulted the Speaker upon the subject, the right hon. Gentleman being always ready kindly to give his advice to any hon. Member who asked it. He could not, he believed, make such a Motion upon going into Committee, nor could he oppose the Speaker leaving the chair, because it would not be respectful to Her Majesty to have so interfered with Her most gracious Message. He then supposed it would be open to him in Committee of Supply to move an Amendment to the same effect; but Mr. Speaker had informed him that, according to the forms of the House, it was not competent for him to make such a Motion. He was therefore unable to make the Motion to-night. If he had the opportunity, he would tell hon. Gentlemen what was the Motion he intended to make, and if he had the opportunity he would make it still. It was exactly like one made at the beginning of the present century by a great statesman who ought to be venerated by the Government bench—Mr. Charles Grey, afterwards Earl Grey. It was this—

“That an Address be presented to Her Majesty humbly to pray Her Majesty to be graciously pleased not to prorogue Her Parliament until She should have been enabled to afford to this House more full information with regard to Her relations with Foreign Powers, and to Her views and prospects in the contest in which Her Majesty is engaged.”

Such was the Motion. He could not make it now; but if he could devise any means of doing so without violating the technical forms of the House, he certainly would. His idea was not that they should be sitting de die in diem all through August and September—that would be taxing the patience of hon. Members too much; but supposing the Motion should be made, that it should find favour with the House, and that it should be the Queen's pleasure to consent to the wishes of the House, Parliament, instead of being prorogued, might be adjourned from time to time.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, we have now been listening for nearly six hours to a series of speeches delivered by some of the principal supporters of Her Majesty's Ministers, which have been devoted to criticisms upon some of the most important Members of the Administration, and the policy which they have of late been pursuing. Sir, I do not know that I should have been tempted to appeal to you at all upon this occasion had it not appeared in some degree that to a suggestion thrown out by myself we are indebted for a great portion of this debate. It is true that when the noble Lord and his colleagues gave notice of their intention to ask for this Vote of Credit, I did express my hope and expectation that the noble Lord would be able on this occasion to assure the House that it would have an opportunity of meeting at the latter end of the year, some little time before our usual meeting, in order to be well acquainted with the state of affairs, and so exercise that control, often desirable and salutary, over the conduct of the Minister, or do that which the presence of the House of Commons can often do to the advantage of a Government—namely, aid and, if need be, stimulate them in the moment of trial and exigency. I was not aware that that was a very unreasonable or unprecedented suggestion; and I did hope that the noble Lord might have found it convenient to tell us that he and his colleagues would feel it their duty to recommend Her Majesty to call Parliament together, probably in the month of November, for that purpose. The noble Lord, however, has not felt it his duty to follow that suggestion. But I think that the Committee will feel that it is not in any way an unreasonable proposition; and I do not see how its expediency can be better tested than by recalling the position of the country during the course of last autumn. Everybody must remember the great ambiguity in which public affairs last autumn were involved—the dissatisfaction, the doubt, the uncertainty, the hesitation which seemed to characterise the conduct of public men, and the course of public policy. I do not know that there was a more general feeling throughout the country at the end of last autumn, than the wish that Parliament was assembled to elicit some distinct expression of policy on the part of the Government, and to encourage the Government if their policy was found deserving of support. Well, Parliament did not assemble; but what did occur? No one can forget the catastrophe of Sinope, which happened at the end of autumn; and does anybody suppose that had Parliament been sitting some weeks before that unfortunate affair occurred—if, in consequence of the representations of Parliament, and the expressions of feeling elicited by its sittings, the British fleet had entered the Black Sea three weeks earlier than it did—who does not feel that the affair of Sinope, in all probability, would not have occurred? I imagine that to be an opinion not prevalent merely, but universal. Why, one of the greatest mistakes in all our course has been the delay that took place in the entry of the British fleet into the Black Sea. It is that delay which has led to the greater part of the difficulties with which we are now surrounded, and which we are still labouring to overcome. Therefore, in my opinion nothing could be more reasonable than when a country is involved in war, and a war of this character—a moment of exigency like the present—that Parliament should assemble, and by its presence exercise that control over the Minister, or give to him that support, which the state of affairs may require. Sir, it appears that the noble Lord who has last addressed us (Lord Dudley Stuart) is also of the same opinion, for he meditated a much stronger step than I did myself, as is evident from the details he has just given us. I do not myself exactly understand why the Government should have been so alarmed by the notice which reached them of the intention of the noble Lord, because, as the House had gone into Committee, and the Lord President had moved the Vote, it was not open to the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone to make a Motion of the kind that he has just referred to. Therefore, Sir, although we may not have been able to-night to advance much towards the attainment of that object, of which I believe the country generally highly approves, namely, a re-assembling of Parliament at the end of autumn; still I think this will have not become an insignificant night in our deliberations, for it has been one pregnant with most important declarations on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers. Now, Sir, though we have not had a promise from the noble Lord the leader of this House that he and his colleagues will recommend Her Majesty to summon Her Parliament at an earlier period than usual—we have had to-night from the organ of Her Majesty's Government in this House a distinct announcement of the definite objects and purposes of the war in which we are now engaged. We have had before in this House discussions upon the cause of the war. I shall not now dwell upon that subject. I have expressed my opinion upon it. I am not ashamed to say that I still adhere to that opinion. I think that the cause of this war is the discordant materials of which the Government is composed. I think the war has been caused by a Coalition Government, and I believe there is no opinion more generally accepted than that. I know very well that you may say that the war has been produced by the ambition and by the aggressive action of Russia; but the ambition of Russia might have been checked without war—its aggressive action might have been restrained without war. You might have had recourse to the same means to which you had successful recourse before, and obtained your object without involving the country in this great conflict. However, Sir, I do not think it is now necessary for us to inquire too much into the cause of the war. I am sure that I have ever refrained from alluding to the conduct of the war. So long as the Government appealed to the confidence of Parliament to conduct that war in which they had recommended their Sovereign to engage, I felt it to be our duty to extend on that subject to the Government no niggard confidence. I have felt it my duty to agree to every Vote for which they have asked, and to avoid any criticism upon any part of their conduct with respect to the war which might easily have been provoked. I hardly know of any course from which the House of Commons should more rigorously refrain than from that of eagerly criticising the conduct of the commanders of expeditions. I know very well that under any circumstances the commencement of a great war like this must be subject to many accidents which the greatest foresight, the amplest resources, and the utmost prudence and discretion could not prevent; and I am sure that after sitting here six months canvassing the cause of the war, which I think we had a legitimate right to do, no one can accuse any Gentleman on this side of the House of obtruding criticisms upon the conduct of the war. We, of course, reserved to ourselves the right of forming an opinion with regard to that subject; even if we did not express it, we reserved to ourselves the right, when the fitting occasion should arrive, of not being precluded from such an expression of our opinion by being reminded that at the time we did not make any contrary observations. I only assert the privileges of Members in making this remark; but certainly so far as affairs have at present proceeded no word has escaped my lips, nor do I recollect that they have escaped those of any other hon. Member on this side of the House, which could throw any impediment in the way of the prosecution of the war in which we are engaged, or which could place it in the power of any Administration to say, in case consequences, it may be of a disastrous character, should occur, that it was the captious criticisms of the Opposition which prevented them from obtaining that support from the people, and from inspiring that spirit into our commanders, which are so necessary in such an emergency. But, Sir, though we have our opinion as to the origin and cause of the war, and though we have abstained from expressing any opinion upon its conduct, I must say that I have listened to-night with some degree—I will not say merely of surprise, but of consternation—to the announcement which the noble Lord has made this evening of the complete and absolute resolution at which the Cabinet has arrived as to the objects of the war, and the only terms upon which peace is to be concluded. Now, do not let me misrepresent the noble Lord. I understood him, in order that he might justify this Vote, in order that he might disarm all opposition—I understood from him—that he was going, without reserve, to allow us to be the partners of the secrets of the Cabinet. I understood the noble Lord to say that the House should understand clearly what the objects were which the Government proposed to themselves in the conduct of this war, and without the accomplishment of which they would not be satisfied. The Principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia, in the first place, are not to be permitted to come again under the protectorate of Russia. The second point is, that the strong fortress of Sebastopol is to be destroyed, and the Crimea to be conquered and occupied—indeed, the last is of course the necessary consequence of destroying Sebastopol. Sebastopol, then, is to be destroyed, as I understand from the noble Lord—

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I may as well state that what I said was, that I thought Russia could not be allowed to maintain the menacing attitude which she has lately done by keeping so large a fleet at Sebastopol.

MR. DISRAELI: Well, Sir, I think I shall have done some good in rising, for I appeal to every hon. Gentleman, wherever he sits in this House, and whatever may be his opinions, whether he has not been for the last six hours in a fool's Paradise—whether every speech that has been made, and every vote that has been refrained from, has not in fact been actuated by an idea totally different from that to which the noble Lord now gives expression. Without questioning in any way the accuracy of the words which the noble Lord has just used, I must repeat the expressions which I mistook him to have used, and I must then contrast them with the authorised version; and I will say it is one of the most remarkable misapprehensions which I have ever fallen into; and the only thing that consoles me under the mistake is, that of the hundreds of Gentlemen present, with the exception of those who occupy the Treasury bench, they must all have fallen into the same error as myself. I thought I heard the noble Lord say that one of the great objects of the war, and the accomplishment of which alone would satisfy the Government—as it certainly seemed to satisfy the House, and from some opinions that have been expressed will also satisfy the country—I thought it was that that great fortress which dominated over the Black Sea was to be destroyed, and the Crimea to be no longer left in the possession of Russia. I will afterwards advert to the observation which I was about to make before I was corrected, in answer to the noble Lord on that point; but what the noble Lord now says is, that this is a mistake, that I was dreaming in company with the vast majority of the House of Commons, and that instead of saying that, what he did say was, that Russia was no longer to be permitted to keep so large a naval force in the Black Sea. Why, Sir, I thought the noble Lord said, although not in language so express, precise, and definite, as the fanciful quotation which I made from his speech respecting Sebastopol and the Crimea—I thought the noble Lord, speaking for an united Cabinet, was also going to free the mouths of the Danube, and even to take away Bessarabia from Russia. I thought I heard all this—I thought also that I heard, about the same time, that a speech was made in another place by the head of the Government, as well as the leader of the other House, couched in a very different tone, and conveyed in very different expressions. I know that when the news arrived in this House of what had there passed, there was a feeling of great distrust, perhaps of habitual suspicion; but all found consolation from what had fallen from the noble Lord in our own House—from the Minister who sits in the House of Commons, speaking to the representatives of the people; and they defied what might have been said in another place, upheld and encouraged by the noble Lord in language which we all admired at the time, and which, in my opinion, had only one fault—in being the fancy of my own imagination—but which I will only refer to, to show how completely we must have misconceived the statement of the noble Lord. Because I was about to remark, in answer to the statement of the noble Lord of the purposes of the united Cabinet, that though I was not disposed to enter into any discussion now as to the policy of taking Bessarabia, of depriving Russia of the protectorate of the Principalities, or of such great feats of arms as the destruction of Sebastopol and the conquest of the Crimea—though I was not disposed to enter into a discussion on such a course, or of the conduct of the Government, or of its allies—still I was about to say that I did think, with due deference to the noble Lord, that it was not the most prudent speech that ever was made. I did think that, whatever were the intentions of the united Cabinet—especially if they were of the colossal nature which as the noble Lord apparently, to my deceived ear, expressed to-night—it would have been perhaps more prudent if he had not exposed them with such complete frankness, and in a manner which hardly becomes us in the position we now occupy in those countries. I should feel I was performing an unworthy task if I were to criticise in an invidious spirit the conduct of our troops and commanders;

still, when the noble Lord—as I imagined—did express those brave words, so much, as I thought, “in Ercles’ vein,” I did think that, when our troops could not go fifteen miles from Varna, it would have been wiser if the noble Lord had not pledged the united Cabinet to those objects as the decided and definitive policy of Lord Aberdeen’s Government. I say, then, that this discussion has become a very important one, if I have been mistaken in what the noble Lord said. I thought it important before, because we had, through the noble Lord, the authoritative statement of the policy of the Ministry. Let the Committee remember how that statement was made. It was not made in the heat of debate; it was not made in reply to taunts and sarcasms, such as we sometimes hear as an excuse for statements in this House which are not warranted in fact;—but the noble Lord gave a most important notice on a most important subject, namely, the conduct of the war—for testing, as he said, the confidence of Parliament;—and I have a right to refer to his speech, as an authoritative statement of it has appeared. Well, the noble Lord gives a notice; he takes ample time; late as is the Session, the House is full, to hear from the lips of the head of the Government in this place, this important statement on this most important subject. The noble Lord’s speech is characterised with a fervour of feeling and a frankness of expression, according to the general feeling of the House, seldom exceeded; and so far as the tone of that speech could influence—I will not say the passions, but—the opinions and convictions of the House, it was perfectly successful. One after each other, Gentlemen have got up and spoken. Some of them have disapproved of Members of the Administration who are not in this House; some of them have disapproved of the places which others of them in this House occupy in the Cabinet; some have disapproved of the management of the Commissariat; some of them have disapproved of there not being flat-bottomed boats in the Baltic; but all have agreed that the tone of the noble Lord—the distinct manner in which he detailed to them the purposes and objects of the Government in the war they were conducting—was not only satisfactory, but more than satisfactory—more than they expected to hear; and yet, though we have now discussed this important question for six hours, we now find the noble Lord never made this important declaration—we now find that this statement of the definitive policy of the Government is a mere illusion; and therefore I have a right to ask the noble Lord—what is your policy—if you have a policy? Now, Sir, I have had some experience in this House, and see many Gentlemen here who have had more experience than myself. Very strange scenes have sometimes occurred here, and very startling speeches have been made; but this I say in all sincerity, in my Parliamentary experience nothing has ever occurred so remarkable as this imaginary speech of the Lord President—which has occasioned a debate of six hours—which has satisfied the House of Commons—which is to satisfy the country—and which we now find, exactly at midnight, was never made. But is this all? Why, the noble Lord was careful in informing us that he was not only speaking for the Cabinet—and in the course of the evening he was asked by astonished Members whether he was really speaking for the Cabinet, for they could hardly trust their ears during the whole debate—the noble Lord not only said he made this statement on the authority of the united Cabinet, but he also informed the House and the country that he had reason to believe that the French Government entirely agreed with Her Majesty's Ministers in their resolution to achieve the same purposes and to obtain the same terms. Is that an imaginary statement too? The noble Lord shakes his head. I understand, then, that the noble Lord did not make that announcement of the feelings of the French Government. That also is a passage to be obliterated; for it depended on his previous sentence. I am sure I have not the least intention to descend to a cross-examination of the noble Lord—that is not an art which I can pretend to practise; but the noble Lord must admit, that if he did make a communication respecting the French Government, he may probably have been dreaming when he made that communication, instead of supposing that I was dreaming when I referred to it. But there is no end to the mystification in which the House has found itself in consequence of this speech of the Lord President which was never made. Here we are at the end of the Session. We have had a year and a half of doubt and perplexity. I will venture to say, never in this country before has there been such a continuous period of perplexity of the public mind as in regard to the policy we were pursuing towards Turkey and Russia, and the purposes of this war. We are now arrived at the end of this Session. We were told we were to receive full compensation for all this obscurity—all this want of information—all this perplexity, hesitation, and uncertainty—and yet it appears to me there never was a period in which we were more involved in perplexity, in which the policy of the Government was more uncertain and obscure, and our prospects more visionary and fluctuating, than the present. When the House met at the beginning of the year, after that painful autumn, we all recollect when there was the first Parliamentary expression to the Government, reflecting with accuracy and without exaggeration the public opinion out of doors at that time; when we dwelt upon the vacillation, the infirmity of purpose, the impulses of a more suspicious character, which had brought about a result so little satisfactory to the people of this country, how were we met by the Government? The Government took the first opportunity, on the first debate, which must have been, I apprehend, on the Queen's Speech, or at least very early in the first week of the Session, of having their case stated in this House by one of the gravest and weightiest Members of the Cabinet—the First Lord of the Admiralty. What did the First Lord of the Admiralty say six months ago? The First Lord of the Admiralty, with that specious power which he has, admitted all those accusations and imputations which were made, or at least the justice of the grounds which the public had for complaining, and the Parliament for representing. He said there had been delay, and much, no doubt, that appeared unsatisfactory; "but," said he, "we have gained a great object—we have gained the co-operation of the German Powers." That was the statement of the right hon. Gentleman six months ago. Well, for six months we have been kept in the same doubt respecting the co-operation of the German Powers. I think myself that those who are well informed, especially of late, have had somewhat faint hopes of any very fortunate issue in that respect. But what happened to-night? The noble Lord made that statement, or rather I imagined, in a hallucination, the noble Lord to have made a statement which he did not make, about the dismemberment of Russia—about a change in the territorial arrangements of Russia, the destruction of Sebastopol, the conquest of the Crimea and Bessarabia; and what were the arguments of hon. Members on that side of the House, and especially of the hon. Member for the West Riding? Why, the most remarkable of the arguments of that hon. Gentleman was, that "this is a most important announcement of the noble Lord, and fills me with the greatest alarm, for the whole policy of the German Powers is based on this position—however you may mitigate the stipulations in other respects—that the territorial status quo of Russia must be preserved; and now the Government, through the noble Lord, have stated to-night that they have changed their policy, and will not recognise the integrity of Russia; the Government have told us that certain provinces are to be taken from Russia, but they have not told us to whom they are to be given." "But," added the hon. Gentleman, "what hope then have we of this co-operation of the German Powers?" If the noble Lord never made that statement, he must have thought the hon. Gentleman the Member for the West Riding was talking in his sleep. Why did not the Treasury benches call "Question"—why did they not terminate his discourse—why did not some one pull him by the coat, and say, "What are you talking about? Who said anything about our taking the Crimea? There's not a word been uttered on the subject. What the noble Lord said was quite different." It is only to be hoped that the strangers in the gallery and others who have heard the debate have not been mystified by the Lord President, as we in the body of the House have been, or there is no knowing what mischief may be done before the noble Lord's explanation gets abroad. Consider the alarm that might have been produced on 'Change to-morrow, that the manufacturers of Manchester and the merchants of Liverpool might have suspended their operations, what would have been the price of Consols to-morrow, if, fortunately, I had not risen and represented the general misconception of the House, and had given the Lord President the opportunity of making a statement which, I trust, will be widely circulated, and from which we now learn, on the highest authority, that the policy of the Cabinet, with respect to the Turkish empire, is not of that dangerous nature which the noble Lord, from circumstances, allowed us for a moment to believe, but that the same mild policy which has been pursued from the beginning will, I doubt not, be pursued to the end. But then I do think it of very great importance, after the misconception that has occurred, that we should clearly know from some Member of the Cabinet—and, as we are in Committee, I hope from the Lord President himself—what he really wishes us to believe that he really did say. As confidence in the Administration is the fashion of the day, I shall be too happy to take the noble Lord's last edition, or his last version of this great manifesto which he has delivered to-day, without the slightest doubt or reserve. But a great deal of mischief may have been done in the interim. We live in an age of electric telegraphs. There is a telegraph communicating with Warsaw, I believe—I am not sure that it does not reach St. Petersburg; and, for aught I know, the imaginary speech may be running through Europe at this moment. It is also of importance that the most popular medium of the political information of the day should, at the earliest moment, be enabled to send forth positively the noble Lord's latest version of what he did say, or meant to say. And let me just call the attention of the Committee to the extraordinary position in which Parliament has been placed throughout this Session by the speeches of the leading Ministers of the Crown on our foreign policy, which have been delivered in places where the most clear statements ought to be made—the two Houses of Parliament. Why, a noble Lord in another place, the leader of the Government, made a statement—I did not hear, in that case, that it was an imaginary statement—that excited the indignation of the assembly to which it was addressed, and of the whole nation—the whole people of England. It was very contrary to the statement which we imagined, till just this minute, we had heard this evening from the noble Lord opposite, which excited the admiration of the House, and which to-morrow we supposed would meet with the approbation of the people of England. But allow me to remind the House, that the noble Lord in another place—though he did not pretend for a moment that what he said was imaginary, that what his hearers supposed he said was an hallucination on their part—did, when he found that what he had said created alarm in the country, recall and recant what he had so said. Though the noble Lord says guilty—if it were guilt—of making that first speech which so agitated and alarmed the people of this country—still, I cannot for the life of me understand how that noble Lord erred more than the noble Lord here (Lord John Russell), who has the art of making speeches which convey to the House of Commons, on important subjects, results exactly contrary to those which he intends; because, so far as I can now understand the policy of the noble Lord, there is no difference between the policy which the noble Lord now professes and the policy which was professed in that first speech made in another place by Lord Aberdeen, and which he was obliged, as it were, to recall and recant. What does the noble Lord say? The noble Lord says that peace is not to be for a moment consented to unless the protectorate of Russia over the Principalities is abolished—no very difficult task I should think, under present circumstances, and not requiring a grand alliance; that Russia, under a treaty—of course under a treaty—should not possess in the Black Sea more than a certain number of ships of war at all times—about the most difficult treaty of all kinds to put in practice. But of course it is quite premature to descant on the merits of such a capitulation. The noble Lord cannot, I think, pretend that there is any great difference—and I do not think that hon. Gentlemen in this House who make such painful distinctions between the position and the policy of Lord Aberdeen and the position and policy of some of his colleagues are acting with frankness and fairness to Lord Aberdeen if they persist in them. I do not pretend to be a supporter or admirer of Lord Aberdeen, but I cannot say that I at any time admire the Parliamentary policy that would make a distinction between the responsibility of an individual Member of a Cabinet apart from that of his colleagues under any circumstances. But I go further in the present case. I say that the policy which Lord Aberdeen has recommended, or has announced and follows, does not appear to me, after the noble Lord has informed us that the statement which I imputed to him has no foundation whatever, but is purely imaginary—I say it does not appear to me that the policy of Lord Aberdeen, enunciated in the first speech to which I have referred, substantially, upon this all-important subject, varies from that of the noble Lord opposite. Well, Sir, that is some satisfaction to the people of England. We have not a divided Cabinet. We hear at last as the Session closes, that they are in unison upon one subject; and, so far as the conduct of the war for small purposes, so far as having for the great object of their policy a mean and insignificant end, Her Majesty's Ministers, though they are a Coalition Ministry, appear to be unanimous.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I certainly hope, Mr. Bouverie, that that event which the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has announced as probably taking place at the present moment, may in fact, be realised, namely, that what has been passing in debate this evening is already flying upon the wings of lightning to the capital of Russia; for I think it will be news which will place the Power with which we are contending in that same embarrassment and difficulty, between admiration and consternation, in which the right hon. Gentleman has stated himself to have been thrown by the speech of my noble Friend. I think that when the people of Russia find, that upon an occasion on which the British Government has been making a solemn appeal to the Parliament of England for confidence and support, during the period—whatever it may be—when by the ordinary course of events it is divested of the daily countenance and support of Parliament, and when they find that that appeal has been met only by criticisms upon what some hon. Members conceive to be a want of energy here or there, or an insufficiency of vigour in conducting the war—when they see the unanimity with which the great objects which this country has engaged to accomplish has been approved by the representatives of the people of England—I think that they will be struck with admiration at the generous and manly feeling of the country, and will see with consternation the absence of any material difference of opinion as to the main points of the struggle in which the nation has engaged. The right hon. Gentleman has asked us what is our policy? I might, I think, postpone answering that question until he shall have made up his mind as to whether the announcement my noble Friend has made excites his admiration or has overwhelmed him with consternation. Perhaps it may do both; because, without imputing to leaders of Opposition any other feeling than that which naturally becomes their position, any statement from a Ministry that excites their admiration must also necessarily in some degree produce a feeling of consternation. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman upon this subject—on which perhaps, if there did exist any material difference of opinion, the organ of the party out of power might have taken some large and comprehensive views of the policy of the country—might have stated views differing from those of the Government—and might have confirmed those views by great argument taken from international policy and European interest—the right hon. Gentleman instead has given us a very amusing speech, playing upon words—endeavouring to pick holes in an argument; and I am sure my noble Friend must have shared the satisfaction which all on this bench have felt when we found that, instead of meeting us with any hostile expression—which indeed would have been most painful for us to have heard—the right hon. Gentleman argued the question in a very agreeable and friendly manner, and merely turned his observations to produce some cheers and laughter from that side of the House, founded upon distinctions which—as I have already said—had no real foundation in what fell from my noble Friend. Sir, my noble Friend did speak as the organ of the Government. The opinions which my noble Friend expressed as to the objects and arrangements which could alone be considered as affording a sufficient security to Europe to be accomplished by the war—were opinions which are shared by his Colleagues. It would ill become anybody to argue in this House, to lay down beforehand what should be the especial result of operations which depend upon the chances of war. My noble Friend pretended to do no such thing. My noble Friend pointed out that the object for which we had engaged in this contest was the independence and integrity of the Turkish empire, and, at the same time, security for Europe against the recurrence of those events which have led to the present unfortunate state of things. That security must be accomplished by the united arms of England and France; I care not who else joins us, or who else may stand aloof. These two great countries—the two greatest military and naval Powers of the world—united in cordial alliance for the accomplishment of any object, are surely able, by their own energetic action, to accomplish such a peace as shall satisfy the conditions upon which we think the security of Europe shall be based. Sir, Gentlemen have found fault with different parts of the arrangements that have hitherto been made. Why, it is very natural that a country which has for a long period of time been enjoying uninterruptedly the advantages and blessings of peace—it is very natural that it should not be able to estimate all the difficulties which are incident to the commencement of a great war—a war to be carried on at a remote part of the world, whither a large military force has to be conveyed by sea with all the equipments which are necessary for the carrying on of its operations. Why, Sir, instead of thinking that any improper delay has occurred, I think that any man who knows anything of military and naval operations will agree that, considering the short period of time which has elapsed since the forces of England and France left their respective shores, considering the difficulty of transporting over such an extent of sea so large a military force, with all the horses, baggage, guns, and equipments which are necessary to enable it to carry on its operations—I think that the astonishment would rather be at the rapidity with which these operations have been conducted, and at the degree of completeness which they have already attained, rather than any feeling that any undue delay, or any want of proper exertion, had occurred. It will be found that there are at the present time in Turkey two armies, of English and French, as complete, I believe, and as fitted to accomplish whatever operations they may have to perform, as any troops that ever took the field. The commanders by sea and by land are men in whom the two nations may place their confidence, and without—although we are told that this is a council of war—without accepting the bait just held out to discuss the plan of the campaign, and to deliberate upon the operations of the war, I think that if the Parliament of this country have brought themselves so far to place confidence in Her Majesty's Government as to continue to them the conduct of the war, and to intrust them with the ample means which have been placed at their disposal, and moreover to give them that which is now asked to meet incidental and unforeseen emergencies, I think they are bound, at least, to believe that there will be no want of energy in the carrying on of operations—that there will be no want of judgment in selecting the object to which their operations shall be directed. I say, then, that it is satisfactory that, upon he present occasion, there exists in this House, upon the main and great points at issue, that same agreement of opinion which I believe to exist in the country at large. I can assure the House that my noble Friend, in speaking as the organ of the Government, has not overrated the determination of Her Majesty's Ministers to prove themselves worthy of the confidence which the nation and Parliament have placed in them; and that we do trust, that when Parliament meets again, be it sooner or be it later, it will have no reason to think that that confidence has been misapplied, or that the means placed at the disposal of the Government have not been employed for the purpose for which they were intended and voted. With regard to the meeting of Parliament, I am sure that none of those who have heard the manner in which my noble Friend has expressed himself in regard to the feelings of thankfulness which animate Her Majesty's Government for the generous support which we have received from Parliament in the course of these operations, can imagine, that if at any period during the recess circumstances should arise which would render it desirable that we should have the support, assistance, and advice of Parliament, there could be any hesitation on the part of the Government to resort at once to this House and to Parliament for that purpose. Every man knows that prorogations are only from time to time, and that, therefore, there is nothing to prevent Her Majesty's Government, if occasion should arise, from resorting, within the shortest possible period, to the assistance and the advice of Parliament. There can be no need, therefore, for any Resolution of this House, either to direct the attention of the Government to that subject, or to enable them to call Parliament together if they should think it expedient to do so. Sir, I should only hope, that, in whatever may remain of this discussion, this House will recollect that we are discussing this subject in the face of all Europe, that not only the character of the country, but in a great degree the moral position and influence of the country, depends upon the tone which is taken in this House upon matters of such great national importance; and although undoubtedly nothing has been said in this debate to tend in any degree to lower the moral and political influence of England in Europe in regard to these questions, I should hope that the final result will be that Europe—our allies and those who are our foes—our friends and our enemies—those who are with us and those who are against us—and those who are wavering between the two—shall see by the vote of this House that there is a settled determination on the part of Parliament and of the country that this war in which we have been reluctantly engaged—which has originated not from a Coalition Government, but from the reckless ambition of one man whose mind has been carried away by a course of successes which has led him to overrate the power of the country which he governs—that this war, I say, in which we have reluctantly engaged, but into which we have entered for objects of the greatest importance, not only to Europe, but to the civilised world—a war which can only be concluded except upon such terms as may justify the conduct of those who engaged in it, and may afford to Europe and to the world a fair prospect that, for a long time to come, we shall not be placed in a situation in which we may be compelled to make exertions of a similar nature for a similar purpose.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he thought that what had passed that evening had very materially altered the position of affairs. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had made a retraction, or what amounted to a retraction, of one portion of his speech; and as it appeared that a speech of a different character from that of the noble Lord had been made in another place by the head of the Government that evening, he thought that the House ought not to pass the Vote until they should have obtained further information with respect to the intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers, and until they should have been enabled further to consider what course they ought to adopt upon that subject. He, therefore, felt it his duty to move that the Chairman should report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL:—Unless some Motion is made which will be either a reduction of the amount asked or a refusal of it, I cannot see on what ground we can be asked to report progress. The noble Lord says that I made a retraction of the speech I delivered in the early part of the evening. But I deny that I made any retraction whatever. I was stating in the speech what might be the terms of peace. I stated at the commencement of the Session, and I repeated to-night, that it was very undesirable we should discuss the operations of the war, or speculate on what might be the result of those operations. I was not, therefore, speaking in any way as to the operations of the war. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Cobden) said that we were holding a council of war, and that I proposed the capture of Sebastopol and the conquest of the Crimea, which was to be given to some new Power. I must say that I never stated anything of the kind. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had not risen, it was my intention at the close of the debate, in answering different observations made in the course of the evening, to have noticed that statement of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the West Riding. I have no doubt that he mistook what I said; but certainly the difference is very great between a statement with regard to the terms of peace, which, if negotiations were entered into, might be asked as things at present stand, and a speculation as to the operations of the war, in which I never entered. What I said was, that I did not think Russia could be allowed to keep a position at Sebastopol which was menacing to the independence of Turkey; but the manner in which she was to be deprived of that position I left unexplained, as I thought it was my duty to do. I only said that there is at Sebastopol a naval force which is a perpetual menace to the existence of the Turkish empire. I cannot see why the discussion should now be adjourned.

Mr. HENLEY said, he certainly understood what the noble Lord said very much as he said it now. The noble Lord, in his first address, had drawn a distinction between the proposals which would have formed a proper basis for negotiations before the war, and the proposals which would form such a basis at present; and he had understood the noble Lord, in drawing that distinction, to have stated that some alteration in the Crimea would be one of the bases of negotiations on which the Allied Powers would now insist. It appeared to him that under those circumstances the hon. Member for the West Riding had very naturally inferred that it was intended that an expedition should be directed against the Crimea. He (Mr. Henley) had certainly felt at the time that the announcement of the noble Lord was a very extraordinary one; and that announcement had, as he thought, very naturally misled the House.

Mr. LAYARD had certainly understood the noble Lord to say that the large naval establishment in the Crimea should be done away with and destroyed. Considering that something of importance appeared to have been said in another place, and there would probably not be another opportunity of a debate upon this subject, he thought it of the utmost importance that time should be given for consideration, and he should, therefore, support the Motion of the noble Lord (Lord Dudley Stuart) that the Chairman should now report progress.

Mr. GROGAN had heard the speech of the noble Lord, and the impression conveyed to his mind was that which had been attributed to the noble Lord. Considering that Parliament was about to be prorogued, and that we had embarked in what we were assured would be a most protracted and expensive war, he did not think they would be doing their duty in allowing this Vote to pass, and this debate to close, without a clear and explicit explanation of what was to be the policy of the Government with regard to the war. Had the statement of the Government been confined to that which had proceeded from the leader of this House, there might have been no reason for protracting this discussion; but considering that a directly contrary version of the policy and the intentions of the Government had, it seemed, been given in another place, Her Majesty's Government ought to have the opportunity of consulting together, and of telling the House to-morrow what was their deliberate and definite policy.

Sir JOHN SHELLEY said, he most distinctly understood the noble Lord to state that nothing but the destruction of Sebastopol would be a basis for peace, and he even turned to an hon. Friend behind and made him repeat what the noble Lord said. It was lucky for him (Sir J. Shelley) that he did not catch the Chairman's eye, for he intended to have risen and thanked the noble Lord for the gallant speech that he had made; and he could only say that he wished he might to-morrow read in the papers that the noble Lord had made such a speech. He did not wish it to go forth for a moment that there was any doubt that they were prepared to stand by the Government; and, as it seemed to him there would be another opportunity for taking the discussion, he suggested to his noble Friend that he should withdraw his Motion, and that the debate should be taken on bringing up the report.

MR. BOOKER chanced to be standing at the bar in another place during the debate which occurred there this evening, and to his mind nothing could be so contradictory as the statements he had heard here and elsewhere. After the retractions to which he had listened, he was of opinion that an opportunity ought to be afforded for the Government to reconsider the expressions which had been made use of in this House, and for the representatives of the people to consider what course they should pursue.

MR. HORSMAN thought the Motion for reporting progress placed the Committee in a position of some difficulty. The desire for further debate appeared a very reasonable one, but, on the other hand, the noble Lord had reminded them very properly that there was no objection to the Vote, and, without having any issue raised, the Committee would be acting rather inconsistently in adjourning the debate. It should be remembered that, as had been stated, there would be an opportunity to renew the discussion on bringing up the report, and he would suggest that at this stage the Government might arrange that an opportunity should be given to his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart) to make any observations he pleased as to what had taken place here or elsewhere.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had no objection to adopt the course suggested by the hon. Gentleman if it could be made to agree with the arrangements of the House. The House was aware that Notices of Motion had precedence of Orders of the Day on Tuesday; but if they could fix the report on this Resolution, supposing it to be now agreed to, at six o'clock to-morrow, before the other business upon the paper, he should be quite ready to agree to this arrangement. As his hon. Friend had stated, this would present an opportunity for any hon. Member to raise this question again.

MR. PETO: As one of those Members who had a notice of Motion upon the paper for to-morrow, was quite ready to give way in order to meet the suggestion. With regard to the mistake which had been alluded to, he certainly did understand the noble Lord not at all to express what the right hon. Gentleman opposite had represented him to have said. He had understood the noble Lord to say this—and only that Russia could not be allowed to maintain the menacing position she had maintained hitherto with regard to the Crimea and Sebastopol.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, it was due to the noble Lord the Member for the City of London to state what his impression was. He had understood the noble Lord to state that it would be the bounden duty of this country and of its allies, in the event of a peace, to see that some security was taken that we should not be exposed to a similar incursion on the part of Russia in the East, and that certain precautions should be taken against such results, and, among others, that such questions should be considered as the protectorate of the Danubian Principalities, and also whether some precautions should not be taken against that menacing power which existed at Sebastopol at this moment. He did not consider it just to attempt to attach an extreme sense to what had fallen from the noble Lord.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND was under the same impression as to what had fallen from the noble Lord as the hon. Member who had just sat down. He hoped that the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone would not persevere with his Motion, as he felt perfectly sure that the effect of taking a division upon that Motion would be to create an impression, not only in the country, but also among the enemies of the country, that the House of Commons had no confidence in those to whom was confided the conduct of the war.

LORD DUDLEY STUART was perfectly of opinion that it was very desirable that unanimity should be displayed on this question; and if the noble Lord the President of the Council would give him a distinct assurance that the report of the Committee of Supply should be brought up at such a time as would afford him an opportunity of bringing the subject to which he had referred under discussion, he was willing to withdraw his Motion. He begged to say that it was his intention to move a Resolution to the effect that it was the opinion of that House that an Address should be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased not to prorogue Parliament until She might be enabled to afford the House more full information with respect to the relations existing with foreign Powers, and of Her views and prospects in the contest in which Her Majesty was engaged.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL proposed to take the report of Supply at six o'clock this day.

He wished at the same time to say, that although it was gratifying to him that three Members of that House should have declared that they understood his observations in the sense in which they were intended, still he greatly regretted that there should have been such ambiguity in his mode of expression that other Members should have attached a different meaning to his words. He was aware that ambiguity of expression was a great fault in one whose duty it was to express the opinions of Government; but the Committee would consider that he was in the difficult position of wishing to afford all the information in his power, while at the same time he was compelled by duty not to say more than was absolutely necessary.

Resolved—

"That a sum not exceeding 3,000,000*l.* be granted to Her Majesty, to enable Her Majesty to provide for any additional expense which may arise in consequence of the War in which Her Majesty is now engaged against the Emperor of all the Russias."

House resumed.

NUISANCES REMOVAL AND DISEASES PREVENTION ACTS CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

LORD SEYMOUR said, he considered the principle contained in the Bill to be most objectionable, and he would press upon the noble Lord the Home Secretary the propriety of withdrawing it, and either bringing in a modified Bill, or deferring the subject until next Session. If the noble Lord would not accede to his suggestion, he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

MR. IRTON said, he would second the Amendment proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Bill had come down from the House of Lords, and a great portion of it was to consolidate existing enactments. It was proposed, however, to take certain additional powers, some of which would be found to be necessary, and others might be modified. Cholera had now made its appearance in the metropolis and other places in a severe form, and he felt that it was necessary to pass some such measure as this. If it was too late to discuss it now, and it was thought desirable, he had no objection to consent to the postponement of the second reading till Wednesday.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it would be far better to withdraw the Bill altogether. The present law was extremely stringent, and he believed the additions contained in the present Bill would be found very objectionable.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that no one was less desirous than himself to give unnecessary trouble, and, though he thought the Bill would be beneficial, with certain modifications, he would not press the second reading in the present feeling of the House.

Question "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question" put, and negatived; Words added; Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

The House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

MEDICAL GRADUATES (UNIVERSITY OF LONDON) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD MONTEAGLE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that its object was to extend to the Graduates and Bachelors and Doctors of Medicine of the University of London the same right to practise in virtue of their degrees as is enjoyed by the graduates in medicine of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. This was no more than was the intention at the time the Charter was originally conferred on the London University. The second clause of the Bill was rendered necessary by the circumstance that two Acts had been passed during the last Session of Parliament—the Vaccination Act and the Lunacy Act—under which, on account of an oversight on the part of its authors in omitting the London University from its provisions, certain penalties had been incurred by medical practitioners who had graduated there, and from which they would be indemnified by this Bill.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, there was some difficulty in the way of dealing with the Bill in its present form; but he should be sorry to oppose its principle, for he thought the University of London ought to be placed on an equality in the matter of granting medical degrees with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, as was originally proposed. In the first place the Bill touched upon a subject of much controversy in the medical profession, namely, whether the licence for general practice should be given by the old licensing bodies, or whether the University degrees should carry with them the right to practise medicine. His own inclination was, he admitted, in favour of the principle that, under certain restrictions, the great Universities of the kingdom should have the power of granting licences to practise to medical graduates concurrently with giving them their degrees. So far he agreed with the Bill; but if the Bill passed now, it would settle the question of controversy only in a partial manner. A medical degree conferred by the London University doubtless implied a high amount of proficiency; but he contended that it would be unjust to extend the monopoly enjoyed by Oxford and Cambridge to the graduates at the London and Durham Universities, to the exclusion of the Universities in the North. He apprehended that, if those who were now so anxious to break up the existing monopoly were once admitted to a participation in that monopoly, they would not hereafter be so eager to put an end to it in favour of their Scotch and Irish brethren; and he thought it would be extremely unfair to give the privilege to the one and refuse it to the other. In his opinion the

Lord Monteaigle

Bill ought to be limited to the second clause, exempting graduates of the Universities of London and Durham from the pains and penalties they had incurred under the Lunacy and Vaccination Acts of last Session, and that in that form their Lordships might agree to the measure.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he had contemplated moving in Committee the insertion of a clause to extend the provisions of the Bill to graduates of the Scotch and Irish Universities; he was willing, however, to accept the compromise of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll). The Scotch Universities did not wish to have any superiority over those of London and Durham, but, at the same time, they did not wish to be degraded below them. The effect of the present Bill would be to place the latter in a higher position, which was not fair to the Scotch Universities.

LORD BROUGHAM considered that there was no ground for not extending to the Scotch Universities the same rights and privileges which were proposed to be conferred upon the London University. He was surprised to find Durham University inserted at all in the Bill, which, though most excellently adapted for teaching all the other branches of knowledge, was totally unfitted for the teaching of medicine. The hospital practice at Durham must necessarily be very inadequate, and where there was not hospital practice, there could not be effective medical instruction. If Durham was inserted in the Bill, the Scotch Universities had ten times the claim to that distinction.

LORD MONTEAGLE briefly replied, and urged upon their Lordships the adoption of the Bill.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION (IRELAND).

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE rose to call the attention of the House to the present state of postal communication in Ireland. The noble Earl said that the present postal arrangement in Ireland had given rise to very great complaints on the part of the public; and various petitions had been presented from the south of Ireland on the subject. The fact was, that since the establishment of railways there had been less postal accommodation afforded to the people of Ireland than there was before that great improvement in the means of speedy transit. Even where railway communication did exist the Post Office authorities did not avail themselves sufficiently of the facilities for the conveyance of the mails. As an illustration of this, he might mention that, although there was a direct railway between Dublin and Waterford, the mails were carried by railway only so far as Malton, and thence conveyed for the rest of the journey by coach over very indifferent roads; thus delaying their arrival at Waterford several hours later than it should be. Another complaint made by the petitioners on this subject referred to the absence of day mails, from the want of which commercial persons suffered much inconvenience, and the Post Office sustained considerable loss from the transmission of letters as parcels. Another ground of complaint was, the inconvenience and delay which existed in regard to the posts between towns not upon the main line of communication. The Bishop of the diocese in which he (the Earl of Donoughmore) resided was in the habit of going to the seaside in the summer months, and in some cases it took four days for his letters to reach his clergy. In reply to his complaint, that the railways were not sufficiently used for the postal communications, he anticipated that his noble Friend the Postmaster General (Viscount Canning) would reply that the railway companies asked unreasonable sums for the conveyance of mails. In answer to this, however, he would say that the Limerick and Waterford Railway had offered to convey the mails between those places for a rate of remuneration lower than that which was paid to the Great Southern and Western Company, but that their offer had been refused. He thought he had at least made out a case for inquiry, and he hoped that the noble Viscount would make inquiries into these matters, and see if he could not make arrangements which would be satisfactory to the districts which now complained of want of accommodation.

VISCOUNT CANNING said, that while nothing could be further from his desire than to insist upon any arrangements which might be inferior to the due administration of postal communication in Ireland, he could not concur in the conclusions to which the noble Earl had come upon this subject, and should have to dissent from some of the statements which he had made in regard to it. Though it was true that petitions had been presented to that House upon the subject, yet they had all been from the south of Ireland. With the permission of the House, he would state a few facts to show that the noble Earl was in error when he accused the Post Office of having refused to allow the just claims of Ireland. The gross postal revenue of Great Britain was 2,294,000*l.* and the Post Office expenditure 1,204,000*l.*, or about 50 per cent of the revenue. The gross postal revenue of Ireland amounted to 198,000*l.*, and the expenditure to 185,000*l.* Therefore the management of postal communication in Ireland amounted to 93 per cent of the receipts, while in England it amounted to only about 50 per cent. Of the gross revenue for Ireland, only 17,000*l.* found its way into the Exchequer. In these figures he had stated the matter favourably to Ireland, because he had charged to Great Britain the whole expense of the packets between Holyhead and Dublin, amounting to 20,000*l.* a year, and that of the line between Chester and Holyhead, incurred on account of the Irish postage, amounting to 30,000*l.* In Great Britain the conveyance of a letter cost upon the average $\frac{1}{4}$ d.; in Ireland it cost 1*d.* and one-tenth, showing that in Ireland the expense was greater than the receipts. In further evidence that Ireland was not treated unfairly, or subjected to any unnecessary disadvantages in regard to postal matters, he would refer to the amount of business that was transacted in the money-order department, and the privileges that were extended to Ireland in this respect. It was very generally acknowledged that this branch of the business of the Post Office was of very great service to all classes of persons; and, although it never was expected to increase the amount of the revenue to any large amount, yet it was always expected to meet its own expenditure at least. But what were the facts of the case with respect to Ireland and the money-order department in 1853? Why, whereas in England the money-order department brought to the Exchequer a profit of 14,000*l.*, in Ireland there was a dead loss of 770*l.* As to the question of direct mails, and Ireland being unfairly treated in this respect, such was certainly not the case, as a proof of which it might be mentioned that direct mails had been established in Ireland more than two months before they were established in England. Within the last twelve months a direct mail had been established between Dungarvon and Youghal, and between Youghal and Fermoy; and a direct coach mail also between Kilkenny and Thurles. At this moment negotiations were being carried on with the directors of the Great Southern and Western Railway for the acceleration of the mails, and many other improvements were under consideration. The noble Earl presumed correctly that he would be met on the question of expense; and, when the large prices were considered which the Irish railways demanded for the transit of the mails, this was scarcely surprising. The rate paid in England to the South Western and Great Western Railways for a day and night mail was 2*s.* 9*d.* per mile; the rate paid to the Great Southern and Western Railway in Ireland for a similar service, performed at a lower speed, was 5*s.* 6*d.*, or just double the amount. In England the average number of letters carried per week was 704,000; in Ireland it was 196,000. Therefore the price paid for an inferior service in Ireland was double that paid in England, while the number of letters carried was only about one-fourth. Although the offer made by the Limerick and Waterford Railway was moderate, compared with the charge of the Great Southern and Western, yet it amounted to 1,300*l.* per annum, while the postage of the letters whose transport it would have accelerated amounted to only 350*l.* Ireland had, unfortunately, not shown the same elasticity in regard to correspondence that had been exhibited in England and Scotland. In the case of Scotland, the reduction of the postage had been followed by a gradual increase in the amount of correspondence, so that, notwithstanding the difference of population as compared with Ireland, it had now reached in Scotland the highest point ever attained in Ireland. Though he could not promise to meet the arrangements proposed by the noble Earl, he would, nevertheless, be quite ready fully to consider any proposition that was submitted to him on the subject; but, at the same time, he could not hold out to him any promise that a largely increased use of the railways in Ireland would be had recourse to so long as the payment demanded by them greatly exceeded that which he was bound to say he regarded as a reasonable rate of remuneration.

LORD MONTEAGLE referred to the irregularities caused by the present system, and observed, with reference to the small amount of correspondence in Ireland, that one cause of this was to be found in

COMMUNICATION IN RAILWAY TRAINS.

EARL FITZHARDINGE rose to inquire whether the attention of Her Majesty's Ministers had been drawn to a late attempt to murder a policeman in a railway carriage? and whether, in consequence, they had any intention to introduce a measure to compel the railway companies to adopt some means of enabling the guard to communicate with the engine driver when trains were in motion? The noble Earl then referred to a circumstance which occurred, on the 10th May last, upon the Manchester and Sheffield Railway, and which had been noticed in all the public papers about that time. The facts were shortly these:—While two prisoners, who were handcuffed, were being conveyed upon that railway, in custody of a policeman, one of them succeeded in removing the handcuffs from his wrists, and in effecting his escape by jumping from the carriage. The other attacked the policeman, beating him about the head and body with his irons, and inflicting severe wounds. A fearful struggle took place between the two, the policeman vainly endeavouring by his cries to obtain assistance. Although seriously injured, he succeeded in retaining the custody of the prisoner until the train stopped at the usual station, where the necessary assistance was afforded him. At the trial which took place, it was clearly admitted that there was no means at present of communicating with the driver to stop the engine, unless he happened to look back. It, therefore, became necessary that legislation should be resorted to, in order to compel railway companies to furnish the means of communication between the front and rear of a train, or between the driver and guard; for, as matters now stood, the surest place in which a man could with impunity commit an offence of the greatest magnitude, such as murder, robbery, or violence to women, was a railway carriage. It was generally said, that there were insurmountable difficulties in the way of effecting this communication between guard and driver. He, however, was unable to see why that should be; for he had been informed that neither Mr. Brunel, Mr. Stephenson, or Mr. Locke shared in that opinion, and that, on the contrary, they believed all the difficulties in the way might be easily overcome by mechanical contrivances. He trusted, then, that of not this Session, at

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY was fully sensible of the importance of the subject which the noble Earl had brought under the notice of the House, and he could assure him that it was a matter which had received the fullest consideration of the Government. The noble Earl was aware that a Committee of the other House of Parliament had been appointed to consider the subject of railway accidents, and that that Committee had strongly recommended that it should be obligatory on railway companies to establish some ready and easy communication between the guard and the driver. The railway companies themselves had also expressed their readiness to adopt any scheme that might best promote the object aimed at. It was highly desirable, however, that whatever mode was adopted should be applicable to all railways alike, and be adopted on fresh lines as they were constructed. He believed a mode had been adopted on the South Western line of communicating with the driver by means of a rope running along the carriages, and worked upon a winch at one end. A report had, in the course of the present year, been made to the Board of Trade by Captain Wynne, on the subject of Professor Gluckman's invention, in which he stated that Professor Gluckman had satisfactorily established an effective means of communication between guard and driver. That plan had been tried for a short time on the North Western Railway, and had been in operation for about four months on the Great Northern line:—and in a second Report of Captain Wynne, which he had seen, his opinion of the invention was still satisfactory; and he might state that he had himself been informed that evening by a Member of the other House, connected with the London and North Western Railway, that that company was under an engagement to use Professor Gluckman's patent. As the noble Earl probably knew, a Bill had been introduced into the House of Commons this Session into which a clause was introduced making it compulsory on railway companies to establish the means of communication between the guard and the driver; but the precise mode in which it was to be accomplished could not be pointed out either by the Government or the Legislature—it must be left to the companies themselves. From the great pressure of business the Bill had been withdrawn. He might say, however, that in the next Session of Parliament a Bill would be presented to their Lordships to carry that object into effect. At the same time it was but fair to state that they had ample evidence to show that the officers connected with the various railways manifested the greatest possible care to provide against accidents, and that they paid the utmost attention to the management of the railways committed to their care; inasmuch as that during the last six months not one fatal accident had occurred from causes over which the companies could have any control.

EARL FITZHARDINGE was quite willing to join in testifying to the efficient manner in which railways were now managed; at least, nothing could be more complete than the arrangements of the Great Western Company, which was the line he was best acquainted with. But all those arrangements had reference merely to the prevention of accidents; and, therefore, allusions to them bore in no way upon the evil which he wished to see remedied—namely, the perpetration of great crimes in railway carriages.

LORD CAMPBELL thought that the public ought to be very much indebted to the noble Earl for having brought the subject under the notice of their Lordships. He must say there was very great reason to complain that the Bill on the subject of railways alluded to by the noble Lord had not been laid upon their Lordships' table. The Session before last he himself had pointed out several defects in the law relative to railways requiring to be urgently corrected. Amongst other points held out by the Judges as requiring a remedy was, that railway companies were not held liable for anything done by their servants, although those servants acted under the most complete idea that they were but fulfilling the orders given to them; and, therefore, unless it could be proved that a particular act was done by the authority and under the seal of the company, the injured party had no remedy against them. On a recent occasion, a respectable tradesman, who had provided himself with a return ticket, happened to return by an express train, when, on landing on the platform, a demand was made on him by a servant of the company for a sum of half-a-crown additional, in consequence of his having journeyed by an express train. On the man demurring to comply with the demand, he was actually conveyed away, and locked up in jail for twenty-four hours: and when, subsequently, he brought an action against the company for false imprisonment, he could get no redress, because it was contended that the servant had acted beyond his instructions. Now, he (Lord Campbell) had ventured to point out on that occasion, that it would be most reasonable that a railway should be held responsible for the acts of its servants, where it could be clearly shown that they believed they were bona fide executing the orders of their employers. He was very sorry that the intention of the Government had not been carried into effect in reference to railway legislation, and the circumstance of the delay only served to remind him of the existence of a certain place said to be paved with good intentions. But the fact was, the whole machinery of legislation seemed wholly out of gear this Session of Parliament, and the public interests had suffered accordingly.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY reiterated his assurance that legislation this Session had only been thrown over in consequence of the pressure of business. The noble and learned Lord, however, might rely upon it that a measure would be introduced next Session of Parliament.

House adjourned to Thursday next.

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Question [24th July]. That the Clause,

"(And whereas doubts have also arisen as to whether the giving of refreshment to Voters on the day of nomination or day of polling be or be not according to law, it is expedient that such doubts should be removed; Be it Declared and Enacted, That the giving, or causing to be given, to any Voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such Voter having polled, or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket to enable such Voter to obtain refreshment, shall be held and be taken to amount to bribery or treating, as the case may be within the meaning of this Act,")

Lord Campbell

MR. WALPOLE said, he must take that occasion to express his dissatisfaction with the clause proposed by the noble Lord the President of the Council, providing that refreshment given to a voter on the day of polling, or the day of nomination, should be regarded as an act of bribery, or of treating within the meaning of the Act. He submitted to the House that such a provision was too severe and stringent, and that it greatly exceeded the requirements of the case. It was a clause which did not present any analogy with the practice and general conduct of the Members of that House; for nothing was of more usual occurrence than that political leaders in that House—such, for instance, as the noble Lord the President of the Council, or the chief of the Opposition, should give dinners to their supporters. If a Member of the House of Commons were to be allowed to give a political dinner to his supporters, why should not a candidate be permitted to entertain his constituents at breakfast on the day of the election? He begged of the noble Lord to consider the propriety of withdrawing a clause which public opinion did not approve, nor any public exigency require.

MR. THORNELY said, he was in favour of the clause, being distinctly of opinion that it was no duty of a candidate to pay any of the expenses of the voter, whether as regarded refreshment or travelling expenses. If refreshments were to be permitted in any form, however mitigated, the door would be opened for all those practices of riot and prodigality which had, unfortunately, brought so much discredit on the electoral system in this country.

MR. TATTON EGERTON said, he thought that moderate refreshment ought to be allowed, at all events at county elections, to voters who had travelled many miles to record their votes. The greatest political purist in the country could not, with any colour of truth, contend that any prejudice could result to public morals or to the public welfare, by allowing candidates to give luncheon, or refreshment of some trivial kind, to an elector who might have undergone much fatigue and inconvenience for the purpose of discharging a public duty. Such inordinate severity, he considered, would only defeat its own purpose.

MR. STANHOPE said, he wished to know, if this clause became law, how voters were to be got to the poll? Was it expected that poor men would come ten miles and upwards to the poll, having afterwards to pay for their refreshment, besides sacrificing the value of their day's work? He believed any hon. Gentleman who had ever contested a county would tell them that it was positively impracticable to get those persons to the poll without giving them some moderate refreshment. If they made the law as stringent as it was proposed by this clause, they would have all classes evading it.

MR. HEYWORTH said, if they wished to obtain a great principle, they must be prepared to submit to some sacrifice. Although it might be very disagreeable for a candidate to be unable to show his friends hospitality, yet the disadvantage would be more than compensated by the increased purity of election, for he believed a man could not give a farthing to a voter without degrading him in his own eyes.

MR. McCANN said, he regretted that the noble Lord had gone so far wrong as to allow travelling expenses, and if he consented to allow the introduction of a new system of bribery, by means of refreshment tickets, he should feel himself obliged to vote against the declaration.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he approved of the clause, believing that the sanctioning of refreshments would vitiate the whole Bill, by opening the door to all manner of deception and collusion on the part of the election agents. He was decidedly of opinion, that if any such provision were introduced into the Bill as would interfere with its effective operation, the consequence would be that the country would call for the ballot in a voice that could no longer be resisted.

MR. E. BALL said, he should support the clause, for if candidates were to be allowed to give refreshments in any proportion, however small, excess would sooner or later be the consequence, and it would be impossible to prevent the recurrence of those scenes of intoxication and crime which were a disgrace to this country. His election cost him nothing. He would never enter that House if obliged to have recourse to such means. The more efficient way to secure a pure constituency was by sending Members to that House free of expense. He was ready to support anything by which corruption should be diminished, and the purity of that House secured. He should vote against treating in any shape whatever, for to permit it in any form would be to let in the narrow end of the wedge.

MR. BARROW said, he thought that the elector ought under no circumstance to be bribed or rewarded for the exercise of his franchise, but it was only fair that he should be relieved from expense in regard to the discharge of that duty. The poor elector made a sufficient sacrifice when he sacrificed his time for the public good, but he thought it would be too much to expect that he should also defray his own expenses in the matters of refreshment and travelling.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 35: Majority 42.

Clause read a second time.

MR. BANKES then moved an Amendment for the insertion of certain words in the clause, the effect of which would be to legalise the allowance of refreshments which were reasonably incidental to the travelling expenses of the voters.

MR. HILDYARD seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed in line 7, after the word "refreshment," to insert the words "not being refreshment reasonably incidental to the travelling expenses of such voter."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the object of the clause which he had moved was to put an end to uncertainty on this subject, but he was afraid the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, if adopted, would lead again to that uncertainty which it was so desirable to do away with. It would be very difficult to say what were expenses reasonably incidental to travelling, and, supposing at a county election 100 voters were assembled in a tent, it would be extremely difficult to discriminate between those who came a long distance and those from the neighbourhood. He could not, therefore, accede to the proposal.

MR. PHINN said, he was against the clause, and if he thought it would stand ultimately he should vote for the Amendment.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that although he had every wish to put down treating as well as bribery, he thought it would be carrying legislation too far if they rejected the Amendment proposed by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bankes). If the voter came a distance of a mile or two, he certainly ought not to be allowed refreshment, but it was different where he came from a long distance, in which case his travelling expenses ought to be freely paid; and he (Sir F. Kelly) did not see how they could refuse to allow him some reasonable refreshment, because in many cases the voter would come from distant counties—from Cumberland, Northumberland, Cornwall, and even Scotland and Ireland; and he asked, were such persons to be starved on the journey? If the object was merely to legalise the giving of refreshment to those who only came a few miles, he should oppose it; but, as he understood it only referred to such expenses as were reasonably incidental to travelling, he must express a hope that the noble Lord would give way on the point.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he believed that the object with which the present Amendment was proposed was already attained by the 24th clause, which authorised candidates to defray the cost of "bringing voters to the poll." Now he felt sure that the courts of law would construe those words to include his reasonable refreshment on the journey. It was, in fact, what was known to lawyers as a viaticum.

MR. SPOONER said, that at all events it was clear that the noble Lord had not attained the object which he said he had in view—that of settling the law on this point; for the hon. and learned Gentleman who had last spoken and the Attorney General had given directly opposite opinions on the question whether "travelling expenses" included the cost of the necessary refreshments taken by the voter on the journey.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he thought the insertion of the travelling expenses clause a great mistake, and he hoped the noble Lord would not add another to the Bill by consenting to this Amendment.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) now proposed to open a wide door for corruption, which, if the Amendment was agreed to, would extend throughout the country. The whole of the mischief had been caused by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) giving way to the insertion of the clause excepting travelling expenses from the operation of the Bill. If he was about to consent to this Amendment, he considered the noble Lord had better give up the Bill altogether.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he still adhered to the opinion he had before expressed, that when they sanctioned the payment of the expenses of bringing a man from one place to another, they did not also sanction the expense of feeding him. He had himself voted against the clause authorising the payment of travelling expenses; but still he must admit that there was a great distinction between that and the payment for refreshments. A man must eat wherever he was, and therefore there was no reason why a candidate should defray for him a charge which he must otherwise have borne himself. His travelling expenses were, however, not an expenditure which he must necessarily incur, and there was, therefore, some—though he thought not sufficient—ground for relieving him from them. He should oppose the Amendment, believing it would open the door to corruption and abuses without end. It was not difficult to discover what a man's railway fare came to, and therefore to see what was the proper allowance for his travelling expenses; but it would be utterly impossible to say how much he should be allowed for refreshment on the journey.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, that everything that he heard confirmed him in the objections he entertained to the clause which authorised the payment of travelling expenses, and he therefore now gave notice that he would move its omission on the third reading of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, that it was his intention to support the Amendment, believing that it would remove the doubt and uncertainty which he thought existed as to what expenditure had been authorised under the cost of "bringing a voter to the poll." It was not at all clear whether these words authorised the payment of his hotel bill.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 113: Majority 52.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR then moved to leave out from the word "refreshment," in line 7, to the end of the clause, in order to insert the words "shall be deemed an illegal act, and the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40*s.* for each offence to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit," instead thereof.

MR. HILDYARD said, he wished to point out that any one guilty of treating came within the 7th clause, and would be consequently subjected to all the disabilities which the Legislature certainly did not intend to operate against any one who had violated the noble Lord's clause without any corrupt intention. He thought the introduction of the words "provided that such persons so offending should not be deemed to be guilty of treating within this Act" would obviate the difficulty.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he really thought the Amendment entirely unnecessary. Treating was defined by the Bill as corruptly giving refreshment to the voter, and that was the only way in which they could incur the heavy penalties of the 7th clause. This had reference merely to the case of supplying refreshments without any corrupt intention.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he would call the attention of the House to the fact that both in the Amendment and in what was termed "the treating" clause the word "offence" was used, and he therefore thought there ought to be some specific words defining it.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. M'MAHON then moved the insertion of the following clause after Clause 14—

"In case of any indictment or information by a private prosecutor for any offence against the provisions of this Act, if judgment shall be given for the defendant, he shall be entitled to recover from the prosecutor the costs sustained by the defendant by reason of such indictment or information, such costs to be taxed by the proper officer of the court in which such judgment shall be given. It shall not be lawful for any court to order payments of the costs of a prosecution for any offence against the provisions of this Act, unless the prosecutor shall, before or upon the finding of the indictment, or the granting of the information, enter into a recognisance, with two sufficient sureties, in the sum of 200*l.* (to be acknowledged in like manner as is now required in cases of writs of certiorari awarded at the instance of a defendant in an indictment), with the conditions following, that is to say, that the prosecutor shall conduct the prosecution with effect, and shall pay to the defendant or defendants, in case he or they shall be acquitted, his or their costs."

He thought that in such a case as was contemplated by the clause they were bound to give the defendant the same protection which he would receive in regard to costs against any malicious penal action. There was no novelty at all in the principle, and if it were not adopted candidates, agents, and all other persons engaged in an election would be liable at all times to the most vexatious proceedings. So far back as the reign of Edward I. a similar provision had been adopted in cases of appeal, and by the Act passed a few years back, it was applied to undue prosecutions for libel. By a second clause which he wished to bring forward, he proposed that it should not be lawful for any court to order payment of the costs of a prosecution for any offence against the provisions of this Act unless the prosecutor should, before or upon the finding of the indictment or the granting of the information enter into a recognisance with two sufficient sureties in the sum of 200*l.*, which he believed would be the amount of costs to be awarded in ordinary cases, on condition that the prosecutor should conduct the prosecution with effect, and should pay costs to the defendant, if acquitted. If the clauses were adopted, every private prosecutor would be at liberty, just as much as he was at present, to go before a grand jury and prefer his indictment, but with this difference, that he must go on with the prosecution—there must be no compromise or trifling with justice. It was not only for the benefit of the candidate, but for the benefit of all parties, that these clauses, founded on common sense and justice, should be adopted.

MR. PHINN said, he opposed the clause on the ground that the point was fully discussed in the Select Committee, and it was not considered desirable to insert such a provision. The policy of the law was not only to trust to public prosecutors, but to allow private persons to institute prosecutions; but they now sought to introduce a new principle, making prosecutions under this Act exceptional cases, and calling upon persons to give security for costs, which was a course wholly unknown even in cases of felony. In his opinion the power of prosecution should be free and unrestricted, otherwise they would throw the whole weight and responsibility on the Crown. The Bill did not make it compulsory on the Judge to award costs in case of a vexatious or malicious prosecution. A discretionary power in this respect was placed in the hands of the Judge. As a general provision that all parties wrongfully or vexatiously prosecuted should recover costs, he should have no objection to see something of the sort carried; but he objected to make an exceptional case, as proposed by these clauses.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he considered it absolutely necessary some provision should be made for the particular cases arising out of this Act. Prosecutions for murder, burglaries, or felony of any kind were seldom preferred from private motives, but it would be quite different with the cases which it might be supposed would arise out of this Act, on account of the great temptation there would be to indict for bribery from feelings of political partisanship and private animosity. They must recollect, also, that by the Bill they were creating a numerous class of offences, and it was highly desirable that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the persons prosecuted should have the protection sought to be given to them by this clause.

Mr. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he should support the clause, and thought all those who intended to become candidates at the next election would do well to follow his example. They had, as the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk just said, created a numerous class of offences, and they must take care that public objects were not sacrificed to private malice.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he was surprised to hear the hon. and learned Member for Bath (Mr. Phinn) attempt to argue that, because such a provision would not be applicable to cases of felony, it ought not to be introduced in this Bill, especially after the precedent furnished by the decision of Lord Campbell, which, being delivered in a case of libel, would be more analogous to a case under this Act than any other. If persons were to be exposed to innumerable actions from questionable motives, and were deprived of the protection afforded by this clause, he believed that the result would be, that the House would rise in indignation and sweep away the power of bringing actions for penalties under the Act altogether.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that with regard to bribery prosecutions, they stood on ground very different to that of penal prosecutions. He thought sufficient reason did not exist for making a particular exception in cases of bribery. If too many difficulties were put in the way of prosecutors, then they would find that the law would not be put in force in cases in which the law ought to be resorted to. He admitted, where actions were brought without reasonable cause, and from vexatious and malicious motives, that prosecutors ought not to be awarded their costs. But how would they prove motives, or that prosecutions were vexatious or malicious? He had no objection to meet the difficulty this way—to give a discretionary power to the Judge, in case the Judge might think a prosecution improper and malicious, to award costs; but he must say, he felt considerable hesitation in interfering with the old principle of English law, by which the costs were dependent on the result of the verdict.

Mr. BARROW said, he considered that, in instances where private pique and passion operated, as might be reasonably expected in these cases, some protection ought to be given, and that the Judge should have discretion as to the allowance of the cost.

Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he had always thought it unwise to vest any such discretion in the Judge, approving the simple rule, that the costs should go to the successful party. If they made the exercise of that discretion contingent on the presumption of malice, he should like to know how that question could be tried? It was much better either to leave the clause as it stood, or reject it altogether. He must say he was surprised to hear the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Bath (Mr. Phinn) on this particular subject. He knew a notable instance of the efficiency of the protection now sought in the case of a friend of his, who was Lord Mayor of Dublin, who had told him that, having been elected for that city, he had had no less than 170 actions brought against him, no doubt with the intention of ruining him by means of the costs required in defence, and which attempt was only defeated in consequence of the necessity of the parties giving security for the costs. He would advise the House, instead of giving prosecutors full swing, to throw all the protection they could around the prosecuted, to defend them against actions which were not bond fide.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that in his opinion, this being a matter of public, and not private interest, it would be exceedingly desirable that prosecutions should be conducted by a public officer, and not left to private parties.

Mr. M'MAHON, in reply, said, he must contend, that the principle embodied in the clause was by no means a new one in the English Constitution, he having examined the opinions of most of the text writers on the subject. He hoped the day would come when the House would pass a law whereby those who brought groundless actions under this Act against individuals of known credit, worth, and station, would be fined, imprisoned, and compelled to pay the costs of the men they had perilled in person and property. He could not conceive a more humiliating position than that of a Gentleman who, having come to the table and made the required declaration, was immediately after prosecuted by such parties for bribery and treating on the chance of getting a verdict against him. It was needless to say that the clause did not apply to prosecutions directed by the Crown.

Clause agreed to, as was also another clause brought forward by Mr. M'Mahon.

Three new clauses were then proposed by Sir F. Kelly, and agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^d on Friday, and to be printed.

THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE—SUPPLY— VOTE OF CREDIT.

Mr. BOUVIER brought up the report of the Committee of Supply.

Resolution reported :

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Resolution be now read a second time."

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he had given notice of an Amendment to the Resolution, which he would now beg to bring forward. He had, even before last night, considered it proper that an Amendment, such as he now proposed, should be made. Even before last night's debate, he repeatedly considered that a Motion of this kind was proper and desirable; but, if it were proper and desirable before the occurrences of last night, it was, since those occurrences, not only desirable, but necessary. He thought it probable that the annals of Parliament did not present a record of any occurrence similar to that which, to his astonishment, he witnessed last night, when the leader of the Government in that House came down upon a solemn occasion, and not in the heat of controversy—not in reply to observations which had been made by his opponents,—but deliberately, and in the most solemn manner, made an exposition of the objects and policy of the Government—of what the Government proposed to attain by prosecuting the present war, and subsequently, without the lapse of any considerable period, in the same debate, on the spot, and almost within the same hour, gave an explanation which was understood by the House to amount to a retraction.

["No, no!"] Well, at all events, it was so different from what the noble Lord had previously stated, that he did not know by what other word to describe it, except by that he had just used—retraction. Almost every one in the House had understood the noble Lord as he was understood by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the leader of the Opposition. ["No!"] Yes, he did not hesitate to say that the noble Lord was generally so understood. And his observation was confirmed when he looked at the usual sources of information by which the proceedings of that House were recorded and conveyed to the public. He found that the whole of those organs—hon. Gentlemen knew well what he meant—understood the noble Lord in the same manner. Take the noble Lord as he was reported in a journal generally favourable to the Government—

LORD DUDLEY STUART: The Times.

MR. SPEAKER immediately called "order."

LORD DUDLEY STUART: The noble Lord had called upon him to name, and if he had been guilty of a breach of order in acceding to that request, he apologised, and would not further refer to what that journal or organ reported on the subject. [An hon. Member: Go on—read the report.] He would not do so, but would refer to another report in a source or organ at least equally favourable to the Government. He would not mention the name of the source, but he repeated, it was equally, if not more, favourable to the Government than that to which he had previously adverted. The noble Lord was reported to have said—

"I say, with the knowledge of such a state of affairs, we ought to endeavour to obtain valid securities against acts of aggression similar to that which have so recently taken place. I hold, therefore, that it is impossible that the arrangements which were made by the Treaty of Adrianople with respect to the Principalities shall again be renewed—arrangements which give the Emperor of Russia a predominant voice in the political affairs of Wallachia and Moldavia—which give him the power of control in cases where he thinks the affairs are not conducted to his satisfaction, and which, by the destruction of all the Turkish fortresses, give him facilities at any moment for occupying with his army the two provinces, containing 4,000,000 of inhabitants. I say that the integrity of Turkey and the balance of power in Europe could not be secured by reverting to the status quo ante bellum, which would confirm such arrangements as regards Russia and Turkey. But there is another mode in which the position of Russia is menacing to the independence and integrity of Turkey. The establishment of a great fortress prepared with all the combinations of art and science, made as impregnable as it is possible for art and science to make it, and containing within its port a very large fleet of line-of-battle ships, ready at any moment to come down with a favourable wind to the Bosphorus—that I consider is a position so menacing to Turkey, that no treaty of peace could be considered safe which left the Emperor of Russia in that same menacing position with respect to Turkey. I have thought it right to state not particularly, but the general view of the Government with respect to the securities which we ought to obtain. What these special securities should be, in what manner they should be gained, and how they should be affirmed, is not a subject upon which I think I can go further than I have already done. I believe we shall be ready, as we have been ready, to communicate with the Government of France on this subject. I have every reason to believe that the views of the Government of the Emperor of France coincide with our own in this respect."

[Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen cheered that declaration. He did not wonder at it. He had cheered it himself on the previous night as heartily and sincerely as any one, for he was delighted at the noble Lord's utterance of such sentiments. But did the noble Lord stand to it? Did the noble Lord stand to his colours? Not at all; for, upon its being repeated, the noble Lord rose and said he had used no such expression. ["No, no!"] Yes, but the noble Lord did say in explanation, that what he meant was, that Russia ought not to be allowed to maintain so menacing an attitude by maintaining so large a fleet in the Black Sea. Did the hon. Gentleman—did any hon. Gentleman—think there was any discrepancy there? Was there no discrepancy between the first version of the noble Lord's sentiments and his subsequent explanation? Why, if Russia laid down one or two sail of the line, that would satisfy, or, at least, come within the terms of the requisitions of the noble Lord, as his explanation conveyed those terms. How the noble Lord had been induced to make an explanation which took away all the value of his first statement—a statement which was spirited, noble, and worthy of him—it was not for him (Lord D. Stuart) to explain. Perhaps the noble Lord had received some hints from his Colleagues as to what the head of the Government had stated in another place; perhaps he felt it to be necessary to retract those noble sentiments, in order to make them more in conformity with the views of the Premier—more in harmony with the ideas of some of his Colleagues. This clearly showed that this country was now governed by men who were not in harmony, who could not act in unison one with the other—men who could not agree amongst themselves; that they were governed by men whose councils were, through disunion and difference of views, vacillating and distracted—men who at one time took one view, at another time another. He believed some of them, and, amongst others, the noble Lord, were anxious to carry on the war with the vigour becoming a great country like this, whilst there were others of his Colleagues who were anxious to bring the war to a conclusion, no matter upon what terms or upon what conditions. He believed but one feeling and opinion pervaded the whole nation on this subject, namely, that if there had been a man of firmness, capacity, and resolution at the head of the Government, who would not have been afraid to meet the designs and aggressions of the Czar, who would have used the language of resolve and determination to the Czar, he would never have made an aggression upon Turkey, which, being made, it was necessary to resist, and this country was, consequently, forced into this war. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, he believed, if they had had any other Minister than Lord Aberdeen, this war would not have occurred; but the fluctuating and pusillanimous conduct of the Premier—unworthy as it was of a great country like this—rendered war inevitable. In speaking thus he did not mean to use the slightest disrespect personally to Lord Aberdeen, and only spoke of his conduct as a public man. He believed Lord Aberdeen was most sincerely anxious to prevent the war, but he believed also that the means he took for prevention rendered war necessary. The noble Lord, in his opinion, had not the sagacity to see war in the distance, nor the spirit, nor the courage, nor the determination to meet it when it came, but temporised when he ought to have acted. He (Lord D. Stuart) thought that opinion was supported by facts. We saw great and magnificent armaments sent forth from this country, but we did not find that they had produced any results. We had been at war four months with those great armaments, in conjunction with our great ally, the French, but the results had really been nothing, and they led to the belief that it was the wish of the Government to saddle the country with the maximum of expense, together with the minimum of effect, in order that they might be disgusted with the war and might not on any future occasion be disposed to enter on such hostilities. What success had our armies obtained—what victories could we boast of? Some tar had been destroyed in the Baltic—some of our officers and sailors had vindicated their character for gallantry by some daring exploits, very honourable to them, but certainly not of any very great consequence towards putting an end to the war. In the Black Sea it was much the same. Odessa had been half bombarded; we had certainly taken possession of the forts at the mouths of the Danube; that was an operation no doubt satisfactory, but it ought to have been accomplished long ago. The House had had, to be sure, accounts of important captures. Magniloquent statements were made some time ago by the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty about twelve transports taken from the enemy laden with provisions for the enemy and munitions of war; but those twelve transports turned out, when the despatches were laid upon the table, to be miserable coasters picked up here and there at different times by our cruisers. The aggregate number of their crews was fifty-two men, that is to say, about four men each; and the munitions of war proved to be oatmeal. The consequences of the inactivity with which the Government were prosecuting the war had been, that the greatest disgust had been excited among our troops. We had never entered on the war heartily or with an effective plan. We never marched our troops to points where they might assist Omar Pasha. The only achievements of the war had been made by Turkish troops, who had proved that they were in earnest. Those troops had proved their courage, and their commander his ability; and the haughty, arrogant Russians, who boasted they would drive the Turks like chaff before them, and that their march to Constantinople would be nothing but a military promenade—those Russians, who were bold and ferocious enough when they had overwhelming forces, as at Sinope, against a few helpless Turks, or when a British man-of-war was lying disabled on their coast, incapable of making any resistance—those Russians had been ignominiously defeated by the troops of that very “sick man” on whom the Czar looked as moribund. If any one had undertaken to prophesy that the Russians, in 1854, instead of proudly trampling the Turks under foot, would have been reduced to their present humiliating condition, he would have been treated as a dreamer, and unfit to be at large. He perceived that the head of the Government had been talking lately of our carrying the war to a conclusion, with the concurrence of France, and of the “other Powers.” He (Lord D. Stuart) did not see that we had got, or even were likely to have, the concurrence of the “other Powers.” As for Prussia, she was not in open hostility to us—that was all we could say; and as to Austria, what assistance had she rendered? She was to enter the Principalities if the Russians had left them, and if they had not left them she was to drive them out by force. Had she fulfilled that engagement? Had she made any attempt to drive them out? No such thing. Where, then, was the concurrence of the “other Powers?” Everything was done nowadays to conciliate Austria, and, indeed, it appeared to him that we were almost guided by her counsels. That had been exposed by a noble Lord, now one of the Colleagues of Lord Aberdeen, who made use, in reference to it, of those withering expressions about the councils of this country being guided by “antiquated imbecility.” To conciliate Austria, the Turks had been advised not to form a Polish legion, and after Turkey had abandoned that intention it turned out that Austria would have had no objection to it at all. He (Lord D. Stuart) believed that the real way to obtain the concurrence of Austria would be to obtain successes over Russia. Austria was as much interested as any other country in the curbing of the power of Russia, but so long as that Power remained unscathed by the armies of England and France she would be unwilling to declare against her. Let Sebastopol be taken, and then soon enough we should have Austria on our side. The hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) was opposed to the war, and last night he had called certain Gentlemen, who did not agree with him in opinion, his “hon. and deluded” Friends. That hon. Member must pardon him (Lord D. Stuart) if he called him in return his hon. and Philo-Russian Friend. One of that hon. Member’s reasons for being against the war was, that it would not be favourable to nationalities. But was not the Emperor of Russia the most determined, the most powerful, and the most unceasing enemy of nationalities? Was he not engaged in oppressing nationalities in all parts of the world? Had he not put down the nationality of Poland, and that of the country to which Kossuth belonged; and would it not, therefore, be of the greatest advantage to nationalities to curb and humble their arch-enemy? It was a very strange thing that the hon. and Philo-Russian Member for the West Riding, who took so great an interest in the Greek populations, and was so constantly decrying their oppression by the Turks, should have no sympathy whatever for the population of the Principalities, who were entirely Christian and of the Greek persuasion. Turkey had always respected the institutions of those provinces, whereas Russia was now inflicting on them miseries greater than those suffered by any other people. The hon. and Philo-Russian Member, however, had undergone a great change during the last few years. He said, no great while since, that there was as little chance of our taking any portion of the Czar's territory as of the possessions of the United States of America. But only a few years ago he stated at a public meeting that it would be the easiest thing in the world to crumple up Russia like a bit of paper. How could these two statements be reconciled? The hon. Member said we had crumpled her up, but he (Lord D. Stuart) could not see it. We had not taken any of her men-of-war—we had not taken any of her fortresses—nor had we even inflicted any injury on her trade, for he had been told that Russian tallow and Russian hemp were to be had in this metropolis at a very small advance on the former prices. Surely that was not what the hon. and Philo-Russian Member meant when he spoke of "crumpling up." There was now a general distrust of the honesty of the Government in carrying on the war, and a fear that, if Parliament separated, the country might be hurried into some ignominious, unstable, and unsafe peace. This House was also distrusted, and suspected of complicity with the Government, in not pushing on the war with vigour. It was on that account that he had been induced to bring forward the Motion which he now begged to make. It was a perfectly constitutional Motion. There were precedents for it without number, either in reference to a dissolution or a prorogation, which amounted to the same thing; but he would only allude to the taking of the same course as he now took, by Mr. Dunning, in 1780; by Mr. Erskine, in 1783, when the Motion was successful; and to the more modern example of it, in 1802, by Charles, afterwards Lord Grey, whose words he (Lord D. Stuart) had made use of.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to return Her Majesty the thanks of this House for Her Most Gracious Message, and to assure Her Majesty, that Her Majesty deeming it expedient to provide for any additional expense which may arise in consequence of the war in which Her Majesty is now engaged against the Emperor of Russia, may fully rely on the cheerful zeal and constant affection of Her faithful Commons, and to assure Her Majesty that they most readily do make provision according to Her Majesty's wishes, and humbly to pray, that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased not to prorogue Her Parliament until She shall have been enabled to afford to this House more full information with respect both to Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers, and to Her views and prospects in the contest which Her Majesty is engaged in;"—instead thereof.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Mr. Speaker; the noble Lord, in concluding his address, has referred to precedents which he considered justified the course he has taken. I, Sir, have nothing whatever to complain of with respect to the course which he has taken; and many more precedents may, I believe, be readily found than those to which the noble Lord has referred. The noble Lord may, doubtless, find some precedents, not only at a time when the country was engaged in war, and when the parties in opposition had no confidence in the Government, or in the manner in which the war was conducted, and who disapproved of their conduct in having entered into the war; but similar Motions have been made upon almost every possible diversity of occasion, but always with this peculiarity attaching to them, that they were brought forward distinctly by parties who were the opponents of the Government, as a direct censure upon the Government, and intended to be a declaration on the part of the House of Commons of a want of confidence in the Government. The noble Lord having now thrown down the gauntlet on the floor of the House, and challenged a vote of confidence or no confidence, Her Majesty's Government are perfectly willing to take it up. The noble Lord has offered battle fairly, and we accept it upon his own terms, and are willing to be bound by the decision to which the House shall arrive as representing fairly the opinions of the country. But before I proceed further, I am anxious to address one or two observations in continuation, I may say, of the debate which took place last night, and particularly in reference to one or two observations which fell from the hon. Member below the gangway, the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard). I am the more anxious to do so, because I think in a question of confidence in the Government with respect to the proper application of the funds voted for the purpose of the war, I am bound to show that the allegations made to the contrary are not founded in fact, and that the accusations brought against those who are administering the affairs of our army in the East are destitute of foundation. The hon. Member quoted from letters which he had received from some friends of his in the East, and I am not in the least degree desirous of throwing any discredit upon the writers of those letters which the hon. Member has received from friends whose acquaintance he formed during his long residence in the East; and his statements amounted to this—that the Duke of Wellington, during the long period of the Peninsular war, complained greatly of the defective organisation of the Commissariat, and that, with great exertions, he had brought it to a state of perfection at the close of the war; but that, immediately after the cessation of the war, the whole of his administrative labours in this respect were lost to the country, through the defective administration of those intrusted with the responsibility of the management of that branch of the service. Well, I am at a loss to know where the hon. Member obtained the materials for that statement. That system connected with the Commissariat which the Duke of Wellington consolidated, and brought, as the hon. Member says, to a state of perfection at the end of the war, remains at the present moment unchanged. It is true that in England the Commissariat system has been altogether done away with. [Mr. LAYARD: Hear, hear!] But he could inform the hon. Member that it has been extended to all our Colonies—a field much more calculated to create experienced officers than at home, where such facilities exist for obtaining everything required for the purposes of an army. Throughout the whole of the Colonies this system, so extended, was maintained in the same manner as that in which the Duke of Wellington had left it, and we have found it preserved in the same identical position—all the changes which Her Majesty's Government have made being that of substituting for the head of the Commissariat a responsible Minister of the Crown—one whom, it was thought, ought to be at the head of a department so essential to the well-being of the Army. The officer whom the Government have selected as the chief person to carry out the operations in the East, is Commissary General Filder, an officer formed under the eye of the Duke of Wellington, and one whom the Duke, with his great knowledge of character and sagacity, had singled out as one in whom he could repose implicit confidence. Many gossiping stories have been circulated with respect to the bad management of the Commissariat; but when I shall have shown how utterly devoid of truth are those statements, I trust that justice will be done to those whose difficult task it has been to carry out the arrangements necessary for the army in the East. So far, therefore, from changing the system of the Duke of Wellington, that system, as regards the Commissariat, has been continued; the Government have selected to have charge of the arrangements connected with this department, the one man in whom the Duke placed implicit confidence; and I have reason to hope that time, which, after all, furnishes the best answer to the stories thus circulated, will do justice to the acts of the Government in this respect. But the hon. Member declares, that the Treasury last autumn sent out a gentleman of that department, who wrote an essay upon the manners and customs of Turkey. I will not weary the House by any extracts from that essay; because an essay on such a subject is well calculated to awaken some alarm at the idea of making quotations from it. From the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Layard) the House would be led to suppose that this essay related to almost everything beside subjects which had connection with the duties of the Commissariat. I will just read a few of the marginal notes of the subject-matter of the paragraphs to which they refer. Here are "locality," "cattle and sheep," "meat—how obtainable;" "supplies of coffee," "preserves," "weights and prices;" "sheep—where to be found;" "what kind of cattle to be found in Asia Minor;" "what are the best means of transport;" "roads," "what weight can be put upon a camel, a horse, or an ass;" and so it goes on with all manner of minute details on the subjects useful to Commissariat officers. The hon. Member complained, too, that the book was written by a gentleman who had been but a short time in Turkey. "Only think," said the hon. Member, "of a person writing a book on Turkey, a country in which the longer you live the less you know about it." But it appears, after all, that this pamphlet was actually submitted to the hon. Member for Aylesbury before publishing; and it had the benefit of many of the remarks and convictions which his own long residence in that country was able to afford. I must beg the indulgence of the House for thus occupying their attention; but when attacks of this kind are made, it is essentially necessary that some person should stand up for the defence of those who have been intrusted with those important duties, and should endeavour to ascertain what degree of weight can be attached to the statements of those who say that the British Army has been sent to a distant part of the world without adequate means of subsistence. The hon. Member complained, too, that everything devolved upon one man—our Consul, Mr. Calvert—when the troops arrived at Gallipoli; whereas the fact was, that eight or nine gentlemen had been selected for their knowledge of the Turkish and of the lingua Franca, who were put into communication with Mr. Calvert, a gentleman possessing a thorough knowledge of the locality, and who was the most fit person to be procured to render such services as were required. The hon. Member also made another statement. He said, that an officer had written home stating that they had not the means of sending sick men from the camp to Gallipoli, and had been forced to borrow the means of conveyance from the French. Now I happen to have looked over the list of articles sent out for the hospital establishment, and almost the first thing upon which my eye glanced was forty pair of panniers for the conveyance of the sick. His complaint on this subject, therefore, was not better founded than that which he made with respect to the want of medicines and the large amount of ophthalmia under which the men were suffering from the want of proper medicines. The fact is, hon. Gentlemen got letters, written by officers not upon the spot, but who report the gossip and rumours which they hear; and these reports are instantly set down as having at least some truth in them, because written by persons on the spot. I have heard it stated by no mean authority, and this is an instance in which these things get reported about—by a gentleman who had been connected with the Ordnance—I mean the hon. and learned Member for Portarlington (Col. Dunne)—that we had sent out he did not know how many men, with batteries of only six-pounders, a very inferior calibre to those of the enemy. Now, all this was stated in the most confident manner. Will the House believe, notwithstanding, that, with the exception of the horse artillery, there is not such a thing as a six-pounder in the British service? All the rest of the guns are nine-pounders, with a twenty-four pound howitzer to each battery. This affords another instance of the care with which statements carelessly made should be received by the House and the country. But if it be true that the medical and other departments of the Commissariat are so exceedingly defective, there is one most extraordinary result, and that is, the health of the army, which appears to give a most decided contradiction to any such statement. The last return of the state of health of the whole English army in the East, showed that there were in hospital but four per cent sick; and out of that four per cent nearly one-third were cases of disease which were certainly contracted through no neglect of the Commissariat, or the unhealthiness of the climate, but which might be contracted as easily in the streets of London as in the East. At this moment the health of the army at Varna is as good as the health of the army in any part of England. I do not mean to say that even the greatest care with respect to these things can always ensure health. There are situations in which an army may be placed, in which no amount of care or precaution can ensure health; but if there be neglect with respect to medical assistance, and upon the part of the Commissariat with respect to food—I do not care where placed—you are certain to have sickness. The state of the health of the army, so far as the returns show, prove, however, that the Commissariat and medical departments have not neglected the important duties which have been intrusted to them. The hon. Member and others had also made many comparisons on the organisation of the English army as compared with the superior arrangements of the French service. There is no doubt that in the case of two great armies, both of them kept as efficiently as they can be, those charged with their administration will have much to learn one from the other. I am not contending that the equipment of the English army was faultless in every respect. Why, good God! when a large army has been sent out almost at a moment's notice, a man must be fond indeed of his own performances, and be thoroughly imbued with the notion of his own infallibility, who should for one moment maintain that no error had been committed. I am not such a pedant as to contend that everything which has been done has been perfection. What said Sir William Napier? He said that errors in war are the rules and accuracy the exception. But this I will say, that every effort has been used to avoid these errors, and taking into account the very speedy manner in which the forces have been sent away, the expedition to the East will bear a very fair comparison even with those expeditions which have been sent out in a much longer period. As affecting the condition of the troops in the East, I will, with the permission of the House, read extracts from one or two letters which I have lately received. The first is from a letter written to me by one of the very best paymasters in the service. It states—

"I am happy to say, that a most excellent feeling exists. Our army is well fed, and there is not the shadow of a complaint. The supplies sent out by the Government have been a great boon, and are highly appreciated. They are all good of their kind; and as Lord Raglan has most judiciously put the issue under regimental arrangements, the most perfect confidence and satisfaction have been the result of the arrangements. Had it been through other channels, the regimental authorities would not have been so interested in the good working of the system, and the men are, moreover, more satisfied to be dealt with regimentally. The complaint can be remedied, if there should be one, without going further; indeed, all works well."

[Sir J. PAKINGTON: When is that letter dated?] The letter was dated the 29th of June, 1854; and the letter ends by saying, "we have now in and about Varna 20,000 men." Let me read, however, from another letter written, like the other, by a person holding an official position in the army, and possessed of means of knowing the actual facts of the case. The letter states—

"No one can believe, who has not seen it, of what value the Chobham encampment has been to the troops, I am quite sure the health of the troops is in a great degree owing to the knowledge, now becoming general, of a good system of encamping. Osman Pasha, a most intelligent man, with whom we communicate on all the quartering of the army in and near Scutari, has frequently told us he could not conceive why we had so little illness, and that no Turks could have remained on the Scutari Hill so long in camp with impunity. We can only answer him that he should see the care and attention of our officers, and the advantage of our white cap covers over the senseless fez which his people persist in wearing on their heads, with no protection for the eyes or back of the head, and he would learn the true cause of the difference between us. General Forey called here yesterday to see the barracks; the 96th happened to be parading in their fatigue frocks, which he much admired. I asked—to wheel them into line, and it ended in General Forey being so pleased that he asked for two or three movements, which the regiment executed admirably. I am always glad they should see what our interior really is, and how little we do for show."

I will only trouble the House with one more extract, and it is from a letter written by one whose character will ensure due weight from the observations which he makes. Lord Raglan writes to me at the end of a letter, in which he speaks of the impression of the French officers with respect to the manner in which our men are equipped, encamped, and paid, and states—

"Seeing the abuse that is lavished upon every branch of the British Army, and that we are told all day long that the arrangements and equipments of the French Army are in every way superior, I was surprised to find that we were viewed in a different light by officers of experience in another service, and that justice which is denied to us by many of our own countrymen is readily conceded to us by foreigners."

I trust the House will excuse me for having gone into these details, which may, perhaps, be considered as not having a very direct bearing on the Motion before the House, but which I considered it my duty to state to the House. Now, I wish to know whether it can be considered true, as asserted by the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) and the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord D. Stuart); that these great armaments have been sent out, and that no result has yet been achieved, and that our country has reaped no laurels from the conduct of these forces. War was declared on the 29th of March. The noble Lord expresses his surprise that in four months Russia has not yet been—to use the expression of the hon. Member for the West Riding, which he has quoted—"crumpled up." He appears to think that in four months a great country, distant and almost inaccessible, should have been brought to an ignominious capitulation. But is it true that nothing has been done? An hon. Gentleman last night said that numerous accidents had taken place, that we had had the monopoly of the accidents, and that our allies had had none. We have, I admit, had some casualties of a grievous nature, both in the North and in the East, where our operations have been carried on. There was no doubt the loss of the Tiger, and the loss of the ship Europa by fire, which carried out a portion of the 6th Dragoons. In mentioning this last loss I may be permitted to say that, however long might be the duration of the war, however brilliant the actions which may take place in the course of it, no one name will live to be more honoured in the British Army than that of the gallant, the unfortunate Colonel Moore, a noble old man, who, having none of the excitement of action, none of the excitement and glory of battle raging round him, in cool blood faced the most terrible death which man can meet, and refused, though solicited by his men, to leave the burning ship while one remained in her alive. It is true, too, that in the Baltic we have had a grievous casualty, and a boat's crew, consisting of a large number of men, was sacrificed in an attempt to cut out some vessels from the enemy's waters. But while we lament these results we should recollect likewise the gallantry and spirit which they display. If it be true—and it is true—that the courage of our seamen amounts almost to fool-hardiness, we must recollect that the great name of the British Navy has been created by a series of exploits directed by courage such as this, and we may rejoice that that spirit which has raised us to the summit of fame as a naval power exists still in our Navy, and that those mighty armaments which have been sent out against our enemy are animated by the same spirit. But have no brilliant results been brought about? Is it nothing after all, in four months to have established a complete, effective, irresistible blockade of the whole of the Russian coast? Hon. Gentlemen who speak with so much impatience appear to forget that the one-half of Nelson's life was spent in establishing blockades. From the impatience manifested by many hon. Members for some great and glorious victory which should conclude everything, one would believe that the battles of Toulouse and the Pyrenees had been fought within the lines of Torres Vedras, and that the victory of Waterloo was achieved in the beginning of the present century, under the administration of Pitt. If you require to have victory after victory followed up with an enemy who dare not meet you, even with his superior numbers, you are exacting impossibilities from your seamen, and from seamen—be it remembered—to whose want of courage it is not owing that these glorious enterprises are not obtained. But have we done nothing else? How many pounds sterling have been expended in the last half-century in erecting those forts along the coast of Circassia which formed the chains which were to keep the Circassians bound to them? In one short campaign all but one of these strong places have fallen into our hands, or into those of our allies—the Turks. [Mr. LAYARD: They were abandoned by the Russians.] The hon. Member is not satisfied with the enemy running away. He appears to justify the opinion formed by the Duke of Wellington that the people of England liked “a long butcher's bill.” The hon. Member wants, not a great victory, but a great sacrifice of human life. I do not believe, however, that that is the general opinion of the people of England. I believe they rejoice that this chain of forts should have fallen into our hands without such loss of life as should ornament the pages of a Gazette. The hon. Member said that Turkey has shown great courage. Who can doubt the great fortitude and skill of the Turks. It has astonished all Europe to see an army so small as that of the Turks prove itself victorious against such overwhelming numbers as the Russians have brought against them. But had the successful results of the campaign in the Principalities been achieved solely and entirely by the force of the Turks? Had the army of Russia met with no enemy except the Turks? The Power which had wrested from Russia the ability of communicating supplies to its army by the Black Sea had surely had no small share in that glorious result. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen have studied the history of this campaign, and observed carefully the manner in which those operations were carried on. In the former wars Russia had many other resources; they had to themselves the whole of the seaboard of the Black Sea. At present the Danube is blockaded, Sebastopol is blockaded; the whole coast of Russia is closely blockaded. Not one grain of wheat, not one pound of meat, not one cartridge, can be brought to them, except by the long journey through Bessarabia by land. I am told by an officer who has witnessed it, that when the supplies are passing—when the flour is passing through the country to the Russian army, the air is tainted with its putridity owing to its having been kept so long, and adulterated probably by the contractors and others furnishing the supplies. But how is this forage and provisions conveyed? It has to be conveyed through a country almost impassable for want of roads, in small carts drawn by one bullock. The distance to be journeyed is so great, and so bad are the roads, and so tedious is the operation, that by the time the bullocks with the carts have arrived at their destination, a very large proportion of them have consumed all the provisions with which they had started for the camp; and are besides reduced to so wretched a condition, that when slaughtered they afford themselves but a little poor and unwholesome meat for the troops. These are not small results. They may not be so brilliant or so rapid as they might have been in the estimation of hon. Gentlemen who think so lightly of the power of the enemy with whom we are engaged; but I must likewise remind the House that we English may claim to have some share of the credit attached to the defence of Silistria through that young man whom I would like to call Major Butler, although, unfortunately, he did not live to hear of his promotion, or of his having been placed, by the desire of her Majesty, in the Guards. That young Irishman, who displayed during the siege of Silistria qualities which marked him out for certain eminence in his profession had he been spared—not merely dogged courage, but likewise a remarkable power to command—he, a stranger, accompanied by another young officer, going to a strange town, not even speaking the Turkish language, by his energy and determination so imposed upon those by whom he was surrounded, that, in point of fact, he had almost the command of the garrison in his hands; and it was by the pertinacity and vigour with which he forced his counsel upon them, that the giving up of those forts, which were the keys of Silistria, was prevented, and that ultimately glorious success was achieved. Well, Sir, the noble Lord who thinks so lightly of all that our army has hitherto done, asserts that the non-success of our arms is owing to the pusillanimity of Lord Aberdeen. Last night we were told that this debate was to be prolonged, because Lord Aberdeen in another place had used language in diametrical opposition to that used by my noble Friend the President of the Council; and an hon. Gentleman who had the good fortune to hear both speeches, got up on the other side of the House to bear witness to what he was pleased to term this singular contradiction. Sir, I confess I was greatly surprised when I read in the newspapers of this morning an account of what took place last night in the House of Parliament; and when I found Lord Aberdeen proposing an Address to Her Majesty in a short speech, consisting of a few plain and strong sentences, in which he urged, that, being engaged in a war, it was necessary for us to carry it on with vigour and determination, and asked their Lordships to assure Her Majesty of their intention to support her in so doing. Well, Sir, did my noble Friend the President of the Council speak in any other tone? Did he talk of conducting the war in anything but a vigorous manner? Did he falter in that respect? Sir, there was the most complete accordance between the two speeches. It is true that my noble Friend the President of the Council went further into matters than Lord Aberdeen; but so did the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in another place; and both of them, together with Lord Aberdeen, representing the opinions and policy of the Cabinet, gave utterance to them in language which, I think, could not be mistaken. Sir, it has even been objected to that the speech of my noble Friend the President of the Council was too frank. I believe, Sir, that with a generous people a frank policy seldom fails. I am satisfied that the people of England do not believe the idle stories which are so industriously circulated. I am sure they do not believe that, because the Government were reluctant to commence the war, and because they valued and were unwilling to abandon the blessings of peace, they are, therefore, unwilling to carry on with vigour, and to an honourable end, the war into which they have entered with so much reluctance. Why did the Government enter into it reluctantly? Was it because it was a war which might end with a pitched battle after a few days. No: it was because they well knew the power of the enemy whom they had to encounter; because they well knew the difficulties and dangers of enterprises carried on at a great distance from home; because they know likewise that when once the sword is drawn how difficult it is to sheathe it; and because they knew, and that right well, that when a European quarrel was commenced—commenced upon grounds which are just, and upon grounds which are necessary for the future peace and civilisation of Europe—they could not patch up a hollow truce; as has been well said, they could not conclude that war without obtaining guarantees and conditions which should give some prospect to Europe of peace in future years, and which should give some prospect likewise to the more immediate neighbours of Russia, be they Turks or be they Germans; that the ambition of that power would be curbed, and that the Emperor of Russia would not be allowed to ride at will over the peace and happiness of the nations who have the misfortune to be his neighbours. But, Sir, the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, who finds such fault with all that has been done—who thinks that everything was wrong from the first day in February when we met, till the 29th of March when war was declared—who thinks that everything has been wrong from the 29th of March up to the present time—who thinks that the negotiations in which we were engaged were nothing but connivance and collusion—and who thinks that the war is conducted in some pusillanimous way—he at least has not said, as some have, that the war is conducted in a traitorous way. He at any rate has not hazarded the insolent absurdity, that English gentlemen are writing to their admirals and generals, telling them to spare their enemy, and not to do him any harm; that the whole transaction is a great blind in the face of Europe; and that from the beginning to the end, not only in negotiation, but in war, we have been acting the infamous game of connivance with our enemy. The noble Lord says, that during the whole Session of Parliament the evils of which he complains had been carried on, and yet he wants the Session continued. He says there is complicity on the part of the House of Commons; that the House stands with the country almost in the same condition as this traitorous Administration; that the House of Commons is conniving with the enemy; and yet it is the body which he asks—after speaking of its Members in terms of respect which must predispose them in favour of his Motion—to sit perpetually and until—no, there is no

“until,” the noble Lord has placed no limit to the sitting of Parliament—but I suppose he means it to sit, at all events, until he himself is satisfied, and until the affairs of Europe are administered exactly according to his own notions of what is just and what is right. The noble Lord has said that he has no confidence in the Government. Well, Sir, as I before said, we are ready to meet him fairly upon that issue. We are called a Ministry upon sufferance. It is true that, feeling the deep responsibility which lies upon us, and the necessity, having entered into this war, of putting the country into a position, both financially and strategically, in which she might wage war with Russia with good hopes of success, we have felt, even unsupported as we have been in domestic measures, that it was our duty to continue to hold the reins of Government. We have met during that period with contumely and insult; but it is for the House of Commons to decide. If the House does not choose to have a Government upon sufferance, and if we do not choose to be a Government upon sufferance, let the House of Commons manfully and explicitly declare the opinion which it entertains upon that head. We are prepared to meet the noble Lord upon that question; and we are prepared to abide, as we do abide, with confidence by the decision to which this House may come.

Mr. LAYARD said, he could not but express his surprise that the right hon. Gentleman had so entirely misrepresented what fell from him last night. It appeared to be a common habit of certain right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury bench, whenever any facts were mentioned in that House—not, it might be, with any desire to cast blame upon the Government, but for the simple purpose of pointing out defects which might be remedied—to get up, and, instead of answering the observations which had been made, in reference to the facts, to bring forward some individual connected with the department in question, to make some very eulogistic remarks as to his abilities and claims, and, in short, to make it appear as if a gross attack had been made upon that individual, and not upon the system, or a portion of the system, which he administered. That was exactly the mode in which he had been treated by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War. He said last night that certain accidents had occurred to our transports and vessels connected with the fleet. He had no intention to blame the Government, but merely to draw attention to certain facts which he thought deserved consideration. Well, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War, in what he evidently meant to be a reply to those remarks, carefully abstained from dwelling upon the circumstances connected with the accidents which had occurred, but spoke as if reflections had been thrown upon the conduct of a very able and very brave man, for whom he had an admiration equal to that of the right hon. Gentleman himself. So, with respect to the other facts he mentioned relative to some deficiencies in the Commissariat. He attributed those deficiencies to the system, not to any misconduct on the part of those who had to administer it; and yet the Secretary at War had immediately inferred that he meant to attack Commissary General Filder. Now, if it were true, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, that the Duke of Wellington had the most implicit confidence in Commissary General Filder, that gentleman must have held a high office during the last war; and if he held a high office some fifty years ago, he was now placed at an advanced age in a position which assuredly required all the energy and activity of a young man. But the right hon. Gentleman had misrepresented everything he said last night with respect to the Commissariat. When he mentioned as a fact, that the system organised by the Duke of Wellington was allowed to fall into disuse at the close of the last war, he was alluding to a work by Sir Francis Head, in which the writer stated that at the end of the war the Commissariat was transferred to the Treasury, and instead of being intrusted to men in this country who knew how to deal with it, was placed in the hands of clerks in the public offices, who could not by any possibility know anything of active operations in the field. With regard to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman in reference to what he had stated as to the difficulties of acquiring information of the state of Turkey, he begged to say that he did not state that the longer a person lived in Turkey the less he was likely to know about its condition, but what he had said was, that in a country like Turkey, unless a person was acquainted with every province and all its resources, he could not form any opinion as to the nature of the country. Again, the right hon. Gentleman had spoken as if he complained last night of Mr. Calvert having been put in communication with the Commissariat officers; but what he really did complain of was, that no Commissariat officers were sent to Mr. Calvert at all, and that Mr. Calvert was consequently compelled to do all the work himself. The Secretary at War had also endeavoured to throw some discredit on letters which he read in the course of his speech last night. Now, these letters were from persons in whom he had the fullest reliance, who were far from wishing to throw any odium upon the administration of the Army, and who, moreover, had even cautioned him not to believe all the stories which were flying about. As to making any comparison between the arrangements of the French Army and those of our own, he was glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman of the terms of praise used by French officers with reference to our troops. When he said last night that there was a deficiency of tents, and of the means of providing for the sick—an observation which he made upon the authority of certain letters that had appeared in the public prints, and that he had no doubt were correct—the right hon. Gentleman had now assured the House that the health of the troops was excellent; but it should be borne in mind that this was the season when very little sickness prevailed, and he was afraid that, if the troops were pushed forward to the unhealthy shores of the Danube, they would suffer more from disease than they had hitherto done. It was a mistake, however, to suppose, as the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden) did last night, on the authority of Mr. Spencer, that the Crimea was unhealthy. Unquestionably, parts of it were so, but the neighbourhood of Sebastopol was not unhealthy, and he believed that an English army would be in far less danger there, so far as disease was concerned, than it would be on the banks of the Danube. He did not say last night, as the Secretary at War had represented, that nothing whatever had been done in this war. What he said was, that he knew well the difficulties which were to be encountered in a war of this nature, and that they could not expect to achieve a great victory in a day; but he stated at the same time that, having fitted out vast fleets and armies, the country assuredly would expect some results before the termination of the year. The right hon. Gentleman had now told the House that great results had already been gained, and had pointed to what he termed the “most effective blockade”.

in the Baltic and Black Seas. Now, that was not the case, and hon. Gentlemen in that House connected with the Russian trade would confirm what he said. There was, to a certain extent, a blockade in the Baltic, but it had not stopped Russian commerce, which continued to be carried on through Prussia to almost as great an extent as before the war. Nor was there an effective blockade either in the Black Sea. He would admit that certain English merchants were suffering; but the Greek merchants in this country were carrying on their trade with the Black Sea exactly in the same way as they did last year, and nearly to the same extent. The right hon. Gentleman had talked about the destruction of the forts on the coast of Circassia, and when he had ventured to remind him that those forts had been abandoned by the Russians, he was met by the taunt that he was one of those persons who would not be satisfied without a butcher's bill, and he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman should have taken such an opportunity of getting a little cheer at his expense. The abandonment of these forts was the act of the Russian Government, and he had stated at the beginning of the Session that those forts ought to be taken, and if his advice had been attended to the garrisons of those forts would have been made prisoners of war. The right hon. Gentleman then repeated the old story—"we have kept the Russian fleets in their ports, and they dare not come out." Of course not. It was no reflection upon the courage of the Russian seamen to say that they were unwilling to fight a superior force; and it was absurd to call them cowards because they remained in their harbours. He begged the House to remember that the time was drawing near when our fleet would be compelled to leave the Black Sea. Whenever that event took place, unless something was forthwith done, either to destroy the Russian fleet at Sebastopol, or to prevent it doing any harm, the Russians would take possession of the Black Sea, and might, if they chose, bombard Trebizond, the British fleet not daring to come out of the Bosphorus. That was precisely what they did last year at Sinope. The right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to lead the House to infer that he (Mr. Layard) did not fully appreciate the services of Captain Butler; but, highly as he did admire those services, he did not see how the Government could claim any credit for them.

Mr. Layard

Captain Butler went to Silistria through love of his profession, without any hope of reward, and, as he had been informed, after the Government had refused to send him there; and on what ground could they now claim credit for his conduct? With regard to the other officer, Captain Namyth, he was one of a class who were, he understood, to be shortly expelled from the British camp; he was a correspondent of the Times, and had in that capacity gone to Silistria. He did not consider himself to have been fairly treated by the right hon. Gentleman, for he had not wished in the remarks he made on a previous occasion to cast any blame upon the Government. He must apologise to the House for dwelling upon what was not in reality the subject of the debate that evening, but he felt bound to make a few observations on what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Layard) had come down to that House on the previous evening with the intention of taking part in the discussion, and the noble Lord the President of the Council made a speech which all must have listened to with attention. When the noble Lord concluded he had felt that there was so much in that speech which he approved, and so much that would be approved by the country at large, that he could not, consistently with the strong feelings he entertained upon the subject, make any remarks which might have the effect of interfering with the impression which that speech must have made. The noble Lord said—

"There is another mode in which the position of Russia is menacing to the independence and integrity of Turkey; the establishment of a great fortress, prepared with all the combinations of art, and science, made as impregnable as it is possible for art and science to make it, and containing within its port a very large fleet of line-of-battle ships, ready at any moment to come down with a favourable wind to the Bosphorus, that, I consider is a position so menacing to Turkey, that no treaty of peace could be considered safe which left the Emperor of Russia in that same menacing position with respect to Turkey."

Now, taking the most limited reasons given by the Government for the war—namely, that we were fighting for the independence and integrity of Turkey, it would seem that they could not be secured until this menacing fortress of Sebastopol, and the fleet contained in its port, were destroyed; and he defied any man to attach any other meaning to the words of the noble Lord. But when the noble Lord explained that he meant no such thing, and all that he said was, that Russia must not be allowed to maintain a position so menacing to Turkey—so that the maintenance of a smaller fleet at Sebastopol might be taken as satisfying the noble Lord's views—all the impression which had been created on his (Mr. Layard's) mind by the noble Lord's words was completely destroyed. Without wishing to cast blame on the noble Lord, he must say that, since the noble Lord thought it necessary to make this explanation, it would have been infinitely more satisfactory to the country if the declaration had not been made in the first instance, because the very fact of explaining away the declaration led one to believe that the Minister had said too much, and that the independence and integrity of Turkey need not be secured by any peace that might be concluded. He (Mr. Layard) went at some length into the question last night, and after he had made his speech he was somewhat doubtful whether he was right in dwelling so long on it; but when he had heard the noble Lord's explanation he felt himself perfectly justified, because his object was to show that the noble Lord might express certain opinions in that House, and it was difficult altogether to believe that those opinions were the opinions of the Government. He had read the speech delivered by Lord Aberdeen in another place last night. It contained nothing, and, therefore, he was forced to go back to the explanatory speech made by the noble Earl some time ago in the House of Lords. Last night the noble Lord the President of the Council spoke a great deal about Austria. Among other things, he said—

"Whether Austria may act with that hesitation and delay which have been unfortunately already prolonged too much, or should attempt to gain from St. Petersburg some better and more satisfactory assurances, I am unable to say. We have, of course, no control over the councils of the Emperor of Austria."

He could have told the noble Lord that months ago. At the present moment Austria had a perfect right to say, "We are ready to do what we promised to do, namely, to get the Russians out of the Principalities—we have promised nothing more—on the contrary, we have always given you to understand that the status quo ante bellum is all we will fight for." More than that, Her Majesty's Government had agreed to those terms, and whenever the Principalities were evacuated, Austria would have a right to call upon England to conclude a peace. Here he might be allowed to call their attention to a very curious and suspicious passage in a treaty recently formed between Austria and Prussia. It was to the following effect:—"Austria and Prussia are united to oppose any hostile attacks upon their kingdoms from any quarter whatever." Observe, it was not "from Russia," but "from any quarter whatever," and, therefore, if hereafter England became the enemy of Prussia, Austria will be bound to take part against her. None of the protocols signed at Vienna by the representatives of the Four Powers, any more than the independent declarations issued by Austria, went further than this—that the Principalities should be evacuated. At the time when Austria was commencing the concentration of her troops, Count Buol distinctly declared that that step was not to be considered as of a hostile nature to either of the belligerents, but was dictated by a desire to preserve intact in all respects the status quo as established by treaties—an object in which the representatives of the Four Powers, in that unhappy Congress at Vienna which again threatened to impede the free action of this country, expressed their entire concurrence. That protocol was signed before the breaking out of war; but in the next protocol, after the commencement of hostilities, it was stated that, in consequence of the change of circumstances, it had been considered necessary again to declare the union of the Four Powers on the principles contained in the protocols of the 5th of December and the 13th of January. They had, therefore, after the declaration of war, a solemn declaration, signed by the representatives of the Four Powers, that the status quo ante bellum was all that they were contending for. He begged the House, at the same time, to remember that he was not seeking to cast doubts on the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, though it certainly was very curious that, after the war broke out, Her Majesty's representative should have signed that last protocol. But his object was to show that we had no right to complain of Austria if Austria deserted us, as she inevitably would, and he would point out why she would desert us. The only article in the convention between Austria and the Porte which affected Austria, was, that Austria should exhaust the means of negotiation, and then take other means to ensure the evacuation of the Principalities. It was true the first article in the treaty between England and France went a step further, and bound those Powers to do all that depended on them to bring about peace upon a solid and durable basis, and to guarantee Europe against future complications; but he must repeat he was not arguing the question as regarded England and France, but as regarded Austria. He pointed out last night why Austria should be a neutral Power. He showed that she would never go with Russia, and that she would never go against Russia, and he pointed out that inasmuch as the incorporation of the Principalities with Russia would be against her interest, she would go as far as to obtain the evacuation of those Principalities, though she would never take any step to engage in hostilities either with Russia or with this country. The interests of Austria in Turkey were identical with those of Russia. Austria had for years been endeavouring to obtain paramount influence in Servia, in Bosnia, and in the Slavonian provinces of Turkey, and to prevent Russian influence counteracting her own. A very remarkable document—a protest from the Servian Government against the occupation of Servia by Austrian troops—had just been laid upon the table. He would quote from it a sentence most applicable to the present state of things, but it was so important that he would recommend hon. Members to read the whole memorandum, completely showing, as it did, the policy of Austria in the Turkish provinces. In this paper occurred the following paragraph—

“Any auxiliary troops whatever would be preferable to those of Austria. The Servian nation has so decided a mistrust, if not a hatred, of Austria, that the entrance of the Austrians into Servia would be immediately considered by every one as so imminent a danger, so great a misfortune, that all the proceedings of the Servians would be directed against the Austrian troops, all the energy of the nation would be employed in resisting those enemies in whom is always supposed to be personified that cupidity which urges Austria to seek to exercise in Servia, no matter under what patronage, an egotistic influence. In the same degree as the co-operation of the Austrians might be useful to the cause of the Sublime Porte, if it was given at a suitable time and place, would it beget difficulties and complications, if, despite of all that has been said, it were displayed at Servia.”

This document he was led to believe was a secret document, communicated by the Servian Government to the Turkish Minister, which the Servian Government never intended should see the light. It appeared, however, that a correspondent of the Morning Chronicle managed to get hold of it, as a correspondent of the same

paper some years ago contrived to obtain a copy of the Treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, long before the Government had received it. In consequence of this document being made public, it was laid upon the table of the House, and it so completely exposed the views of Austria, that it was with the greatest alarm Austria found such a paper was known to the rest of Europe. The occupation of the Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia by Austrian troops would be as distasteful to the Wallachians and Moldavians, as the idea of the occupation of Servia by Austrian troops seemed to be to the Servians; yet we had counselled the Porte, for without our advice it would not have been done, to consent to a treaty with Austria for the occupation of those Principalities. Whether, if Austria were once there, she would ever leave again, was another question. But whether she did or did not, she would never go beyond that; and the very moment the Principalities were evacuated, all our difficulties would begin over again. He must assert that the true policy, which would be followed by every statesman acquainted with the real position of Austria, would be to leave Austria a great neutral Power. In that position she would be of great use; but as to forcing her into an alliance, the attempt was as hopeless as it was vain. She would go to a certain point; beyond that point she would not go; and if you attempted to force her further she might turn on you. And that was the danger incurred, and that was the false policy which had been pursued, in seeking to compel Austria to act against her manifold interests, which were apparent to any one who had studied the subject. It was with very great pain that he found his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart) making the Motion he had submitted that evening. It placed him (Mr. Layard) in a very awkward position. He was only a young man. He was, he hoped, a Member of the Liberal party. He had carefully avoided speaking in that House on subjects in which he did not take a deep interest. He had troubled the House on this subject because he had studied it for many years, identifying himself with it; and last year he received the kind indulgence of the House, of which no Member stood more in need. He had never been a man of speech—to a certain extent more a man of action—and he apprehended that he might have used expressions not entirely in conformity with the rules of the House. If so, upon that score he had again to trespass on their indulgence. But he could not refrain from taking a part on this subject. He was convinced that there were great objects at stake in this war. He believed this country was deeply interested in its results, and he wished there was some statesman, as of yore, who, rightly understanding the principles involved in this war, would not be satisfied to secure some five-and-twenty years' feverish peace, but would look forward to futurity and to the means of enabling this country still to bear her part as defender of the independence of Europe. This country never had such an opportunity as the present. He believed she was never furnished with a better ally, for the interest and policy of the Emperor Napoleon were identical with our own, and the House of Commons had been unanimous in forwarding the views of the Government. Nothing had been done by Gentlemen on the opposite side to impede Her Majesty's Government. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, if Her Majesty's Government had been impeded, it had been by himself and those near him. He did not wish to impede Her Majesty's Government, but he did wish to exert all the influence he could command to induce Her Majesty's Government to take an enlarged view of this important subject. The choice appeared to him to lie between England remaining a first-rate Power, the defender of the liberties and civilisation of Europe, and England becoming a third-rate Power, the mere brokers and commission agents of the world. He called upon the Government to take advantage of public feeling, and to act irrespective of Austria, for Austria had other and despotic views which were hateful to this country. In spite of Austria, let the Government carry the war to a proper and just conclusion. Everything he had heard in the last few hours tended to shake the confidence of the country in the Government. He did not mean to say that the country generally was mad enough to suppose the operations were carried on as a ruse, and that all these great preparations were a sham. He believed British troops would conduct themselves as British troops always had conducted themselves, if their energies were directed by hands equal to what the country expected. It was with the deepest regret that he heard of speeches delivered in another place with respect to the object and purpose of this war, and he rejoiced in the declaration of the noble Lord in his first speech last night. He anticipated that those words would ring through the country, and excite still more enthusiasm. With what pain, then, had he heard, and would the country hear, that the noble Lord had been compelled by some reason, not his own, to get up and unsay what he had said. ["Oh, oh!" and cheers.] The country would see that the noble Lord had been unsaying what he had said. He had shown the difference between the statement and the explanation of the noble Lord, and he defied any one to say a difference did not exist. If the noble Lord would get up and repeat solemnly the words of his first speech, then he would believe that the last statement did not differ from the first. He believed some undue influence had been used to induce the noble Lord to retract what in the warmth of his own feelings he had stated to the House. To say that he had no confidence in the Government would be false. He had confidence in the noble Lord and some of his colleagues, but he was not afraid to confess he had no confidence in Lord Aberdeen. He might be wrong, and the country might be wrong, in attributing motives and opinions to Lord Aberdeen which he did not possess; but whether from inability to express himself, or to carry on the affairs of the country, it was certain doubts prevailed throughout the country as to the real intention of carrying on the war. He trusted they were mistaken. He could not believe that all these preparations had been undertaken for nothing. He thought there might be some scheme, he could not say what; but one thing he could say, and that was, the country was distrustful of Lord Aberdeen. Whatever course he (Mr. Layard) took, he took as an independent man. He might have intruded himself too much upon the House, and for which he once more asked their indulgence; but, in conclusion, he felt the greatest difficulty in dealing with the Motion before them. It was said the Government would take it as a vote of want of confidence, and, if carried, resign. It was most painful to him to join in that vote. Yet he felt no shame in confessing that, under the circumstances, considering the discrepancy between the statements of the various Members of Her Majesty's Government, he thought the country would not be satisfied if their representatives left the conduct of the war and all these critical negotiations—because they were told negotiations were still going on—if they left these weighty affairs, in which the honour and credit, and perhaps the existence, of the country were concerned, in the hands of a man in whom the country had no confidence for a long period, when the House did not meet, and there would be no means of bringing the action of Parliament to bear upon them. If, therefore, the noble Lord pressed his Motion to a division, he felt he must either vote with him, or abstain from voting altogether.

MR. WILKINSON said, he wished to state what was his impression as to what had fallen from the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) yesterday. It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) put a perverted construction upon some words which had been used by the noble Lord, and hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House adopted that construction; whereupon the noble Lord rose for the purpose of explanation, and it appeared to him that the noble Lord repeated exactly what he had previously stated.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that looking to the remarkable apathy of the House towards the Motion, he should not have risen but for an observation made by the right hon. Secretary at War, that some person connected with the Ordnance had said that there were only six-pounders out with the British army in Turkey. It was impossible that any such statement could have been made. But what was said was, that there was no battering-train with the army, and that when it was proposed to take Sebastopol, it was stated that the army was not prepared to carry on the siege operations. The right hon. Gentleman had complained of misrepresentations having been made against the commanders of our army in the East, and with regard to the army itself. He (Colonel Dunne) had seen no misrepresentation with respect to the army or its commanders. He believed everybody relied upon the skill and ability of those commanders, and was convinced that the army was as well ordered, equipped, and as well organised as any army in Europe. Much as he respected the French army, he was surprised that any one should consider it to be better in any respect than the British army. He believed that no man in that House or connected with the press had ever found fault with the commanders of the army, or with the army itself. But what had always been said was, and what he feared was the truth, that they had sent out that army so unprepared with everything that, now, towards the end of the campaign, they were placed in a situation in which they were so destitute of means of conveyance that they could not move. That he believed to be perfectly true; and, although the Secretary at War had given an answer to reports in newspapers, yet he had not given any answer to the allegation, that the army was not supplied with a proper commissariat nor with a proper field train. The reason why the army could not advance was, that they were not supplied with mules and horses to carry the baggage, and other necessities required by an army on its march; and the Government must know well from the reports of the officers in command, that the army would not be able to move until those means were supplied. The country between Devna and Varna, which was about ninety miles from Silistria, was so destitute of the ordinary means of supplying water, that it would take ten hours to draw water for the horses of a cavalry regiment, unless they were provided with cattle to bring the water to them. If there existed such a difficulty in getting up a few squadrons of cavalry, how could they expect to be able to move a whole army towards the Danube without more ample means of supply than our army in Turkey at present possessed? It was obvious, therefore, that, with the means and appliances that were now available, the army could not advance. Then, with respect to Sebastopol—as long as they were sure that Austria would preserve them on the Danube, they might direct their army to the Crimea; but if they were not perfectly secure on the line of the Danube, which he apprehended they were not, the army could not with safety move towards Sebastopol. There were only three months remaining in which the campaign could be carried on, and he must say that, for the safety of the army, he looked forward with great anxiety to the operations that would take place in the next three months. He saw the whole of the difficulties in which they were plunged, all of which had arisen from no preparations having been made at the proper time. The Government at first seemed to think that there would be no war, and, therefore, they appointed no Commissariat until after several divisions of troops had been sent out, and portions of our fleets were at Constantinople. The information which the right hon. Gentleman had read was nothing more than a common report of what an outpost officer ought to have sent in, and which ought to have been known perfectly well by the authorities before the army left this country. When our Ministers and Consuls at the different Courts were reporting that large masses of Russian troops were being concentrated on the frontiers, why were not Commissaries sent out then? The only answer given to that question was, that there was at that time no prospect of a war. But war was always a contingency that might arise, and a prudent Government would ever keep that contingency in view. But, no; the Government did not look forward to events, and were consequently unprepared when those events occurred. Supposing this country had expended a large sum of money in sending out a Commissariat, Russia would then have believed that the Government were serious in their intentions; but, seeing the course which was actually pursued, Russia did not believe that you had any serious intentions of going to war, and that if you did you would not carry it on with earnestness. The consequence was, that when the troops were sent out, they were totally unprovided with the means of carrying on the war, for they had not even the means of supplying themselves with food, and an army without food and without an efficient field-train must be paralysed. He had seen an officer who had been well accustomed to the duties of supplying everything that was requisite for an army, and he said that our army in Turkey was a magnificent army to be in garrison, but that it was unprovided with anything to enable it to carry on a war; and he added that the Commander in Chief left England on the 29th of April, and that the troops had been stationed in one place nearly two months, but they could not advance, although they were almost within cannon shot of the half-starved enemy. It was not, therefore, the fault of the commanders, every one of whom was fit for the duties he had to perform, that the army had not advanced, but it was that everything which was necessary for an army had not been supplied in time. He believed that now the period for attacking Sebastopol had passed by. With regard to Circassia, he considered that a wrong course had been taken in that direction. They had destroyed every fort but the one which they ought to have destroyed, or, at least, have taken, which was Anapa. It was the only one, by means of which they could communicate with the Circassians. If nothing more were done at present than the taking of that fort, the people of this country would be satisfied.

It would be considered as a great point gained, as it would be throwing back the Russians. With regard to our fleet in the Black Sea, he considered that it had done everything that could be done there. From the moment it entered that sea, the power of the Russian fleet was paralysed. In three months' time that fleet must withdraw, and it would then be seen what system Russia would adopt with her at present shut-up fleet. With regard to the Motion before the House, he must say he could not give a negative to it, for it was expressive only of the general opinion of the country. He had seen the proposition put forth in every newspaper, for the war had, in fact, been carried on more by the people than by the Government of the country.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, he should not have troubled the House with many words had it not been that the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard) had thought proper, in endeavouring to show his antipathy towards the head of the Government, to lay about him right and left upon every party belonging to it. He was glad to see the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord D. Stuart) return to his place. Both the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman had attacked the Navy, not sparing that department to which he (Admiral Berkeley) had the honour to belong. He would not indulge in insinuations, nor would he state facts which he could not vouch for. He would not follow the course of the hon. Member for Aylesbury, who stated things as facts, and when they were contradicted said, "Well, I heard so." The hon. Gentleman had complained of the Admiralty having conferred a decoration on the gallant officer who had served at Odessa. He begged leave to tell the hon. Gentleman that the decoration was not conferred upon that gallant officer for his conduct before Odessa, but that the late First Lord of the Admiralty had made up his mind to confer that honour upon him for the services he had performed at Lagos, and surely there could be no objection to Odessa being added to Lagos as a ground for that distinction. The hon. Member for Aylesbury had also stated that various sums of money had been paid for demurrage owing to the delays of the Admiralty; he stated that between 20,000*l.* and 30,000*l.* had been paid in consequence of those delays. He begged again to tell the hon. Gentleman that no demurrage whatsoever had been paid. It was true that transports which had taken the troops to Constantinople had been detained there in order to convey those troops to Varna; and he would ask the hon. Gentleman, whether he would have sent those transports about their business, or would have retained them till the army no longer required their services? The hon. Gentleman was also very unfortunate in his remarks respecting the Himalaya. That vessel, having performed its duty to the Government, returned to Malta, when it so happened that the party who had chartered her wished her to go to Alexandria on packet service, she not being wanted by the Government at that time to return with troops to Constantinople. She went to Alexandria, and then returned to perform those duties for which she had been engaged. The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone said, last night, that although the army as a demonstration was very good it was not fit for action, and that the same observation applied to the Navy. Now, he ventured to tell the noble Lord, in the face of the House and the country, that we never had finer fleets, or Admirals more firmly resolved to carry on the war in the manner which the country expected it to be conducted.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman he had mistaken his observations; he had never said that the British fleet was not fit for action. What he said was, that it had not the vessels necessary to conduct operations in shallow water.

ADMIRAL BERKELEY: Since the noble Lord disclaimed the language, he would not further advert to it. The noble Lord, however, proceeded to say that—

“There was a great deficiency of vessels of shallow draught of water and of mortars. He was assured that Cronstadt was accessible on the south side to vessels of very considerable size, and, that if twenty vessels with mortars were sent there, the place might be successfully bombarded, and the Russian fleets and arsenals might have been laid in ruins before this, had the gallant officer in command of the fleet been supplied with requisite means by the Government, and not received orders to hold his hands.”

The noble Lord likewise said—

“He believed it would be possible to procure steamers of 200 tons, drawing only three feet of water, which would carry one or two heavy guns.”

Now, he was certain, that the country would be extremely obliged to the noble Lord if he would teach the Surveyor of the Navy how to build steamboats, drawing only three feet of water, which would be able to carry two very heavy guns besides engine-boilers, coals, and stores. Then, as to the statement that Cronstadt might be successfully bombarded by twenty vessels, he would beg to read to the House an extract from a letter written by the gallant Admiral in command of the Baltic fleet. He had served with the gallant Admiral; he knew his determination, and he was sure that he would leave nothing undone on his part to enable him to get at the enemy. Before the noble Lord again talked of knocking down Cronstadt, let him ponder on the passage he (Admiral Berkeley) was about to read. Admiral Napier said—

“It has not been in my power to do anything with this powerful fleet; for attacking either Cronstadt or Sweaborg would have been certain destruction.”

This was not all; Admiral Chads—than whom no man possessed a greater amount of scientific knowledge—wrote also in these terms—

“After two days’ inspection from the lighthouse, and full views of the forts and ships, the former are too substantial for the fire of ships to make any impression. They are large masses of granite. With respect to an attack on the ships where they are, it is not to be entertained.”

It was said that the Government was not in earnest in the prosecution of the war, and that Sir Charles Napier had not been supplied with everything he wanted. Upon this point he must trouble the House with another extract from a report written by Admiral Seymour, who was Captain of the Fleet, and whose duty it was to see that the fleet was provided with everything necessary for the operations of war and the comfort of the seamen. Admiral Seymour wrote—

The passages which he had read proved how unfounded the statements were which had been made on the subject, and yet those statements, unless they received a positive contradiction, such as that he had been able to give, made an impression on the country. The Secretary at War had completely rebutted the erroneous statements put forth respecting the Army, and he trusted that he had done the same service for the Navy. Only one observation further he felt it necessary to make respecting the noble Lord’s insinuation, that Sir Charles Napier had received instructions from the Government “to hold his hands.” In the strongest language which man can use (continued the hon. and gallant Admiral) I declare—and as it is part of my duty to draw up orders for the Admirals, I can speak with authority on this point—that there never was a British officer who had more completely a carte blanche to undertake what he pleased. So far from his hands being tied up by the Government, they have afforded him every encouragement to proceed.

Mr. F. SCULLY said, he thought that if it had not been for the speech of the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart), the House would not have heard such unexpected and unwelcome intelligence as that which had been delivered with respect to its being useless to attempt to take Cronstadt or Sebastopol. If hon. Members had taken into consideration the difficulties which the Government had to contend against as regarded foreign Powers, they would not have blamed them so severely for the course which they had taken; but after looking at the questions involved, his opinion was, that if this country had compelled all those great Powers to commence active operations, very great responsibilities would have rested upon their shoulders. For his part, he considered that, taking into account all the difficulties with which the Government had to contend in their relations with foreign Powers, they had acted throughout with great prudence and propriety, and that Lord Aberdeen especially, though avowedly a man of peace, had acted, now that war had unfortunately broken out, with all necessary promptitude and vigour. Above all, he would remind the House that Lord Aberdeen only formed one of a Cabinet; and he could not understand the system which seemed lately to have come into fashion, of making one individual responsible, and not the whole body of the Government. If the hon. Member for Aylesbury or the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone had any direct charge to make, let them move an impeachment, or at least bring forward some distinct Motion of censure. But he protested against these sideward attacks, which raised the question of want of confidence indirectly. For his part, he would vote against the Motion of the noble Lord if for no other reason than this, that he protested against sitting there till Christmas. The effect of carrying such a Motion as the noble Lord's (Lord D. Stuart's) would have a most injurious and damaging effect, and he should therefore oppose it. He wished to call the attention of the House to the words of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) last night. The noble Lord then contended that the powers of Russia should be diminished to a considerable extent in the force which she had in the Black Sea. To that statement, he believed, the noble Lord still adhered. The noble Lord alluded to the manner in which this was to be attained. He could not see anything in the words of the noble Lord which, fairly interpreted, went to the taking of the Crimea and the destruction of Sebastopol, though he (Mr. F. Scully) thought that the very best course of operations which could be adopted. This Motion had not, he thought, been fairly put before the House, and he regretted that the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone should have brought forward a Motion which would be taken advantage of by the opponents of the Government. If the Motion were carried, it would be by strategy, and the Motion was by no means a fair mode of testing the question. He had heard the noble Duke the Secretary of State for the War Department praised for his conduct of the war, nor was the Government blamed for the conduct of operations. Then what was the charge—what was the statement of neglect or misconduct? What were they called upon to find fault with? This was a most important question. They were asked to resist the prerogative of the Crown, and no ground whatever had been laid for it. They ought to have strong grounds indeed for sanctioning such a course. The whole attack to-night had dwindled into mere matters of detail. Why not, he repeated, bring the conduct of the war, if they really found fault with it, fairly and intelligibly before Parliament? He was conscientiously opposed to the Motion.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he could not support this Motion if it was intended to signify a want of confidence in the Government; but if it was intended as a vote of want of confidence in Lord Aberdeen, he would vote for it with all his heart and soul. He believed that a general feeling of distrust with reference to that noble Earl existed in this metropolis; at any rate, in that part of it which he represented, except, in some of the dark passages about Downing Street. Lord Aberdeen had never taken such opportunities as fell in his way to remove that impression, if it were a wrong one. Last night he had such an opportunity; he might have spoken in the gallant and plucky way in which the noble Lord the leader of the House had spoken; but he had taken no pains to do so. He could not deny that there were men of talent, of ability, and of world-wide reputation in the present Cabinet; but still it was impossible to deny that though singly they were men of great reputation, yet collectively they were not successful, and were unable to command a majority in that House. The position of the Ministers reminded him of an answer made by a lessee holding under a dean and chapter. The lessee was about to renew his lease, and thinking that the dean and chapter were inclined to take some little advantage of him upon some points, he demanded a written agreement. They said to him, "Surely you will be satisfied with our promise." "No," said he; "taken singly you are very good honest men, and individually I would take any of your words; but, collectively, I have no faith in you." They were like a dozen different sorts of wine, very good and excellent if drank singly, but when all mixed together neither agreeable to the palate nor good for the stomach. As an Administration they had neither suited the taste nor the constitution of the people. The war, he admitted, was popular with John Bull. John Bull thought the gallant little Turk had been bullied by the great Emperor of all the Russias, and therefore he backed the Turk; but John Bull was a man of business, and he looked for some return for the money he had himself spent in the cause. He had spent his money willingly, because he expected some return for it. The tax-gatherer was coming round again: and when John Bull found his burdens doubled, he would naturally ask what he had got for his money; he would ask if no battles were to be fought except by the Turks, if Omar Pasha was to be left unsupported, and how it was ce cher Aberdeen, the sincere friend of forty years' standing of the Emperor of all the Russias, remained at the head of the Government? Another question would also force itself upon the attention of the taxpayer. It was this—how a noble Lord, who ought at this moment to be carrying on the administration of the War Department, was left to waste his energies upon Chadwickian vagaries and the removal of nuisances at the Home Office? The Queen, he knew, had the right to call whomsoever She pleased to Her counsels; but the Members of that House had also the right of comment upon the advice given to Her in the selection of Her Ministers. Exercising this privilege, he would state that a report was current which, if not true, could be contradicted; but which, if true, would afford a clue in unravelling the intrigues that had brought about the late changes in the Administration. When war was declared, it became apparent that some alteration must take place in the management of the War Department; and Lord Grey made in the other House a forcible speech on the subject, in which he introduced various recommendations. Nothing, however, was done; but at last public attention was roused to the subject, and the noble Lord the Lord President, on the 8th of June, announced the appointment of the new War Minister. The arrangement, however, greatly disappointed the people, for Lord Palmerston was left at the Home Office, whilst the Duke of Newcastle was appointed the new Minister of War. It was the general opinion that when the question was brought before the Cabinet, two or three Members of it pressed upon Lord Aberdeen the fitness of Lord Palmerston for the office; that Lord Aberdeen said that so long as he held the office of Prime Minister, Lord Palmerston should never be Minister of War; and that he insisted upon the Duke of Newcastle taking the department, though his Grace was ready to resign in favour of the noble Lord. If this report were true, the Duke of Newcastle should not be blamed for having accepted the appointment. With regard to the question immediately before the House, he considered that, though Parliament ought to leave the Government all the responsibilities of the war, the Government were bound to consult the wishes of Parliament upon the subject of an adjournment. There should be an adjournment for two months, or some given period, instead of a prorogation; because the advantage of an adjournment was, that Parliament would re-assemble at the appointed time whether the Government liked it or not. And he observed that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) had declared that the Motion for an adjournment could not be considered as an interference with the Queen's prerogative. He desired, however, to press upon Her Majesty's Ministers, and particularly upon the Liberal party in the Administration, that the course they were pursuing was by degrees ruining the Liberal interest. Whenever the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr.

Disraeli) had taunted them with the non-performance of the promises they had made, they had replied by asking him why he did not bring forward a Motion of want of confidence. The right hon. Gentleman showed great discretion, generalship, and tact in not accepting the challenge. The real truth being that the places of the Government were not yet quite ready for himself and his party, and that they were not ready for the places. The right hon. Gentleman thought, and possibly correctly, that if the Government held out a little longer, the course they were pursuing constantly leaving them in minorities, the Liberal party would be so thoroughly smashed, that of necessity he must come in. Such an event he (Sir J. Shelley) believed would be opposed to the feelings of the country. His object was to keep the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends out of the Government; but for this end, and in order to secure popularity, the best course to be taken by Her Majesty's Ministers was to cause the noble Earl at the head of the Government to disabuse the public mind of the impressions abroad respecting his views, and then the country would feel assured that the war would be vigorously carried on until a just, honourable, and permanent peace had been obtained.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, the great bulk of the Conservative party, with which he was connected, had acted throughout this question upon one principle. They felt that the interests involved were too great, and the stake for which the country was playing far too precious, to permit them to select it as a battle field for the contests of party. He gave great credit to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of War for the warmth and sincerity of his feelings, but he had, however, placed him in a somewhat difficult and embarrassing situation by placing the question upon the ground of a general vote of confidence in the Administration. Now who, looking at the course they had taken this Session, could have confidence either in their strength, in their numerical majorities, or in their power of commanding support? They were in minorities every other night. Who, too, could feel any confidence in their consistency when they embraced every possible variety and shade of opinion? Who could feel confidence in their firmness of purpose, even as regarded the war, when different Members of the Cabinet held language which it was impossible to reconcile. If, therefore, the question was placed upon the single issue of want of confidence, he should be sorry to imply by his vote that he intended to express confidence in Her Majesty's Ministers; and he was therefore forced into this embarrassing situation—that he was either obliged to vote for a Motion which he did not approve, or express a confidence which he did not feel. With regard to the speech of the noble Lord the Lord President last night, perhaps he, as an humble auditor, might be permitted to give his version of what had created a considerable degree of doubt. He certainly thought, when the noble Lord spoke of the menacing attitude of Russia in the Crimea, and that her strength consisted in the fortifications of Sebastopol and in the power of her fleet, it was intended to remove that menace by destroying both the fleet and the fortifications. But, on reflection, he thought the noble Lord had left himself a mousehole to creep out of. The noble Lord had been led into making these observations by his desire to court popularity—one of the cardinal points of his political career, for he had always shown a disposition to use language calculated to catch the public mind out of doors, and to chime in with current opinion; but which, at the same time, went beyond his own real convictions. He (Sir J. Walsh) should, however, ask what had been the conduct of Ministers in the present war, and whether they were entitled to the credit which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) had claimed for them. He admitted that they had had great difficulties to contend with. He admitted that it was particularly difficult for Her Majesty's Ministers, who, in a great degree, had given in to the cry of peace and retrenchment, all of a sudden to alter their tone, and to call upon the country to make sacrifices for the purpose of carrying on the war. At the same time he must admit that they had made very considerable exertions, and had accomplished the fitting out of a very considerable armament; but they had been very far indeed from accomplishing that amount of military preparation which was necessary to our entering, as we ought to enter, upon this great contest. What was the state at this moment of our army in the East? It was true that Her Majesty's Ministers had sent out to the East a very considerable army in a very short space of time. That army amounted to between 30,000 and 40,000 men: and the world had probably never seen, in proportion to its numbers, a finer body of infantry than that which was now assembled under the British flag at Varna. But to do this they had stripped the country of almost every soldier which it possessed; the depôts at home were deserted, and, what was more, the army which the Government had so sent out was not properly sustained by cavalry. He had called attention very early in the Session to the fact that, at a time when they were called upon to strengthen as much as possible the military force of the country, the number of cavalry proposed to be provided by the Government, instead of being increased, was actually diminished. The diminution, it was true, was not considerable; it amounted to a few hundred sabres only; but still there was a diminution, and the fact was of considerable importance, because an adequate supply of cavalry was essential to the operations of an army, and was more particularly essential to the success of those operations in the countries in which we were about to enter upon the campaign. Those countries were particularly favourable to cavalry operations, and as Russia had an ample cavalry force, an army which was deficient in cavalry would enter into contest with her under the greatest possible disadvantages. Now, so far from having begun to recruit their cavalry, and to supply what was an undoubted deficiency, the Government—because it was an expensive force, and because they did not like to ask for the amount of money which would be necessary for the purpose—had sent out regiment after regiment to the East, which were upon the peace establishment, which were in fact not real regiments, but mere squadrons or skeletons of regiments—kept in that state during peace, but always intended to be increased in case necessity should call for it, yet now made available in time of war without being placed upon a war footing. While, therefore, they were stripping this country of every regiment of cavalry, they were still not sending out to the army in the East the cavalry force which they ought to send, in order to support the exertions of their infantry. He would next come to the artillery, the supply of which was also inadequate. The artillery of England was, without doubt, the best in the world. General Foy, after the Peninsular war, paid the highest compliments to our artillery, and it was a fact that there was no similar force in which the horses and appointments were better, or the artillery-

men more skilful. But the number of guns which had been sent out to Turkey was too small, not only in proportion to the number of infantry employed, but in proportion also to the relative number of guns and men in a Russian corps d'armée. Every Russian corps d'armée of 40,000 men had 120 pieces of artillery; but how many pieces of artillery had the 40,000 men who were at Varna, or on their way thither? Then, again, with respect to the Commissariat. Whether it was owing to the circumstances of the country, or to the inefficiency of the parties employed, he would not pretend to say, but the fact was, that they had not an efficient Commissariat. They were under the same difficulty with respect to transport, for they had not succeeded in obtaining a sufficient number of beasts of burden to enable the army to move, and it was therefore placed in a very mortifying position, while they had held themselves up to the eyes of Europe in a not very creditable light, inasmuch as, while the Turks had achieved the triumphs to which reference had been made, it appeared as if the English army had gone back—as if it were not willing to give assistance to its allies, whereas the fact was, that it was not able to assist them, owing to the different arrangements which the Government had made. All this depended on considerations of money, and they had come now for a Vote of 3,000,000*l.*, because they were afraid to let the people of England know the entire extent of the struggle in which they were engaged, and were, in fact, deluding them, by telling them that this 3,000,000*l.* would suffice to accomplish all the objects of the next six months. He would now say a few words upon the Motion of the noble Lord opposite (Lord D. Stuart). That noble Lord was the advocate of a set of opinions to which he (Sir J. Walsh) was entirely opposed, and he could not separate the noble Lord and his opinions from the Motion now before the House. He rather suspected propositions emanating from that quarter; and he must say, that the noble Lord had not at all disguised the object with which he had brought forward his Motion, because he had stated that he wished to raise a struggle in behalf of “oppressed nationalities.” Now, what the noble Lord meant by that was, that he would plunge Europe again into all the troubles and storms of the year 1848. Now he would tell the noble Lord what would be the consequences of such a line of policy. In the first place Austria—whose material interests were engaged in checking the progress of Russian ambition, although her conduct had to some extent been vacillating and uncertain—would be decidedly against us, if the noble Lord should succeed in raising this question of “oppressed nationalities.” It was equally certain that Prussia would also be against us, and we should at the same time lose the support of that ally upon whom, more than upon any other, all our hopes of success in this great struggle turned. If England were to adopt the views of M. Kossuth and of M. Mazzini—[“Question, question!”]—he maintained that he was speaking to the question—did the hon. Member who cried “Question” mean to say that the observations he was making did not bear directly on the question before the House? If England, then, were to adopt the views of M. Kossuth and M. Mazzini, she would certainly lose the support of the Emperor of the French, who had risen to the great position which he held, not only in France, but in Europe, by controlling and by crushing that revolutionary spirit which the noble Lord on the present occasion seemed so desirous to revive. One consequence of the success of that agitating policy which the noble Lord would seek to act upon, would be to alienate that great Power, and to turn it into the opposite scale; and this country would be left alone to struggle through this contest as best she might, with the support of M. Kossuth and M. Mazzini. He thought the noble Lord’s Motion was liable to the further objection that, by adopting it, they would be approaching to an interference with the prerogative of the Crown. He did not say that, under very strong and special circumstances, the House might not be called upon to vote such an Address, but to attempt to dictate to the Crown when Parliament should be prorogued, except upon very strong and urgent grounds indeed, appeared to him to be approaching towards a vote that the House of Commons should be permanent. If, therefore, the Motion should be pressed to a division, it would be his duty to vote against it.

Mr. MONCKTON MILNES said, he could not think that the present thinly attended state of the House enabled them seriously to regard the present question as a vote of confidence in the Government. He had not been eager to take a part in the debates upon the war. He had given a good deal of attention to this subject, and knew something about the countries in which the war is going on, but he did not regard that House as a place for crude speculations, or for literary or political dissertations upon the causes of the war. For himself, he had looked upon this war as one of the greatest misfortunes that had ever befallen this country, and he still regarded it in this light. Feeling the enormous hazards of the contest, he could not blame the conduct of those Ministers who did all they could to avert from Europe the misery of war. If he could believe that this war was likely to be of benefit to the oppressed nationalities of Europe, he might not think this benefit dearly purchased at the price we should pay for it; but he could not see daylight through the difficulties of this question, or perceive by what practicable settlement of Europe we could secure the power of Russia from such future preponderance as would enable her to renew, at no distant period, all those efforts which had on the present occasion led to our interference. There was only one power that could be called into action to check the power of Russia—a power which he was not prepared to call into action, and which he was sure the Government would not. He had joined heartily with the House of Commons in supporting the Government with all the sinews of war, which had enabled them to carry out their measures with so much success. He wished he could regard with the same satisfaction the diplomatic proceedings of Her Majesty’s Government. The diplomatic action of this country with the German Powers had proceeded upon erroneous principles, which he feared would end, not only in complicating this question, but in involving this country in dishonour. If we had undertaken this war in a single alliance with our manly and straightforward ally, France, why then there would have been no distrust as to the course into which the country would have been led; but we had entered into a very different course. He did not find fault with the course of diplomacy before the war; then it was right, in the endeavour to maintain an honourable peace, that the moral weight of every Power in Europe should be invoked. But when war was once entered upon, he thought that both prudence and justice ought to have forbidden this country from entering upon a course of diplomatic action with any German Power. He believed that the withdrawal of Austria and Prussia from a common action with England and France in the earlier part of the negotiations upon this question had brought about the war. At that moment the proper policy for this country to pursue, and a policy dictated by prudence, would have been to tell Austria that nothing was asked from her then, and that if she came against us with arms, we were perfectly ready to meet her with arms. Such a step would not have complicated the negotiations, but, on the contrary, the action of Austria would have been further advanced. He had no hesitation whatever in saying that the unfortunate mistake in our diplomatic action of mixing ourselves up in German questions must result in great complications and difficulties to this country, and would enable the German Powers, who had no great good-will towards us, to prevent the war from coming to a speedy termination. He wished hon. Gentlemen would for a moment seriously consider what was the position of Austria in this matter. From the very commencement Austria had acted solely in advancing her own interests, and had been actuated by the most selfish principles; and the advantages which had accrued to the Allied Powers went no further than to enable the noble Lord the President of the Council and the noble Lord at the head of the Government to express a hope that we should have the co-operation and assistance of Austria. He believed that a remark which had fallen from the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard) had been misunderstood by those who followed him. The hon. Gentleman did not consider that the blockade of the Russian ports was entirely inefficient, but he said that no blockade, however nautically complete, would be effectual unless it entirely impeded the trade of Russia. If the commerce of Russia were really suspended, and the export of her productions and commodities prevented, she might be brought to sue for peace; but, unfortunately, no progress had been made in that direction. In fact, some advantage had accrued to Russia in her goods passing by land instead of sea, and so long as perfect freedom was given to Prussian and other German bottoms to carry Russian goods, nothing would have been done in the way of placing a material pressure upon her trade. He (Mr. M. Milnes) much regretted that, when the law as to neutrals was brought before the House on a previous occasion, it had not received from hon. Members that consideration which it deserved, for he feared that the regulations fixed on by the Government, although they were made in the cause of humanity, would turn out to be inhuman in truth. They would, it was to be feared, have the effect of prolonging the war to an indefinite extent. A great deal of personal matter had been introduced into the debate, and he could not say that it had been introduced unjustly or inopportunistly, inasmuch as, when a Cabinet Minister considered the Motion to be one of want of confidence, it was reasonable and proper for Parliament to review the conduct of individual Members of the Government. He did not, however, look upon the question as a vote of want of confidence, but he must be allowed to say that he thought some Members of Her Majesty's Government were affected in public opinion by their antecedent public conduct. It was impossible to deny that the Earl of Aberdeen, in coming forward now as the enemy of Russia and the defender of the Turks, stood in a very different position from that which he occupied when Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. But since the Earl of Aberdeen had undertaken the great task which he had now in hand, he (Mr. M. Milnes) had not seen that he had in any way practically failed in carrying out the real objects of the war, and he should not consider himself justified if he were to presume that the exertions of the noble Lord would be relaxed. He did not believe that the noble Lord the President of the Council, or the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), would feel inclined to retain office longer than they could do so with honour, and he thought they would abandon the Cabinet of the Earl of Aberdeen the moment anything was proposed to be done unworthy of the dignity and honour of the country. For these reasons he was unwilling to vote for the Amendment of his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart). As to the question of adjournment, instead of prorogation, he was bound to say that there might be many advantages in favour of adjournment. It enabled Ministers, in case of necessity, to take the advice of Parliament; it put it in their power to correct false statements, which were certain to get abroad in time of war, and it gave them a means of strengthening their position in the country at large. He believed that if the Ministry had taken Parliament into their confidence in the question of the war at an earlier period than they did, many of the difficulties which they now experienced would never have occurred. This consideration ought to influence their future conduct. There was but one other circumstance to which he would allude, and that was as to the statement of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) with regard to Sebastopol. He (Mr. Milnes) had never understood the noble Lord to say that that place must be taken. He stated this, not that he thought the explanation of the noble Lord required confirmation, but because every hon. Member had thought it right to advert to the matter in that evening's debate, and he could do no less than follow their example.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he had been present when the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Gloucester addressed the House, and, as an independent Member, he could not refrain from protesting against what he considered to be the greatest indiscretion ever committed by a Member of a Government. ["Oh, oh!"] If hon. Gentlemen who cried "Oh!" were in the House at the time the gallant Admiral made his speech and did not concur with him (Mr. Hildyard), he must say he could have no respect whatever for their understanding. The hon. and gallant Admiral, in commenting upon certain imputations which had been made against the efficiency of our fleet, and the manner in which it had been sent forth, read two extracts from private despatches of Sir Charles Napier and Admiral Chads, which stated that if an attack were made either upon the fortresses of Sweaborg or Cronstadt, the destruction of our fleet would be inevitable. Now he wished to ask those hon. Gentlemen who had thought proper to interrupt him if they considered that that was a prudent declaration to make? The House were now assembled to receive the Report of a Committee which had granted a Vote of Credit to her Majesty for the purpose of carrying on the war efficiently and of bringing it to a speedy termination, but how were they to hope for the attainment of that end if such declarations as this were to be made by Members of the Government? What effect would it have to-morrow across the Channel, in France, when the people of that country found it announced by a Lord of the Admiralty that the combined fleet of England and France could not attack Russia on any of those points on which it was desirable to operate? What effect would it have across the Rhine, in Germany, in those countries which had been described by the hon. Member who had just sat down as selfish and desirous only of advancing their own interests? What effect must be produced in the Russian territories by the declaration of the gallant Admiral, which would reach Cronstadt in a week? Every one was hoping that the reverses which Russia had experienced would bring the Czar to his senses, and that the war might speedily be concluded; but nothing could be more calculated to confirm the Russian Emperor in his present course than a declaration that Russia need entertain no apprehension for her fleet at Sweaborg, and that Cronstadt could not be attacked without risking the destruction of the united naval armaments of France and England. It was well known that Sebastopol was a fortress of the first class, and therefore the Russians might be pretty certain that their position at that point was secure. He regarded the indiscretion of the hon. and gallant Admiral as of so grave a nature that he hoped the Government would be enabled in some measure to qualify the statement he had made. There was an old maxim—"Dolus an virtus, quis in hoste requirat?" and he hoped it might turn out that Sir Charles Napier had suggested that the hon. and gallant Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley) should endeavour to throw the Russians off their guard by telling them that they need entertain no apprehension for their fleets. He hoped that the noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Russell), or the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Admiralty (Sir J. Graham), would be able to qualify the statement of the hon. and gallant Admiral, for an hon. Gentleman who sat next him (Mr. Hildyard), when that statement was made, remarked to him, "I think in the whole course of my life I never heard such indiscretion."

ADMIRAL BERKELEY said, he hoped the House would permit him to say a few words in explanation, in reply to the attack which had been made upon him with so much warmth by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. He (Admiral Berkeley) had not referred to any official communication, but to private letters addressed to him by officers of the fleet, and it was for those officers to deal with him if he had read private letters improperly. He had read those letters in order to refute the charge or imputation that Sir Charles Napier's hands were tied by the Government, and he thought the letters proved that the gallant Admiral's hands were not so tied. Those letters showed that, situated as Sir Charles Napier then was, an attack upon either Cronstadt or Sweaborg would risk the destruction of the British and French fleets. Since he (Admiral Berkeley) had received the letters, however, a large French force had been embarked at Calais, and had gone to reinforce the gallant Admiral Sir Charles Napier; and he (Admiral Berkeley) would answer for it, that whatever could be done by two gallant nations in arms would be accomplished in the Baltic, notwithstanding the great indiscretion of Admiral Berkeley in having backed up Sir Charles Napier's opinions, that Cronstadt and Sweaborg were not to be attacked by ships alone.

COLONEL BLAIR said, if he supported the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, he would not feel that he supported a Motion implying want of confidence in the Government. He should feel that he was only giving his support to that which many persons in this country greatly desired—an autumn Session of Parliament. With regard to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Secretary at War, to whose speech he had listened with great admiration, he should have gone into the lobby with the noble Lord with perfect satisfaction to himself that in so doing he was not voting a want of confidence in the Government. If the House met in autumn, and if, in the interval, the Government had carried on the war successfully, they could only expect the congratulations of the representatives of the people. If, on the contrary, the country had sustained reverses in the interval, (which Heaven forbid!) then to whom could the Government look with more propriety for counsel and assistance than to the representatives of the people? He saw the question entirely in that light, and not as a vote of confidence or want of confidence. But after the observation of the right hon. Gentleman he could not give a silent vote; and if the question went to a division he should vote for the Motion of the noble Lord for these reasons.

MR. PETO said, he considered that there was no ground whatever for a vote of want of confidence in Her Majesty's Government with regard to the conduct of the war, for he considered that they had done everything that prudence and foresight could suggest to promote the success of our naval and military operations. In considering a question of this nature, the House should bear in mind the difficulties which the Government had to encounter. He had had much to do with the construction of works in foreign countries upon which large numbers of workmen were employed, and he could, therefore, form an idea of the difficulty the Government must have had in carrying out their plans at so great a distance. He considered that the complaints which had been made, that the Government had done nothing, were most unreasonable and unjust. If Her Majesty's Government had adopted any rash measures which had jeopardised the interests of this country, no one would have been more ready to express want of confidence in them than the very persons who now charged them with inaction. Four months had elapsed since this country engaged in hostilities, and during that period nothing had occurred which could shake the confidence of the people in the Government with regard to the prosecution of the war. He thought, then, that the Government were perfectly correct in treating this Motion as a vote of want of confidence. He conceived that no Ministry, composed of high-minded and honourable individuals, could submit to have their hands tied and the discretion of the Sovereign fettered with regard to the prorogation of Parliament. He must say he thought that a great deal of mischief arose from discussions of this kind. Some hon. Members, it appeared, would not be content until they forced the Government to make disclosures, and then, when Gentlemen were placed in the painful position in which the hon. and gallant Member for Gloucester (Admiral Berkeley) had been placed to-night, and were obliged, in vindication of the Government, to mention certain facts, hon. Gentlemen opposite at once exclaimed, "Oh, here is indiscretion!" He considered that the House should either place entire confidence in the honour of the Government, and enable them to conduct the war to a successful termination, or they should say to Her Majesty's Ministers, "We won't supply you with the means of carrying on the war, unless you tell us everything you are going to do and the way in which you propose to do it." He regretted to hear the continued imputations to which the Government were subjected by certain professed supporters of theirs, who, he was sorry to say, continued to sit on that (the Ministerial) side of the House. He could easily understand opposition and declaration of want of confidence from the other side. He quite understood the attacks which were made upon the Ministry, fairly, openly, and manfully, by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), but when such Motions as that now before the House were brought forward by a noble Lord who was a professed supporter of the Government, he must say that he thought the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart) would act with more candour if, being unwilling to leave the conduct of the war in the hands of Her Majesty's present Ministers, he at once said, "I once was a supporter of the Government, but I am no longer; I am now their determined opponent; I have no confidence in them, and I ask those who entertain the same feelings to support my proposition." The country would understand such a course as that, but he (Mr. Peto) must say that he believed the country had given to Her Majesty's Ministers their most unreserved confidence with regard to the conduct of the war. He was satisfied that the country properly estimated the hesitation with which the Government had entered upon this war, and he was also convinced that the country would continue to repose confidence in the Ministry with regard to the arrangements for the prosecution of the war, until some better reasons than had yet been adduced were shown for the withdrawal of that confidence. From what he knew of the state of feeling in France, he felt certain that there was a cordiality growing up between the two countries which would be worth all the risk of the war, and which, indeed, if it continued, as he believed it was likely to do, would set the result of the war beyond all fear. There would be no cause for regret, he felt assured, if what was now going on led to the establishment of a frank and cordial intercourse and a united action between the two countries.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Mr. Speaker, there are but few things which I find it necessary to say at this stage of the debate, and I shall certainly not accept the invitation of my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard) that I should make over again the speech which I made last night. I certainly do not think it necessary to give any further explanation of the statement which I then made. I have seen this morning reports of what I then stated, and they appear to me to be accurate, and by that statement I am quite willing to abide. The hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Cobden), following another hon. Member who assumed that the object of the war was the dismemberment of Russia, proclaimed last night that our object was the destruction of Sebastopol, the occupation of the Crimea, and, I think, the transference of the Crimea to some other Power. Such was the inference which that hon. Member drew from what I said; but it was a perfectly gratuitous inference, for the statement which I made did not bear that construction. But we have, certainly, every kind of opponent to deal with. There are some who tell us that it is wrong to go to war for the dismemberment of Russia; others there are who tell us that we are not seriously at war, and that we are unwilling to do any injury to Russia. In this state of affairs, I certainly thought it due to the House of Commons, now almost on the eve of prorogation, that I should enter more fully than is usually done into the question of the objects of the war, and into the present state of our foreign relations. I did so as fully as it was possible to do, and I am willing to bear the consequences if I made that statement to the House with too little reserve. I believe that, in carrying on a war in which the feelings of this country are engaged, it is not imprudent to state at large to the country what are the general objects which we have in view, and what are the ultimate ends which we hope to attain. My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury says, indeed, that he wishes that there were some statesmen among us who could take a statesmanlike view of the objects of this war, and who could take that view which statesmen alone can take of the importance of the objects and the magnitude of the contest. If, indeed, we who belong to the Ministry are entirely blind on these points—if, in all the debates which have occurred, we have never expressed properly why it is we went to war, and what should be the objects we should look to in concluding peace, then that hon. Gentleman, who is so much more enlightened than we whose views are so much more enlarged, and who has calculated the interests of all the Powers of Europe, should have told us what those objects ought to be, and in what manner we were to carry on this contest. He has not so enlightened us, I am sorry to say. It appears to me, however, that the general case may be stated in very simple language, and without any very great profundity of view. The Sultan of Turkey has been attacked by the Emperor of Russia. Has he been unjustly attacked? Yes, he has. Have we any interest in defending him? Yes, we have. This, it appears to me, is a very plain and simple case, and one with which the mind of the people of this country is perfectly satisfied, without resorting to any of those profound calculations in which the hon. Member for Aylesbury indulges, or to any of those mysterious views which he entertains in his own breast, but which he so carefully conceals from us, who, no doubt, are his inferiors in personal knowledge, discernment, and farsightedness. Well, then, Sir, with regard to the conduct of this war, in stating generally the reasons for asking the House to agree to this Vote of Supply, I refrained purposely from entering into any observations on those anonymous accusations which have been made either against the Government which has sent out our fleets and armies, or against those who have the command of them. There had been no such accusations made in this House, and I thought it was unbecoming my position to expect that such accusations would be made. I regret, however, that some of those accusations have been repeated here, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary at War has given so ample and so full an explanation on those points that it is not necessary for me to add a word on that part of the subject. Why, Sir, we know, or at least we ought to have known—and if we had not found it out for ourselves, one hon. Member of this House, the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) pointed it out to us—that this war is not at all similar to others in which we have been before engaged. If, for instance, Sir Charles Napier, instead of having to encounter dangerous shoals, granite-built forts, narrow channels, and continual fogs, had had but to sail into distant seas, I have no doubt that before this a whole archipelago of islands would have yielded to his valour; but we have now a sort of rhinoceros to deal with, and to strike an effectual blow upon an animal of so thick a hide is by no means an easy task. And with regard to the Black Sea also, it has been considered as no inconsiderable advantage that those forts which Russia has for many years constructed, and has kept up with so much care with a view of maintaining and extending her power in those quarters, have been yielded by that Government, and yielded, too, without a blow. The Emperor of Russia has, at least, felt this—the inferiority of his force in the Black Sea. But, Sir, without wishing to enter into any further argument on the conduct of the war, there is one topic which has been dwelt upon both last night and to-night, on which I think it absolutely necessary that I should address a few words to the House. Some hon. Members have singled out the noble Lord at the head of the Administration, and have made him the peculiar object of their attacks. Now, Sir, whatever may be the constitutional nature of this Motion—and I do not deny that as a Motion of want of confidence it is a constitutional Motion—yet there is nothing constitutional in the attempt to separate the Cabinet from the noble Lord who is at the head of it, and to make him alone responsible for that in which all his colleagues must share his responsibility. With regard to the general measures of the war, those measures have been considered step by step by those advisers of Her Majesty who are usually called the Cabinet, and for the decisions which have been adopted all the colleagues of Lord Aberdeen are alike responsible to this House and the country with that noble Lord. With regard to the particular departments—with regard to the Minister of War, and with regard to the Lords of the Admiralty, who are the officers chiefly charged with the conduct of measures relating to this war—I am sure that I am perfectly justified in saying that there is no measure which they have proposed in order to give greater vigour to the operations of the war, and in order to ensure the success of that war, which my noble Friend at the head of the Government has not most readily concurred in and zealously encouraged. That my noble Friend for a long while believed in the possibility of peace, and wished to avert war, is a reproach which he can very well afford to bear. But with regard to any delay that has taken place with respect to the commencement of the war, the colleagues of Lord Aberdeen are alike chargeable with that delay. This, too, I may remark, because it has something to do with this Motion, that that which for some time was the great object of attack—namely, that when the Pruth was passed we did not at once advise Her Majesty either to declare war or to take such steps as should show that we are determined to incur the risk of hostilities—I may remark, I say, that that event took place when Parliament was sitting, and when Parliament could, if it had pleased, have interfered to give advice to the Crown, and also that the more vigorous measures of sending the fleet first to the Bosphorus, and afterwards into the Black Sea, were taken during the recess, when Parliament was not sitting. It is not, however, to the particular terms of the Motion that I wish now to address myself. I wish only to state that the Government do consider themselves responsible for the conduct of this war with regard to all its operations, and that they consider themselves responsible for accepting or refusing any terms of peace that may be offered. I have already stated enough, I think, to show that we should look for guarantees and ample securities in any such terms of peace. But, reverting again to that which has been stated in order to make comparisons between different Members of the Government, we were told last night that there was a great difference between the language which I held in this House and that which was held in the other House of Parliament. With regard to what I stated in this House, I can only say that I stated as much as I thought it was necessary to state in order to justify me in asking for a large vote of money from this House whose peculiar function it is to make grants of money, and, if necessary, to impose burdens on the people. The question that had to be asked in the other House of Parliament was, that they should concur in and support such measures as should be deemed indispensable for carrying on the war, and I think it was perfectly judicious on the part of the noble Lord who had to ask for that concurrence merely to make such a statement as was necessary for the purpose which he had in view. I do not, therefore, think that it was either constitutional or judicious to be drawing distinctions between different Members of the Administration, and to be holding up certain Members of the Administration as objects of suspicion or as objects of attack, while others are not to be rendered liable to the same attack or to the same suspicion. If the House is not satisfied with the Administration, let it vote this Address, which would serve the purpose as well as any other. After all, it is not very appropriate to the occasion, because it so happens that such Addresses have only been voted generally in cases where a Minister has thought it his duty to refrain from giving information as to the state of our foreign relations and the general prospects of the war. Everything that could be said has been said on this occasion, and therefore the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart) has done what a great historian says is one of the most common, but also one of the most grievous of errors—the taking of a precedent which is fit for another occasion and applying it to an occasion for which it is not fit. However, Sir, as I have already said, I do not wish to prolong what I have to address to the House, and the House has now to say whether it will confide to us the disposition of these 3,000,000*l.*—whether it will confide to us the discretion of advising Her Majesty to call Parliament together, in case it should be necessary, or to refrain from calling Parliament together if, in our judgment, the public welfare does not require it. If we are fit to be the Ministers of the Crown, we are fit to have that discretion; if we are not fit to have that discretion, on the other hand, we are no longer fit to remain the Ministers of the Crown. My noble Friend the Member for Marylebone has chosen, I know not exactly why, to bring the matter to this issue. By the decision of the House upon that issue we shall cheerfully abide.

LORD DUDLEY STUART, in explanation, said, the first naval Lord (Admiral Berkeley) had with some indignation represented him as stating that the fleets of this country had been sent forth in a condition that was not fit for action. If he (Lord D. Stuart) had said anything of the sort, it was far from his intention to do so. What he meant to say, at all events, was, that he believed the fleets were sent forth in a state of efficiency such as enabled them to meet any fleets in the world, and give an excellent account of them, but that they were not fit for the particular service in which they were employed, and for which vessels of lighter draft of water and mortars for bombarding land fortifications were most required. In conclusion, he begged to state that he was satisfied with the declarations which had been made to the House on the part of the Government, and particularly with the statement of the first naval Lord. He would, therefore, ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Resolution read 2^o, and agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 26, 1854.

RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE (SECOND NIGHT).

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [21st July], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;" and which Amendment was to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "This House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

Mr. T. BARING said, that although he thought it was quite proper, if such measures were necessary, to enact laws to prevent money being advanced to hostile Governments, yet he conceived they ought to be of a general nature. It was not the way in which they ought to legislate on a subject affecting trade, to introduce special measures as the circumstances arose, nor ought they to be influenced by hostility or spite against a particular country in the enactment of such laws. But this was a special measure applicable to Russia alone. If it was desirable to pass such a measure at all, it ought, in his opinion, to be introduced by the law officers of the Crown. The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord D. Stuart) seemed to think that if this country and France enacted such a law as this, Russia would be unable to obtain money at all; but he (Mr. Baring) thought he very much underrated the money power of the rest of the world in coming to that conclusion. As far as he saw, there was no disposition whatever on the part of any Englishman, or, indeed, any individual in this country, to take any interest or part in a Russian loan, subsequent to the declaration of war and for the purpose of carrying on that war. The credit of Russia, however, was not so confined, nor was it possible to crumple up the resources of Russia as easily as some hon. Members supposed. By this measure you proclaimed to the world that but for public opinion there would be a disposition to invest English capital in Russian securities. He was satisfied that the good feeling of Englishmen would induce them to abstain from lending money to Russia without the prohibition of an Act of Parliament. He also thought it was not expedient, from any principle of petty spite, to make a special demonstration against Russia. By passing this Bill they were proclaiming to the world that, but for it, English capitalists would buy Russian securities. He objected to the Bill as unnecessary, as a crude measure, and because any Bill of this character ought to be general, not special.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he would have been glad if the Government had taken up the Bill. But, at all events, it had been supported by one Cabinet Minister, and would be supported by him again, and he believed that it would also be supported by the noble Lord the President of the Council; for he had communicated with that noble Lord, who stated himself to be in favour of it, but that he would consult the law officers with regard to it, and since that the noble Lord had stated that he would support the Bill. Therefore he supposed he should have the support of the Government, notwithstanding that the hon. Secretary to the Treasury had risen after a Cabinet Minister who supported it, and contemptuously opposed it; but he supposed that, being the Bill of a private Member, the hon. Gentleman thought that he was at liberty to take any course he chose with regard to it. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) said it was unhandsome to aim this Bill at Russia alone, she by-the-bye, being the only country with which we were at war. He (Lord D. Stuart) did not know if the hon. Gentleman's sympathies were with Russia, but they appeared to be so when his objection to the Bill was that it was aimed at Russia only, she being the only Power with which we are actually at war. The Bill was not aimed at the holders of Russian securities which now existed. He (Lord D. Stuart) maintained that if the Bill became law it would throw difficulties in the way of Russia in carrying on the war. He had been told that the Emperor of Russia held a large amount of stock, and could dispose of it when he chose; and therefore, that a Bill for preventing new loans would be of no use. But he (Lord D. Stuart) said that if the Bill passed, the value of any new Russian securities anywhere would be depreciated, and that would be an advantage. As to what had been said about its causing the existing Russian securities to fall, that argument was equally applicable against the continuance of the war itself, which of course caused a great depreciation in all trade connected with Russia. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to have an extraordinary tenderness for Russia, a country which was our enemy; and he was told when he brought in a Bill to cripple her resources, that it was unhandsome, and only to gratify spite. He would contend that there was nothing unmanly in doing anything which would prevent Russia from carrying on the war against this country. He should not have objected to have made the Bill a general measure if any Amendment to that effect had been moved. With regard to what had been stated by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Baring) about the assets of bankrupts, a clause had been prepared which would provide for that. It was said by some hon. Members that this Bill was open to objection, on the ground that it might render that simply a misdemeanor which was now high treason. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Youghal (Mr. I. Butt) had, however, prepared a proviso to meet the objection, which would be proposed in Committee.

Mr. J. WILSON said, that having lately expressed his opinion of this Bill he was not now about to discuss its general merits. The noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart) had made some remarks upon the observations he made with regard to this Bill the other night. He did not complain of that, though he apprehended he was at liberty to make what comments on it he thought proper, but with reference to one point he might say, he believed if it were once understood what the financial position of Russia was at this moment and what its operations were, it would have more effect in preventing a Russian loan than any laws which could be passed. At the time this country was engaged in war, from 1800 to 1815, when bank-notes were inconvertible, our currency became depreciated; but when the House of Commons passed a Bill on the subject in 1819, in redeeming the securities, they determined to pay all their debts honestly without depreciation, and at the full value, instead of paying them with the depreciated currency. What did Russia do on a similar occasion? Russia commenced a long war with the issue of a rouble note of the value of thirty-eight pence, which was made inconvertible for a lengthened period of years, but, owing to frequent issues, the rouble note was depreciated step by step, until, instead of being worth thirty-eight pence, it was only worth 10½d. Now, what did Russia do? The whole of these securities were paid by the Russian Government at 10½d. The value of the rouble was restored to thirty-eight pence, but all the old notes which the Russian Government had issued were paid at 10½d. Russia was now doing precisely the same thing again, and was declaring the rouble notes issued at thirty-eight pence to be inconvertible; those notes had already fallen to thirty-two pence, and if the present war continued, it would soon be found that the excessive issues would lead to a depreciation equal to that which took place during the war to which he had referred. The creditors of Russia and the holders of Russian securities would then find that their securities were reduced to one-third of their original value. He thought, if these facts were known, that capitalists would be placed upon their guard against such uncertain investments, and that the object of the noble Member for Marylebone would be secured much more easily and completely than by any legislative measure.

Mr. I. BUTT said, he thought this measure ought to have originated with the Government. As the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) had spoken in favour of the Bill, he should be happy to divide with him. Besides, he had as yet heard nothing substantial urged against the Bill. The one question with him was, would this measure affect the resources of Russia? No hon. Gentleman, he presumed, would say, if Russian securities were made unsaleable in England, that this would not cripple Russia. His opinion was, that as we prohibited the building of steam-boats for Russia, we ought also to prohibit furnishing Russia with the means of carrying on hostilities. The plain meaning of the argument of those hon. Gentlemen who opposed the Bill was, that wherever Englishmen could turn a penny, they must be left at liberty to do so, even at the expense of their country. He should vote for the Bill, on the principle that, if you made Russian securities unmarketable, you affected the power of Russia materially by crippling her resources. There was nothing to prevent Dutchmen from buying Russian securities and selling them to Englishmen; and he wanted to know why that should be high treason on the part of Englishmen which foreigners might do with impunity and profit in English markets. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Baring) said, by this Bill you were proclaiming that Englishmen would take Russian securities if not for the Bill. But he rather said, by the Bill we were proclaiming strongly to Europe that it was a matter of doubt whether Englishmen hated Russian ambition and Russian designs. It was for the House to decide the question, whether it was right for Englishmen to lend money to Russia to make war on us? He would urge his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart) to divide the House on the measure.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he considered that, upon grounds of justice and propriety, the House was bound to assent to this Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, it had been stated by the hon. Secretary to the Treasury that, in 1819, this country honestly paid its debts; but he wished it to be understood that he (Mr. Spooner) did not concur in that opinion. He thought that the law officers of the Crown ought to have been present to explain the provisions of the measure now under consideration. He believed that, by the existing law, English subjects were precluded from making in any way direct advances of money to States with which this country was at war. Now, the present Bill, as he understood, was intended to carry the principle further, and to prevent any dealings on the part of English subjects in securities created by States with which we were at war through the medium of other nations. The object of the Bill seemed, in fact, to be to prevent that from being done indirectly which could not be done directly. He wished to know, however, why the Bill, instead of being confined to Russia, did not apply generally to foreign States? He would vote for going into Committee, but he hoped that in Committee the Bill would be rendered applicable to any States with which this country might be at war.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly give my support to this Bill, because it appears to me to be founded on a general principle, which it is exceedingly important to maintain. That general principle is, that subjects of this realm shall not in time of war be allowed to furnish the enemy with the means of carrying on war against us. No doubt, the common and established law of the land, which has been acknowledged by all, and which my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has communicated to all our foreign Consuls, that it might be made known to all—is, that to furnish the enemy directly with money, in time of war, is the highest of all crimes—is, in fact, high treason. But what a puerile distinction is that which is attempted to be drawn between furnishing money directly and furnishing it indirectly. This Bill does not apply, as many hon. Gentlemen are endeavouring to represent, to the established Dutch stock, which has been matter of bargain and sale, of bequest and inheritance, in times gone by; but it applies merely to stock created for the purpose of making war on this country. The object of the Bill is simply this—that if the Emperor of Russia endeavours to negotiate a loan in Europe, to kill our soldiers and sailors, to destroy our commerce, and to frustrate our national policy, at least Englishmen shall not contribute to the resources of the enemy. The argument of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury goes to this—that you ought to remodel your law of high treason, and permit your merchants and manufacturers to supply the Emperor of Russia with powder and balls, ships of war, and all the implements of destruction. Now, Sir, I consider that it is sheer nonsense to say that we should do so. Such an argument is founded on the principle on which we know the Dutch Admiral proceeded, who, in an interval or lull during a naval action, sold powder to the enemy, in order that the engagement might be renewed in the afternoon. I am as desirous as any man can be of encouraging the commercial enterprise of this country, but, for Heaven's sake, do not let us yield to this peddling system, which places pocket against honour, which turns a balance-sheet against national interests, and which lowers down the best feelings of the country into a mere question of pounds, shillings, and pence. I say that that principle is disgraceful and fatal to a country. If we mean to maintain our national independence, we must have a regard for the generous and great principles on which nations act, and by which alone national independence and honour can be maintained. It is said by some hon. Members that the Bill will be nugatory; but it cannot be nugatory in so far as it establishes a principle. You may say that it may be evaded; but there are men who will evade a law, however high the sanctions may be which the law is calculated to enforce. You cannot guard against the bad and evil passions of men, and the way in which they may be induced by motives of private interest to deal with general principles. All you can do is to lay down the rule, to which honest men will conform, while those who choose to evade it must settle the matter between themselves and their own conscience. I therefore shall strongly recommend the House to adopt this Bill. I think the rejection of it would really be to encourage Russia, and to make a general advertisement to all British subjects that they were at liberty to assist the enemy with their money as much as they pleased. I think it would have a very lowering effect on the national character, not only in this country, but in Europe, if it were found that the British House of Commons, guided by simple greed of private emolument, rejected a Bill which was founded on the principle of your established law, which does not carry that law to the extent to which it exists in reference to other transactions, but which simply affirms a principle that every honourable man will endeavour, in his own dealings, as much as possible to observe. Let it be also remembered that the Bill is simply applicable to debts contracted for the purpose of giving the Russian Government pecuniary means to carry on the war against this country. As I have previously said, I see no difference in principle between allowing British subjects to furnish the Russian Government with money and allowing them to furnish it with money's worth. Money is only useful to them as supplying them with the implements of war, and you may just as well say that you will leave off your blockades, and allow everybody to send everything they please by which they may make a few pounds profit to Russia, for the purpose of carrying on the war, because it is against our commercial principles to interfere with private enterprise. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, I shall certainly give this Bill my very hearty support.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed, that every one must have admired and appreciated the spirit in which the noble Lord had spoken, but that as the noble Lord appeared to attach great national importance to this Bill, he thought the noble Lord should have explained how it was that such a measure had been introduced by an independent Member, and not by

Her Majesty's Government. He (Sir J. Pakington) agreed that the object at which the noble Member for Marylebone aimed was a most desirable one; but, so far as he could collect the opinions of hon. Gentlemen who were most competent to form a judgment on the subject, the question was not so much as to the desirableness of the end sought to be attained as to the practicability of accomplishing it by such a Bill as that now before the House. He would not enter into the question which had been raised by the noble Home Secretary as to whether or not the objections urged against the Bill by the hon. Secretary to the Treasury were—as they had been termed by the noble Lord—"sheer nonsense." He would leave that matter to be decided between the two Members of the Administration who were sitting upon the same bench. He could only say that, looking to the position of the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston), considering the length of time during which he had been officially conversant with subjects of this kind, and having heard the noble Lord's declaration of the importance which he attached to this Bill, his (Sir J. Pakington's) vote would be guided on this occasion by the opinion of that noble Lord. If, therefore, a division took place, he (Sir J. Pakington) would vote for going into Committee upon the Bill. He hoped, however, after what had been said by hon. Gentlemen most competent to form a judgment upon this subject—after the objections raised by the hon. Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Wilson), and after what had fallen from the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring)—that at a future stage of the Bill the law officers of the Crown would give the House their opinion as to whether the clauses were framed in such a manner that they were likely to effect the desirable object which the noble Member for Marylebone sought to attain.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought the Government were not open to blame for not having taken up this question, and he must protest against the growing and prevalent feeling that the Government ought to do everything in that House. He considered that it was the duty of private Members to bring forward any measures which they thought it right to propose, instead of relying altogether upon the Government. He considered that they were much indebted to the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone for bringing in the Bill.

MR. DUNCAN said, if the principle of the Bill were to be carried out, it must do great injury to the mercantile community, who would be prevented from obtaining supplies of hemp, flax, tallow, and other articles. He believed that since the declaration of war not less than 250,000*l.* had been sent from his own district into the coffers of Russia—a fact altogether contrary to the doctrine of the noble Lord. As the Bill would have a tendency to injure the interests of his constituents, he must vote against its going into Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the question the House had to decide, with reference to this Bill, was simply whether it was right and proper that persons should be allowed to engage indirectly in transactions which, if they were conducted directly, were, by the law of the land, treasonable. The Bill provided that persons who were indirectly engaged in these treasonable transactions should only be liable to two or three months' imprisonment, but he thought, if the noble Home Secretary had taken a correct view of this subject, that alterations should be made in Committee which would not allow persons guilty indirectly of high treason to escape with such paltry penalties. He did not think this was an ordinary measure of legislation, and considered that a Bill which dealt with the crime of high treason should be taken up by Her Majesty's Government. In his opinion, also, such a Bill ought not to be limited to one country only, but should be a general measure, applicable to all nations.

MR. W. BROWN said, he feared that the Bill would form a very dangerous precedent, for it had always been considered the sound policy of this country, whether during peace or war, to allow money negotiations to proceed in London without restriction. He conceived that the hon. Secretary to the Treasury had established a very strong case in favour of not taking such action as was suggested by this Bill, and he thought it was desirable that the House should have an opportunity of hearing the sentiments of the President of the Council and other Members of the Cabinet upon the measure before it was further proceeded with.

The House divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 24: Majority 53.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee; Mr. BOUVIER in the Chair.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he had voted for the Bill going into Committee, because the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department had made so strong a speech in its favour. He confessed, however, that he had heard that speech with considerable surprise, because it appeared to him that if resisting this Bill were anything so grievous in its nature or treasonable in character as selling gunpowder to the enemy, the measure ought to have been introduced by the Government. They had done everything at the outset of the war to mitigate its horrors, so that it might interfere as little as possible with the commercial interests of the country, but this Bill proceeded on a totally different principle. He would not say whether the principle were right or not, but he thought, before they proceeded further, they should be informed by the law officers of the Crown as to its probable bearing on our relations with other foreign countries. He thought it desirable, therefore, under these circumstances, that the Chairman should now report progress, and he begged to move to that effect accordingly.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he could not assent to this proposal. The Bill was a very short one, and its principle obvious and easy of comprehension by every one. There would be ample time to have the opinion of the law officers on the third reading.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he must express his hope that the Committee would adopt the proposal made by the noble Lord the Member for Totness. The measure affected international questions of very great magnitude, and they would not be in a position to discuss the clauses in Committee without having the opinion of the law officers of the Crown.

MR. WILKINSON said, no one was more desirous than he was to prevent succour being given to Russia, but if this Bill were agreed to, the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart) could not stop here, but must insert a clause prohibiting dealing in hemp and tallow the produce of Russia.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could not agree with the argument of the hon. Member who had just spoken. Advancing money to the Russian Government was one thing, and paying money for Russian produce, whether belonging to Russians or to subjects of neutral States, was quite a different thing. One went directly to furnish the resources of war; the other might operate indirectly and circuitously for the benefit of the Russians, whilst it also benefited ourselves. If there were any general desire on the part of the House, before going through Committee, to have the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, he would ask his noble Friend to agree to the postponement of the Bill. He should himself vote for going on; and there was this to be considered, that in the present state of business more turned on the question of delay than the mere loss of a few days.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he hoped they should not carry this Bill, merely because it bore on the face of it hostility to Russia. He was very much astonished that the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston), having made so inflammatory a speech in favour of the Bill, had not thought it necessary to bring in a Bill on the subject himself. The noble Lord told them they would be doing something very like high treason in voting against the Bill, and he (Mr. V. Smith) had voted for going into Committee. But he must say, if they were to carry out the principle of this Bill, if they were bound to injure Russia in every possible way, the same principle would apply to dealings with the old securities. He thought his noble Friend had pushed the principle much too high, if he intended to content himself with this Bill. He thought they ought to have the assistance of the law officers of the Crown, and, therefore, he hoped his noble Friend would consent to the Chairman's reporting progress.

MR. I. BUTT said, that the words of the clause were so plain, that he considered that every person in the House was as capable of understanding them as the Attorney General. If it were necessary to bring up any other clause, it could be done on the consideration of the Report.

MR. T. BARING said, at the risk of being called by the noble Lord a traitor, he must express his wish that the Bill had been taken up by the Government. He thought that if any change in the present law was necessary in order to prevent the Russian Government, with which we were at war, from getting the money of British subjects, it ought to be adopted; but the measure for this purpose ought to be maturely and deliberately considered, and introduced in such a shape as might give it practical efficiency. He would suggest that Government might frame the Bill so as to make it applicable to every country with which we were at war as much as Russia. The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone was known, whether in time of war or peace, as a permanent enemy of the Russian Government, and the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department shared that reputation and sympathised with his opinions. But it would be scarcely becoming them as a legislative assembly to decide any question of foreign policy and international relations by considerations affecting only one particular Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it undoubtedly might be a matter for consideration whether they would not hereafter extend the principle of this Bill to all the cases to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded. At the same time he did not think that that was a reason for not carrying this measure. There were two principles upon which Governments and nations acted—the one was to provide for the immediate case before them, the other was to provide for all futurity. Now we were at war with Russia, and he did not think it was open to any hon. Member to accuse another hon. Member of peculiar animosity to Russia, because measures were taken to carry on the war, and to give us all the advantage which skill or arrangement could give us in the contest. When they were at war with a country, they endeavoured to do that country all the damage they could for the purpose of bringing about peace, and that which was necessary for their future security, and therefore he did not admit the accusation of the hon. Gentleman, that there was any personal feeling or any peculiar animosity to Russia as Russia. He hoped we should not be at war with any other country but Russia, and he did not at present anticipate that we should. He hoped that when this war was brought to a conclusion we should enjoy a long period of peace, and therefore he did not see any urgent necessity to generalise this measure. He should have no objection on principle to do so, but the arguments that had been used rather seemed to him to be against generalising it now. It was said, the measure was ineffective. Well, let them try it in the present case, and if it succeeded in this case, they might extend it to other cases. Let them try what effect it would have in the war in which they were engaged; and if it was found to be a measure that was applicable to all cases in which they might be at war with a foreign Power, he had no doubt that it might then be properly made a general measure. With regard to the absence of the law officers, every one knew that the law officers were very much engaged in the morning, but it would be perfectly competent for the House to have their presence upon the report, and if any change should be thought necessary, in order to carry the measure properly into effect, the House could make that change upon the report as well as in Committee, and therefore nothing would be lost by this very short Bill passing through Committee now."

MR. T. BARING said, if the noble Lord thought this Bill was urgent in the case of Russia, all he could say was, that to the best of his belief and knowledge there had not been a single individual in this country who had taken any interest in the last loan made with Russia, nor did he think that public opinion would sanction such a proceeding; and this he would also say, that he believed the Committee of the Stock Exchange would forbid the currency of that loan. He thought public opinion was much stronger than the noble Lord's Bill.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, the right hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. V. Smith) had talked of the inflammable speech of the noble Lord the Home Secretary (Lord Palmerston). He (Sir J. V. Shelley), whatever the right hon. Gentleman might think of it, believed that that speech would be re-echoed out of doors, and that the noble Lord would gain great credit by it. He should certainly vote for going on with the Bill.

MR. I. BUTT said, that it was something extraordinary that in this Bill they were running counter to the principles of commerce, seeing that, according to the hon. Member for Huntingdon, the Committee of the Stock Exchange would forbid transactions in any new loan with Russia.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, in reference to the desire expressed by hon. Members for the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, he could state, that although the hon. and learned Solicitor General had at first expressed a strong objection to the Bill, yet when he had read it he quite concurred in its object. In like manner the Attorney General, after perusing the measure, had said that he saw no legal objection to it, but that it was a question of general policy.

Viscount Palmerston

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 78: Majority 46.

Clause 1.

MR. I. BUTT said, that an Amendment to this clause would be desirable. If a person subscribed to a foreign stock with the view of affording pecuniary aid to the enemies of the country, there was no doubt that he would be guilty of high treason. The same might also be said of a person who colourably purchased stock from a neutral, with a real intent of subscribing to the loan. By the Bill, it was intended to make the bond fide dealing in Russian bonds already paid up a misdemeanor punishable by three months imprisonment; but he had some doubt, however, whether the clause, as it stood, might not likewise render the second case to which he had alluded, and which was clearly treason, a mere misdemeanor; and he should therefore propose words reserving to the Government the power of proceeding against a party either for treason at common law, or for a misdemeanor under the Statute.

MR. HENLEY said, the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman was an illustration of how much the Committee needed the assistance of the law officers.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would suggest that the clause had better pass as it stood, leaving the point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman to be considered between that time and the bringing up of the report.

MR. WALPOLE said, the object of the Bill—and it was a very desirable one—was to prevent any person in this country lending money to the Russian Government for the purpose of carrying on the war; but why, on an important question like that, did not the Government themselves bring in a Bill? The loan, as he understood it, was already contracted, and this Bill now declared that the transfer of any portion of that security from the 28th of March, 1854, should constitute the offence of misdemeanor; but unless they made the transfer of other Russian stock than that a misdemeanor, what security had they that money might not be advanced to the enemy by persons in this country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought there was considerable difference between prohibiting transactions of the kind in question in stock created prior to the war, and prohibiting them in regard to loans created for the special purpose of carrying on war against this country. It appeared to him that the date inscribed in the clause was a very proper one, since it was on that day that the Russian Government attempted to raise the loan for the purposes of the war against England and France.

Mr. VERNON SMITH said, he would beg to ask the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt), as Attorney General ad interim, whether the acceptance of Russian bonds as a security for a debt or claim would render a person liable for a misdemeanor? By the accident of commerce a person might come into possession of Russian bonds as a security; would a man, under those circumstances, be liable to three months imprisonment unless he immediately repudiated those bonds?

Mr. I. BUTT: Unquestionably. Although some cases of hardship might occur, it was necessary to go to that extent in order to prevent the law from being evaded.

Mr. WILKINSON said, he doubted the policy of the measure. The Czar might retort by refusing to pay the interest on his former bonds to English holders.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if a foreigner offered the prohibited bonds as a security, the creditor would not take them. It would just be the same as if a man offered a person a bad bank-note.

VISCOUNT MONCK said, the noble Lord had misunderstood the point of the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. V. Smith's) question. The right hon. Gentleman was not speaking of cases in which Russian bonds were tendered to a merchant who might accept or reject them at his pleasure, but of cases in which by the accidents of commerce this foreign stock might fall into the hands of a merchant who would have no other means of realising his claim.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he apprehended that in every case in which a security of that nature was tendered in payment of debt, it would be for the creditor to consider whether he should accept it or not, or whether he should not treat it as a bad bank-note. He thought the principle on which the creditor should act in such a case was caveat merchant.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE said, he had understood this Bill was not to have any retrospective effect; but it was to operate against the loan raised in March last, and therefore it would have a retrospective effect. He admitted it was desirable that the Russian Government should be deprived of all facilities whatever for raising money in this country for the purposes of the war, but he must contend we had no right to give the Bill which was meant to attain that object a retrospective effect.

Mr. DUNCAN said, there were many of his constituents engaged in shipping, who might have received payments in March or April last for freights which they had taken out in February, among which payments Russian securities might be found, and he thought it unworthy of the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) to say that such securities would have to be treated as bad debts by the holders of them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, if one merchant dealt with another whose circumstances were doubtful, the only course for him was to take care that the security tendered to him by his debtor was good, and it was an additional reason why he should not accept a bad security if the solvency of his debtor was a matter of doubt. With reference to the objection taken by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Duncombe), he might say that the Bill affected Russian stock created on the 28th of March, 1854, but only affected transactions in that stock subsequent to the passing of the Bill. His own impression was, that there would be no great hardship in such an enactment as that.

Mr. T. BARING said, the noble Lord had certainly a pleasant way of disposing of the question of commercial relations. He was afraid, however, that the noble Lord's views were by no means favourable to the creditor. It sometimes happened that merchants in this country were connected with foreign firms, with respect to whose solvency they might entertain some doubts. Under these circumstances, security for the payment of his demand would be asked for by the creditor; but the debtor might say, in answer to that request, "I have got nothing but Russian bonds; but these are of some use to me, while they would be valueless to you." The creditor would thus fail to obtain the liquidation of his demand, and he would ask if that was a wise principle by which such a state of things would be sanctioned?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that all these arguments might very simply reduce themselves into a much more elementary form. No doubt war was a great inconvenience and a great interruption of all the commercial relations between man and man, and between nation and nation. Nobody disputed that. War ought never, therefore, to be undertaken except for some great and adequate reason; but when they had that reason they must make up their minds to suffer the inconvenience and the interruption of the ordinary relations of commerce. He did not know that there would be any great advantage in making a state of war too easy. War ought to be felt to be, what it was, a great calamity, because it would then make Governments less rash to enter into a state of hostility. In the present case the opinion of the whole nation would be that this war was inevitable, and that a measure, the object of which was to prevent English subjects from rendering pecuniary aid to the enemies of the country, was deserving of the consideration and support of Parliament.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he must maintain that the question under their consideration was by no means one of an elementary character. It was simply whether the operation of the Bill would or would not be retrospective—a matter upon which, as it involved an important principle of law, he thought it was extremely desirable that they should have the opinion of the law officers of the Crown.

MR. J. WILSON said, he was of opinion that if the Bill were to pass into a law, it was advisable that it should be passed in as perfect a manner as possible. There was in the Bill, as it stood, a defect, which required only to be stated in order to show that it went further than the measure purported to go, and would influence a class of securities which it was not meant to affect. The Bill made it a misdemeanor for any person to buy, or offer to buy or sell, securities of the Russian Government, which should be, or should be reputed to be, issued after a certain date. Now, it was well known that the Russian Government held in their own hands a considerable proportion of their old securities. Let him suppose that they should issue a large amount of those securities to their agents, Messrs. Hope of Amsterdam, and that a London merchant should purchase those securities. Well, the person making the purchase would come under the operation of the Bill; but how, he would ask, was such individual to become acquainted with that fact? He should therefore suggest to his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart), that it was desirable that the application of the Bill should be limited to those securities which purported to have been created after the declaration of the war.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he remembered a saying of Mr. Windham's, that the truly wise were always in the minority. He could not help thinking that that saying was correct as applied to those who were in the minority in the division which had lately taken place. The Committee must perceive that it was by no means desirable that they should proceed further with the Bill until they had the advantage of the assistance of the law officers of the Crown. He should, therefore, move that the Chairman should report progress.

MR. MASSEY said, when the Bill was in Committee that was the proper time for discussing the details. It was extremely doubtful at present whether the Bill would not have a retrospective effect, and whether it would not involve innocent persons in its penalties. Besides, it involved questions of property. He was willing to assist in crippling the resources of Russia, but they ought also to take care that in doing that they did not ruin the property of their own countrymen. He thought the House ought not to commit itself to a course of precipitate legislation on this subject.

MR. BARROW said, he thought that, as such a loan had not yet been contracted, in the discussion which had ensued on this Bill they had been simply fighting with shadows.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, as the Committee thought it desirable to have the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on the construction of the Bill, he would not oppose the Motion for reporting progress.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he hoped the Government would take care that the law officers of the Crown should give the House the benefit of their advice, so that there might be no unnecessary delay.

House resumed.

ARCTIC EXPEDITIONS—THE “EREBUS” AND “TERROR”—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he wished to ask the right hon. Baronet the

First Lord of the Admiralty, what regulations had been made for the payment of the wages due to the representatives of the officers and seamen of Her Majesty's ships Erebus and Terror? He understood that, although the engagement with respect to double pay had been adhered to, the representatives of the officers who had been promoted to higher ranks, after the ships left England, were only to receive the pay of the ranks which they respectively held at the time of their going out. He thought that the wages of those officers should be those of the ranks to which they had been raised, and he could not avoid expressing an opinion that there had been something like sharp practice in reference to the time to which the wages were to be paid—the 31st of March.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he was quite sure that the House and the country would be most anxious that the case of the representatives of the officers and seamen who had been lost in the Erebus and Terror should be dealt with with every consideration for their just claims; and he had been somewhat grieved to hear the hon. and gallant Officer say that he thought there had been some sharp practice. [Sir G. PEACHELL: I said with reference to the 31st of March.] Well, with reference to the 31st of March. What were the facts of the case? The officers and crews of the Erebus and Terror were last heard of in July, 1845; and for nine years from that time double pay had been allowed to their representatives—that was to say, from July, 1845, to March, 1854, those representatives had been entitled, upon producing, on the part of commissioned officers, letters of probate or of administration, to double pay up to that time, subject only, in their case, to the single condition that they should give a bond of indemnity to the public. This bond had been drawn by Mr. Justice Crowder when the Admiralty had the advantage of his assistance as their law officer, and which was intended to indemnify the public in case those officers should appear; for, however distant the time might be, in case they should ever return, the money, of course, would be due to them. The representatives of the petty officers and seamen had also received double pay up to the same time, but without being put to the expense of probate, and without entering into a bond. The number of commissioned officers in the two ships was twenty-four, and of the other classes 102; and of these, nineteen representatives of commissioned officers, and eighty-three representatives of petty officers and seamen, had already received the full amount which was due to those whom they represented. A question had been raised respecting the effects of such of the officers as had been promoted during the period of their absence, and whether the pay of their higher rank might be claimed by the representatives. They were few in number, and their case was strictly regulated by the 9th article, chap. 10, of the Queen's Regulations, which stated that,—

“If an officer should be promoted by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty while serving, but not appointed to a ship in commission, he should from the date of his promotion be allowed the half-pay of the higher rank whenever it exceeded the full pay of the lower rank.”

The payments had been calculated in conformity with that article, and he thought they had been properly so calculated, especially when it was considered that they were dealing, not with the officers themselves who had been promoted, and who had rendered the service for which that promotion had been given; and if they should happily ever return, it might be open to consideration whether in their favour the strict rule should not be relaxed; but in the meantime, and as between the public and their representatives, the Admiralty had not hesitated to apply the rule as they found it.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir G. Pecheil) could not do better than leave the matter in the hands of the Admiralty; but he trusted that the right hon. Baronet would reconsider the claims of the representatives of that class of the officers to which he had last referred, for he could not believe that the regulation he had read could have been intended to apply to the case of ships locked up in the ice, as these had been, so as to render it impossible for the officers promoted to come home and claim the benefit of their promotion.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, it was his conviction that the right hon. Baronet would not stint the representatives of these gallant officers and seamen of their fair remuneration, and that they might rely on the indulgent consideration of the House of Commons for any appeal that might be made on behalf of persons who had been exposed to such great sacrifices.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee of Supply.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he must complain of the deficiency of evidence which still existed as to who were really to blame for not having looked after the late defaulting officer. This Vote had been postponed in consequence of his requiring the production of the Report of the three gentlemen who had been appointed by the Treasury to investigate the case of Mr. Swabey's defalcations, and the liability of the Treasury arising therefrom. If the Treasury were liable for the defalcations of this public officer, how was it that they had no control over him? The Commissioners stated that they thought the liabilities might be 19,000*l.* But so far from there being only that amount, he believed it was nearly 66,000*l.* There must be monstrous negligence somewhere, when a man could be a defaulter to that amount. If the Vote had been brought forward earlier, he should certainly have moved for a Committee to inquire under what responsibility this officer exercised his duty. He hoped that the example would act as a useful warning hereafter.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, the circumstances of this case were very peculiar, and certainly ought to convey a salutary warning to the House of Commons. Mr. Swabey, the defaulting registrar, was originally one of the deputies of Lord Arden, when that nobleman held the sinecure office of Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty, and he so demeaned himself in that situation that he acquired very general confidence. On the abatement of the great sinecure, at the death of Lord Arden, Parliament took on itself, not only to regulate the office prospectively, but also to appoint a successor to Lord Arden. The Parliament appointed Mr. Swabey to the office, as a person entitled to more than usual confidence; and, because he was so trusted by Parliament, he was released from the necessity of providing those ordinary securities required from an officer receiving a public appointment of such a nature. He was not subjected to any control, either on the part of the Admiralty or of the Treasury. Mr. Swabey retained his office for a long time without his credit being shaken, but on one fine morning he was found to be a defaulter to the amount of some 66,000*l.* He (Sir James Graham) believed that, in strict law, the suitors in the Court of Admiralty, to whom the money for which Mr. Swabey was a defaulter was due, were not entitled to relief from the public; but, as it appeared hard that through the laches of Parliament the loss should fall on them, he, on behalf of the Judge of the Court of Admiralty, made a strong appeal to the Treasury, in order that the suitors in the Court might be held harmless. Every endeavour had been made to obtain from Mr. Swabey the repayment of the money, but in consequence of Mr. Swabey's shattered circumstances, 25,000*l.* out of 66,000*l.* might be taken as the amount, which there was not the slightest hope of recovering. He trusted that the circumstances of this case would teach the House the danger of encroaching upon the Executive Government, more especially with regard to the question of patronage, and that in future the Registrar of the Court of Admiralty, as well as other public officers, would be placed under the strictest supervision on the part of some public board. He had recently sent up to the House of Lords a Bill for the regulation of the Admiralty Court, and one of the provisions of that measure was, that henceforth the registrar should not receive fees, but should, in lieu of them, receive stamps, which would have the effect of reducing the sum of public money in the hands of the officer at any given time, and of preventing the recurrence of such a case as that of Mr. Swabey.

MR. HENLEY said, that this was one of those unfortunate circumstances which proved the truth of the saying, "that after the steed was stolen the stable door was closed." He thought the House ought to have further information on the subject, because they were left in ignorance as to the conditions under which this great sinecure held by Lord Arden had been abolished. If, previous to the abolition, the person appointed to the office had been in the habit of giving securities, then it would seem that there had been some negligence on the part of the Court of Admiralty in not requiring securities from Mr. Swabey.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he was sorry to say that he had been so long in that House that he remembered many prolonged arguments in defence of sinecures of the description held by Lord Arden. It was urged that, considering the immense sums intrusted to the Registrar, it was most desirable to have in that office

Peers of Parliament—men of spotless honour and of large property—because any money security that could be obtained was not half so valuable as the security afforded by persons of exalted character. When Lord Arden held the office nothing could exceed the regularity with which the accounts were kept. Such was the case when the office was held by great sinecurists, who were responsible for their deputies. But the House of Commons, on the abolition of the sinecure, lulled into a false security on account of the regular and admirable conduct of the business of Lord Arden, thought it might transfer to the deputy, when appointed to the office, the same exemption from providing securities. However, experience had taught a wholesome lesson, and, in respect to the new appointment, the Government had made arrangements not only that securities should be taken, but that not so large a balance should again be left in the hands of the registrar.

SIR GEORGE PECELL said, he thought that some blame attached to the Admiralty for having allowed such large sums of public money to remain in the hands of the registrar. The right hon. Baronet had referred to a measure which he had sent to the House of Lords for the regulation of the Admiralty Court in this country; but he had not said how he proposed to deal with the Admiralty Courts in Sierra Leone, Ceylon, and other colonies, where reform was much needed. Loud complaints were made of the extravagant expenses charged in the Colonial Admiralty Courts, and he had heard of malpractices on the part of officers who, unlike Mr. Swabey, were under the control of the Admiralty. He believed that Mr. Swabey would never have been able to make away with 65,000*l.* of public money had there not been some great omission on the part of one or other of the Government departments.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, this was an extremely awkward case. Here was a public functionary who had contrived to carry off 65,000*l.*, and nobody could say how. The money seemed to have been got hold of under three heads, and if they analysed the case carefully they would find that the responsibility rested with different parties, but in no respect with the Admiralty. Upon a former occasion the right hon. Baronet gave him complete satisfaction with respect to the fee fund; but he wished to call the attention of the Committee to two other cases—that of the Crown fund, and that of the suitors' fund. With respect to the latter, he maintained that the office of Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty was distinctly regulated by an Act passed in the reign of Geo. III., whose provisions referred to the suitors' fund; and what he complained of was, that that Statute had not been duly carried into effect. In that Act the Judge of the Admiralty Court was required to make such regulations as he might consider necessary for the safe keeping of the suitors' fund, and he found there was to be an account kept in the Bank of England, that schedules were to be made from time to time of all the moneys deposited on behalf of the suitors in the Admiralty Court, and that in no case should the sum in the hands of the registrar amount to more than 10,000*l.* If the provisions of that Statute had been carried out, the public might have suffered to the extent of 10,000*l.*; but Mr. Swabey could not have misappropriated the large sum of 65,000*l.* He did not charge the Admiralty with having anything to do with this part of the case; on the contrary, he thought that the persons responsible, so far as the suitors' fund was concerned, was the Judge of the Admiralty Court, who ought to have obeyed the requisitions of the Act of Geo. III. In the case of the Crown fund the Commissioners of the Treasury were responsible, for it was admitted on all sides that, so far as the Crown fund was concerned, Mr. Swabey was the mere agent of the Commissioners. How came it, then, that they had not looked after that fund, and why had a public account not been kept? His own opinion was that the Committee should not grant the 25,000*l.* asked for until they had some clear explanation of how the loss had occurred. At all events there should have been a Committee to inquire into the transactions.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that when this case was before the House upon a former occasion the hon. Secretary of the Treasury stated that the assets of Mr. Swabey would, in all probability, cover the whole amount of the loss. The First Lord of the Admiralty had since informed the Committee that in his opinion there would be a deficiency of at least 25,000*l.* He thought the Committee ought not to vote any sum until they ascertained the exact amount of the loss. It was admitted that there was no legal obligation on the part of the public to pay this money; and yet, upon all occasions when such robberies—for that was their proper name—took place, the public was called upon to make up the deficiency. He hoped the House of Commons would set its face against the continuance of such a system.

MR. J. WILSON said, he thought it would answer no useful purpose to advert to the past; it was, however, extremely important to determine what security should be taken in future. The right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty had explained that the Lords of the Admiralty had not the appointment of the Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty, nor had they the appointment of the Judge of that Court, by whom the registrar was appointed; nor did it appear that the registrar was in any degree subject to the control of their Lordships. As to the future, it was recommended that with regard to the Crown fund, the moneys should not pass into the hands of the registrar at all, but that they should remain with the Paymaster General, the registrar being informed of the amounts from time to time. With regard to the suitors' fund, the arrangement hitherto had been for the Judge of the Court, who was the officer who ought to have the surveillance of that fund, to take ample security from the gentleman whom he appointed to manage that fund. Regulations were laid down requiring the registrar to render an account every month, which was audited, and the registrar was restrained from holding in his hand any balance exceeding 5,000*l.* at any one time. The whole defalcation in the accounts of Mr. Swabey was 65,000*l.*; the sum expected to be recovered was 40,000*l.*, so that the actual defalcation would be 25,000*l.*. This was the amount now proposed to be voted exclusively for the suitors' fund.

MR. OTWAY said, he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman in saying that it was of no use to revert to the past, for he was of opinion that the very best results might be arrived at if they could find out how these frauds had been committed. The right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty had thrown all the responsibility on Parliament; his argument was, that the Registrar of the Court of Admiralty was appointed by Parliament, and therefore the Admiralty had nothing whatever to do with the misconduct of the party so appointed. He (Mr. Otway) could not admit the soundness of that reasoning. It seemed to him that when the First Lord of the Admiralty knew that the registrar had been appointed by Act of Parliament without being required to give securities, it was his bounden duty to have come down to the House and have taken the earliest steps to remedy that defect. He had been informed that the learned Judge of the Admiralty Court had distinctly proposed that security should be taken from the registrar, and that no attention was paid to the suggestion.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he must explain that the appointment of registrar was by special Act of Parliament, and that Mr. Swabey's appointment took place in 1840. It had been supposed that this officer was placed under the control of the Board of Admiralty, but, in point of fact, he was placed exclusively under the control of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty. If Dr. Lushington did not take any security from the registrar, it might be supposed that it was because he placed great confidence in the man who had been specially appointed by Act of Parliament, and that misplaced confidence might have given rise to the fraud which had been committed. It was supposed that he (Sir J. Graham) had been guilty of negligence in not asking for a security, especially in a time of war; but what was the fact? The defalcation of Mr. Swabey took place at the end of December last year; war was declared in the month of March of this year.

MR. MULLINGS said, that by the Report of the Committee on this subject, it appeared that several of the clerks in the office of the registrar were aware of the irregularities in the accounts. He wished to know whether those clerks were continued in their situations, and if so whether they had been reprimanded?

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, that it was impossible to suppose that by the Act of the 3 & 4 Vict., under which the registrar was appointed, any responsibility attached to the First Lord of the Admiralty, and he considered that the same observation applied to the learned Judge of the High Court of Admiralty. It would have been impossible for him to have exacted any security from a person so appointed by the Legislature itself. The hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (Sir G. Pecheil) took an active part in passing that measure, which was the Bill by which Dr. Lushington was excluded from the House of Commons. Whatever blame, therefore, existed, attached to the Legislature, and to the Legislature alone. With respect to Mr. Swabey, the unfortunate person who had been guilty of this robbery was nevertheless a man who had the highest possible character, and whose connections were such as would induce any one to place confidence in him, and he (Mr. Phillimore) believed that, with this exception, nothing had ever been said against his character. He had, however, committed a grave offence, the blame of which attached quite as much to Parliament as to any individual whatever.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the Committee would make a great mistake in endeavouring to attach any responsibility to the First Lord of the Admiralty; but he differed from the hon. and learned Gentleman who had last addressed them in throwing the blame on Parliament. If the Judge of the Court of Admiralty had carried out the provisions of the Act of the 53rd of Geo. III. c. 151, by which the registrar was originally appointed, and which prescribed what were his duties, this fraud would not have been committed.

In reply to a question from Mr. HENLEY,

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he could not undertake to say whether the Judge of the Admiralty Court had power to take security from Mr. Swabey when he was not empowered to do so by the Act of Parliament making the appointment. That was a legal question, which it was not for him to decide.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would not divide the Committee upon the Vote, believing that it was the intention of an hon. Member, upon the bringing up of the report, to move for a Committee of Inquiry.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) 45,000*l.*, Orange River Territory.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the Vote was intended to facilitate the carrying out of the mission intrusted to Sir George Clerk in connection with the abandonment of the Orange River Sovereignty. A portion of the Vote—about 7,000—was required to pay the salary and travelling expenses of Sir George Clerk himself. Another and a very large portion was required to compensate the Dutch farmers who assisted the British authorities during their quarrel with the natives. Another item was required to compensate the Boers, whose property had been taken possession of while they themselves were acting against Government in 1848 under their leader Prætorius. Sir George Clerk thought it better to make an arrangement with these tribes—the Trans-Vaal Boers—by offering them a compensation for the loss of their property, which had been seized by other tribes during their absence when fighting against us, than to allow them to return and enter into conflict with those who had become possessed of that property. That was the way in which this money was to be spent. He did not know whether 45,000*l.* would be sufficient. It might amount to 50,000*l.* But if it amounted even to 60,000*l.*, it would be a very economical disbursement, because the maintenance of troops in time of peace would cost 6,000*l.* a year, with now and then the probability of a war requiring the presence of an army and an enormous expenditure. On the whole he thought the abandonment of this territory, even if it cost 60,000*l.*, would be a very economical arrangement.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must complain of the public money being appropriated to all sorts of claims of this sort. He wished to know whether the territory was now in the possession of these Dutch Boers, and whether they stood between the British colonists and the black population.

MR. SPOONER said, he wanted to know why they had not an estimate of the entire amount required, and how much more it was supposed would be wanting to pay off these claims?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, about 15,000*l.* more would, he thought, settle all the claims; but it was impossible as yet to state the amount with accuracy. In answer to the hon. Member for Lambeth he begged to say that these Boers stood between them and the Kafir population.

MR. HENLEY said, he could not understand why it was because the loyal part of the population was compensated, they must also compensate the disloyal portion?

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That a sum, not exceeding 2,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, in the year ending the 31st day of March, 1855, in aid of the subscriptions raised for the erection of a building at Nottingham, in which to deposit the valuable astronomical, &c., instruments presented to the country by Mr. Lawson.”

LORD SEYMOUR said, this was a Vote which required some explanation. As far as he was at present informed, he thought it very doubtful whether the Committee ought to agree to it. He had received some information respecting it, and he had seen the subscription-list which was referred to in the Vote, and he saw the name of no man of science who vouched for the value of the instruments presented by Mr. Lawson. It was stated that the instruments cost 10,000*l.*, 8,000*l.* of which (including 1,000*l.* given by Mr. Lawson) was raised by subscription; but he had been told that their real value was not anything equal to that sum. How was it that Mr. Hyde, the well-known astronomer, who was a native of Nottingham, did not lend his name to support this proposal? And, he would ask, who was to appoint the astronomer at this observatory? If this had been an application for a Vote in aid of the instruction of the people or for the promotion of science, he would not have objected to it; but he believed that, under the pretext of aiding science, the money would be appropriated to the private advantage of certain individuals. Should the Vote pass, it would be taken as a precedent; and if the House were to give money on these pretences, there would be no end to the claims that would be made upon them from the various towns in the kingdom. He, therefore, wished to know on what ground it was they were called upon to make this grant, and whether there was any real feeling in favour of it on the part of the people of the county of Nottingham?

MR. EVELYN DENISON said, he felt himself bound, having some local connection with the district to which the Vote referred, to give the Committee all the information he possessed on the subject. Something less than two years ago the gentlemen of the town and county of Nottingham were invited to assemble for the purpose of raising a subscription in aid of a proposal which had been made—namely, that a set of astronomical instruments of the value of 10,000*l.* would be presented to Nottingham by Mr. Lawson, if the gentlemen of the county would raise a sum equal to that amount to build and maintain a public institution. A meeting was held to see what could be done, and it appearing that the whole of the money could not be obtained from Nottingham, the assistance of the surrounding localities was sought. In the first place, it was considered necessary to ascertain whether any public advantage would be obtained by the purchase of the collection, and he (Mr. E. Denison) wrote to Sir John Herschel and Professor Airy, the Astronomer Royal, to ask their opinion whether astronomy and science in general would be advanced by the formation of such an institution. The answer of these gentlemen was in the negative. Since then two incidents had occurred, one favourable and the other unfavourable to the undertaking. The favourable incident was the intelligence that Government were going to be so good as to assist the local subscription by a grant of 2,000*l.* The unfavourable circumstance was the discovery that the astronomical instruments were worth many thousands of pounds less than had been represented. It was thought, however, Government would make inquiry before they proposed any grant from the public money to assist in the purchase, and the local inquiries which had been commenced were consequently suspended. It was considered the instruments might be useful for meteorological researches, but it should not be forgotten that they were astronomical and not meteorological instruments. This was the state of the case, and he was bound to say that if the question came over again he did not think there would be the same disposition on the part of the gentlemen of the locality to come forward with subscriptions. But the collection of private subscriptions was one thing, while the voting of public money was another, and he could not feel justified in voting the money of his constituents without a much stronger case being shown than could, as far as he was aware, be advanced in favour of this Vote, especially as there were such great doubts as to the value of the instruments.

MR. J. WILSON said, he must explain to the Committee that the Government had understood that the value of the instruments had been ascertained by those locally interested. The proposition was, that as these instruments, which were said to be exceedingly valuable in a national point of view, had been offered for 10,000*l.*, and that as the locality had already subscribed 8,000*l.* towards it, the Government ought to come forward to assist with the remaining 2,000*l.* Not being prepared to make such a grant on local grounds, the Government endeavoured to ascertain whether there were any public grounds for making such a proposition. To determine that point they referred to the Astronomer Royal and Sir John Herschel, who said that no public advantage would be gained by establishing an astronomical observatory on the site indicated, but that considerable public benefit would result from the establishment there of a meteorological observatory. This being the case, and assurance having been given that, in addition to instruments worth 10,000*l.*, private subscriptions to the amount of nearly 8,000*l.* had been raised, the Government resolved on recommending the Committee to grant 2,000*l.* to carry out the object. It now appeared, however, that the instruments, which were the basis of the whole arrangement, were worth much less than had been represented; and under these circumstances he begged leave to withdraw the Vote.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he could not help observing that this Vote afforded a pretty fair instance of the careless way in which the public money was wasted. Had it not been for the exposé made by the hon. Member for Malton (Mr. E. Denison), this job would doubtless have been perpetrated.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding 140,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for the purchase of Burlington House, Piccadilly.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, with regard to this Vote, the Committee must be aware of the great difficulty experienced of late years in regard to the increasing demand for buildings for public purposes. A sum of not less than 11,000*l.* or 12,000*l.* was paid annually for the accommodation of public offices of various descriptions. The sale of the Excise Office in Old Broad Street, for which 120,000*l.* was realised, had tended to increase the difficulty of providing accommodation. The object in getting rid of that building was to concentrate the Excise department and other departments now combined with it in Somerset House. In Somerset House space was afforded to various learned societies, and the obtaining that space for the greater concentration of the public offices would be attended with great economy. It seemed to be the general opinion that these learned societies should depend for the most part on voluntary subscriptions, but that the provision of rooms in which to carry on their business was a fair and suitable contribution on the part of the State, and ought to be extended to certain bodies which had not hitherto enjoyed it. A small Vote had this year, he believed, been taken to provide rooms for the Geographical Society, but it was understood that was only an interim arrangement until the Government had space at their disposal. It was very possible in that event that accommodation would be extended to one or more bodies of the same description as the Geographical Society. There were, therefore, these two demands—first, a considerable and likely to be a growing demand from the multiplication of all the public departments; and secondly, a demand on the part of these learned societies. It might be supposed that the great purchase at Kensington would stand in the place of this Vote, but that view was more plausible than solid. The truth was, distance was all-important, and all these societies had recently expressed their unanimous conviction that, if accommodation for their meetings and ordinary business were offered at so great a distance as Kensington, they would be compelled to reject it. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government thought it a fortunate event when they had the power to secure so large a site, amounting to nearly three acres and a half, in so admirable and convenient a situation as Burlington House. They thought it an opportunity that might not readily recur, while the necessity was pressing. He would also remind the Committee that at present Marlborough House was occupied by leave of the Crown for the advantage of the public, but the time would shortly come when it must be devoted to its proper purpose. Having, therefore, examined into the value of the site of Burlington House, they determined to offer a sum of 140,000*l.* That sum was at first refused. The Government stated that they would not deviate from terms which they thought just, and it was finally accepted. When the offer was first made, the Government were not involved so deeply in other demands of an extraordinary character; but a portion of the site, if thought fit, might be applied in a manner directly remunerative, being adapted for the frontage of shops. It would be impossible to retain the mansion as it stood; but the great bulk of the building erected on its site would be applicable to either one of the two great objects—the concentration of public offices, or the affording learned societies accommodation of which they were in need, and which it was clear should be given from the public resources.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he believed that, at such a distance from Downing Street, Burlington House would not be very well adapted for public offices. With regard to these learned societies, he hoped his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be very careful how he admitted these bodies, and let it be dis-tinety understood that the accommodation was only temporary, and revocable at the pleasure of the Crown. They all knew what inconvenience had been experienced in the building of the National Gallery in consequence of a portion of it having been devoted to the Royal Academy, and they having thought proper to consider the occupation permanent. Before proceeding to destroy the beautiful mansion, he hoped some estimate would be submitted, and some plan of the structure to be raised in its place would be laid before the House.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, the building would be very applicable to the various public commissions scattered about the metropolis, as well as those societies which possessed rooms at the expense of the Government. With regard to pulling down Burlington House, plans were in preparation in the office of the Board of Works, which would be submitted to the Government, and when approved by the Government, would be brought under the consideration of Parliament to obtain a Vote upon them. The right hon. Gentleman might rest perfectly assured nothing would be done until those plans had been carefully prepared and submitted to the Government.

MR. SPOONER said, that already Parliament had granted 200,000*l.* for the purchase of ground at Kensington, and the strongest argument for that grant was, that the building would be applicable to these very learned societies, who now thought it too distant. That Vote was proposed by Lord Derby's Government, and objected to by him as strongly as he now objected to this Vote.

And it being a quarter before Six of the clock, the Chairman reported progress, and Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair:—Committee to sit again To-morrow.

The House adjourned at twelve minutes before Six o'clock.

Mr. V. Smith

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

Bill read 3^a (according to order).

EARL WALDEGRAVE moved the introduction of a clause providing that if any person, being a Malay, Lascar, or native of the territories under the government of the East India Company, should be brought to the United Kingdom on board ship, and should be found, while in this country, to be in want of food, clothing, or other necessities, it should be lawful for the Lords of the Admiralty to supply him with necessary relief, and to send him back to, or near to, the port from which he was shipped.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY considered the clause was unnecessary, and that if it were introduced it would not meet the object in view. It was enacted by the East India Company's Act that they should be at the expense of maintaining such persons, if belonging to their territories, while in this country, and of sending them back by ship to their own country; and they had power to prevent sailors going on board ship without giving security that they should be taken back. With regard to persons from the Sandwich Islands and similar places, the clause would not meet their case, for it only referred to Malays and Africans.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE was sorry he could not compliment the noble Lord upon the soundness of his argument. Whatever technical objections might be urged against it, common sense would say that nothing could be more reasonable than the clause proposed by his noble Friend. He could not imagine any greater hardship than to allow merchant shipowners to bring foreign seamen from distant parts of the world, pay them off in the port of London or Liverpool, cast them adrift in the streets, and leave them chargeable to the poor rates or the charity of the public. This was a hardship alike to the sailor and the public; and in his opinion the clause was a most just and useful one.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the Poor Law Commissioners had been communicated with as to whether they should not bring in a Bill for the correction of the evil complained of. To apply a remedy would be very difficult in any case; but if a mode of doing so could be devised, he had no doubt they would be glad to adopt it. After all, however, the evil chiefly applied to very few persons—namely, the natives of those countries which had no Consul or Minister here. In the case of civilised countries that were represented here, it was a part of the duty of the Consul or Minister to send home their own distressed subjects. Lascars and natives of the East Indies were provided for by the East India Company; and the evil only affected, therefore, natives of Africa, the Sandwich Islands, and the other islands of the Pacific Ocean.

LORD COLCHESTER hoped the Board of Trade would, at all events, consider the matter before the next Session of Parliament, and see if they could not next Session introduce a measure to remedy this admitted evil.

Amendment negotiated: Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

On the suggestion of Lord REDESDALE, Moved to resolve,

"That this House, having adjourned on Monday last before a Bill intituled 'An Act for allowing Gold Wares to be manufactured at a lower Standard than that now allowed by Law, and to amend the Law relating to the assaying of Gold and Silver Wares,' could be brought from the Commons House, after being passed there on that Day, by which Accident alone the Second Reading of the said Bill could not be moved on Tuesday last, it is reasonable that the same be allowed to be read a Second Time this Day, if the House shall think fit so to order."

On Question, agreed to,

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

SALE OF BEER, &c., BILL.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, in moving, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee," said, that there were two or three Amendments which he proposed to introduce on the bringing up of the report. The object of the Bill was to impose certain restrictions upon the sale of liquors in public-houses on the Lord's Day, and the question was how this could best be done without interfering with the comforts and convenience of the people. The measure, so far as the limit upon the hours during which those places should be opened on the Sunday morning was concerned, had, he believed, received the approbation of all parties, as tending to the promotion of public order and morality. Under a recent Act public-houses were closed altogether in Scotland on the Lord's Day; and though a law going to that extent might interfere with the notions of liberty entertained in this country, yet he believed that Act had given universal satisfaction to the people amongst whom it was in force, and the Magistrates had declared that since its enactment the amount of crime had very sensibly diminished. The Bill did not propose to follow up that example to the full extent, but to allow houses of public entertainment in England to be open during part of the Sunday, in order to enable parties to obtain beer and other such refreshments as they might require. It had, however, been suggested by persons engaged in the trade that the object of the Bill might be answered by the adoption of somewhat less severe restrictions, and that by allowing the houses to remain open for a somewhat longer period the public would be subjected to less inconvenience than if the Bill remained as it was. Considerable communications had been held with a body of persons called the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society, upon the subject of the restrictions it would be most desirable to introduce; and, in consequence of those communications, the hours during which these houses should be opened had been fixed from 1 P.M. to 2 P.M. in the middle of the day, and from 6 P.M. to 10 P.M. in the evening. Subsequently the question had arisen, whether that was sufficient, especially in the case of houses situated in the suburbs; and on further consideration he was not sure whether it would not be desirable to extend the period for opening from 1 to half-past 2 P.M. in the middle of the day, to enable the working classes to provide themselves with beer for dinner, and in the evening to allow the houses to open at 5 P.M. instead of 6 P.M., in order to provide for the convenience of persons who made excursions into the country, and, of course, required refreshments on such occasions. It had further been represented to him that the closing hour of 10 P.M. would be impracticable in those public places and gardens where thousands of persons frequently assembled together in the summer months, the difficulty being to get rid of them at so early an hour. There would be no objection, however, to the service of refreshments being closed at 10 P.M., provided the premises were allowed to remain open until 11 P.M. This, he believed, would satisfy all parties, and at the same time tend to provide for the public convenience. He admitted that the question was extremely difficult to deal with; but he trusted the alterations he had indicated his willingness to make would attain the object he had in view; and whilst promoting quiet and social order on the Lord's Day, do so without trenching upon the comforts and convenience of the people—the working classes particularly.

LORD BROUGHAM owned that he regarded with very great satisfaction such relaxations of the Bill as his noble Friend proposed to introduce, believing, as he did, that those relaxations would to a great degree get rid of the main objections to the measure. He meant no offence to the authors of the Bill when he said he felt bound honestly to state the repugnance which he entertained at legislation which had its pressure upon one part of the community, whilst it did not press at all upon another. The part of the community upon which the Bill had a tendency to press, if it had not an actual pressure, was the working classes—the common people—what used to be termed the lower classes—the great body of the people. It was upon them that the measure tended to press; whereas the upper classes, and even the greater part of the middle classes—but at all events the upper classes—were not in the slightest degree affected by it. The Bill did not prevent him from going, if he chose, to any of the club-houses in St. James's Street or Pall Mall. They were open at all hours on Sunday, Good Friday, and Christmas Day, and every other day, just as well as in the week. [The Earl of HARROWBY: They are private houses.] He was afraid they could hardly be called private, for they were open to 600 or 700 persons, and to a certain degree were, therefore, public, though not so public as that any person whatever had a right to enter them. But he did not mean to dwell upon this objection, because, knowing as he did the very strong prevailing feeling of the country in favour of some measure of this description, he certainly for one was disposed to gratify that feeling, considering also that he was told the experience of Scotland was that the more general and stringent measure in operation there had had an excellent effect in checking the various social disorders which formerly existed in that country on Sundays.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the Bill passing; but he wished to draw the noble Earl's attention to certain words in the Bill which had already raised a practical difficulty in the Act that had been passed for Scotland. He held in his hand a petition from the proprietor of a public-house in Glasgow. The petitioner complained that there was a great doubt entertained as to the meaning of the words "bond fide travellers," and that the justices of the peace were not agreed as to what constituted a "bond fide traveller." If, for example, a person were going from this to the Crystal Palace or to Hampstead Heath, some of the justices would say that he was a bond fide traveller, others that he was not. Now, he (the Lord Chancellor) could not but think there was weight in this objection. He would suggest to the noble Earl to use some more comprehensive words to express his meaning as to "bond fide travellers."

THE MARQUESS OF OLANRICARDE said, he had intended to call attention to the same point. He considered that this Bill was one which ought to be most carefully and attentively considered, inasmuch as it had the appearance, to some extent, of being an infringement on the liberty of the industrious classes. There was no country in the world in which the industrious and working classes had so little real recreation as the working classes of this country had, and we ought certainly to pause before we hastily deprived them of any little they might possess. The subject was one of very great importance, not only in such cases as the noble and learned Lord had alluded to, but also in reference to that very large class of persons who at present travelled by excursion trains on Sunday, to whom the word "traveller" was generally held not to apply. Surely it was a great hardship that these persons should not have the same advantages as other ordinary travellers, and surely it was very unjust to deprive them of the ordinary means of recreation and refreshment. Since these excursion trains had been brought into use there were many people who went down on Sunday to the seaside, arrived at their destination in time for church, and, after attending morning service, devoted the other part of the day to innocent and rational enjoyment of the country; but if we put too great restrictions on these men in the way of refreshment, we should be doing them a very great injustice, and be unnecessarily taking upon ourselves to interfere with their enjoyments. It was absolutely necessary that the meaning of the word "traveller" should be properly defined, and it was a monstrous notion that we should go out of our way to call a man by one name when he travelled for pleasure, and another when he travelled for business, and treat him in a totally different manner.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he quite understood the difficulty and doubt in reference to the general question of legislation upon that subject at all ;—it was a subject of great difficulty and delicacy. At the same time he had no doubt of the immense benefit resulting to the working classes from the operation of the stringent Act already passed. A much more stringent Bill was passed last year restricting the sale of liquors in Scotland upon the Sunday, and he had lately seen remarkable statements from sheriffs of counties and magistrates of boroughs, as to the advantageous effects produced by that Act in diminishing drunkenness. He quite concurred with the noble Marquess in thinking that they ought not to interfere with the amusements and recreations of the working classes ; at the same time he did not think that the going into beer-houses was a recreation.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY considered it would be very difficult to introduce any positive definition of "travellers" into a Bill of the present description, and feared that we must leave the matter, as it now stood, to the vague common sense of those who were most interested in obeying the law and those whose duty it was to enforce it.

LORD ALVANLEY said, he did not see why a particular class of persons should be admitted into public-houses at particular times, and other classes should be excluded.

LORD CAMPBELL considered that this Bill, specifying particular hours for closing public-houses on Sunday, would be the means of preventing many difficulties from arising in respect to these places. The last Act specified that public-houses should not be opened on Sunday during afternoon service, and, on account of the obscurity of the expression, constant instances of confusion arose, from the different hours during which different churches and chapels performed their services. It was much better to specify, as this Act proposed to do, particular hours. The Bill would be of great service to the men belonging to the working classes, but the good it would be to the women and children would be incalculable. He was not at present inclined to recommend the adoption of the "Maine Law," although, perhaps, we might come to that, but he felt bound to say that he went all the length that the proposed Act did.

House in Committee accordingly ; Bill reported without Amendment ; and to be read 3^a To-morrow.

FINCHLEY ROAD ESTATE BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD R. GROSVENOR, in moving that this Bill be read a second time this day three months, said, that he considered it expedient to arrest the further progress of the measure. The promoters of the Bill complained that great exaggeration had been had recourse to, and many misrepresentations made with regard to its provisions. It was said by them that an attempt had been made to impose upon the public with respect to its provisions, and that the House came to the discussion with an unfair amount of prejudice ; but he considered the case was so plain against the measure that it required no amount of dressing up, and that it would have been equally clear if the name of Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson had never been mixed up with it before. The House would bear in mind that five Bills had been already introduced on this subject by that gentleman, all of which had been rejected by Parliament—one proposing to deal with Hampstead Heath itself, and four of them to build property abutting on the heath, which would most materially affect the comfort, health, and enjoyment of the tens of thousands to whom that heath afforded the means of recreation. He therefore hoped he should persuade the House that, not only as legislators, but as trustees for the public, they ought to put an end at once to any further attempt at legislation on this subject. This class of Bill was not at all an uncommon one, for, whenever an heir to a tenant for life found that, through circumstances which had arisen out of the contemplation of the testator through whom he inherited, certain powers were necessary which he could not by law exercise, he went to Parliament, for the purpose of obtaining a relaxation of the provisions of the will, and that relaxation Parliament usually granted, provided that it was proved to demonstration that the wish of the testator was not interfered with, or public interests damaged. In order to ascertain that fact, which was a very important one, the wills and codicils were referred to learned Judges to report to Parliament whether or not, in their view of the case, the circumstances rendering the Bill necessary were within the contemplation of the testator. In this particular case the usual course was pursued, the will and codicil being referred to two learned Judges, and they had reported against the Bill, not only on this, but on former occasions; and, should the House of Commons give its sanction to the measure, it would be doing that which was, and he hoped would continue to be, unprecedented, because Parliament had never hitherto granted the powers sought to be obtained by Bills like the present in the face of an adverse report by those learned persons. It was unnecessary for him to weary the House by going into any minute details of this particular case, because they had been stated with clearness and accuracy in a paper which he held in his hands, and which hon. Gentlemen had also had an opportunity of seeing. The reasons advanced in that paper had convinced him, and would convince any one who would take the trouble to read them. He thought it was quite clear that the late Sir Thomas Wilson had designedly deprived the present tenant for life of the power to grant leasing powers over the Hampstead property, because, while expressly giving such powers over other parts of his estate by a codicil to his will executed in 1821, he had entirely omitted all reference to the property in question. It was indeed said that Sir Thomas Wilson had no intention to build upon Hampstead Heath, which was entirely apart from the property embraced in this Bill. It was, however, not a little remarkable that when, ten years ago, the copyholders agreed to withdraw their opposition to the granting of the powers sought so far as their property went, on consideration that Sir Thomas Wilson would enter into an engagement to leave the portion abutting on Hampstead Heath uninclosed.
